In reply the advocates of compulsory suffrage issue a direct challenge to all of the foregoing assertions. The duty of voting is neglected to an extent which demands and justifies a drastic remedy. A partial vote is not as good as a full vote to express the intelligent judgment of the electors. And a full vote would in a great number of cases alter the result recorded on a partial vote. Furthermore, the indifference to electoral duties on the part of a vast army of citizens forces on those who are more patriotic a heavy burden of expense and labor in order to secure even as good a representation as we now do; also, it gives to mercenary interests the best possible opportunity to obtain results favorable to themselves through the expenditure of money in elections, and it multiplies the effectiveness of bosses and professional politicians, who make a study of the ways and means of drawing to the polls the classes of voters whom they can most easily influence.

There should be no controversy over a fact so well known as that the greater part of the work and outlay of money now necessary in conducting a campaign are expended, in one way or another, for the single purpose of getting voters to the polls on election day, and to remove this necessity for expending effort and money is to abolish or to minimize the evils which flourish so luxuriantly in the fertile soil of the voters' indifference.

State Entitled to Know Public Choice.

That a vote should be the intelligent expression of choice is perfectly true—the best decision which the mind and conscience of a voter enable him to make. If a voter goes to the polls and gives the best which it is in him to give, the state, which has established universal suffrage, has no right to complain even though the voter's judgment go astray. But if the voter declines to trouble himself to go to the polls at all, the state has a right to adjudge him a delinquent and to treat him accordingly. That it cannot compel a voter who has no choice to exercise a choice may be admitted, at least for argument's sake, and because it is not necessary for present purposes to dispute it, although there are not wanting precedents for making a choice compulsory: a member of a bench of judges is not permitted to say he will neither concur in a decision nor dissent; a member of a legislative body must, unless specially excused, vote either aye or no on roll call, and even a trial juror must take a position and help to deliver a verdict. Let the voter who is without opinions cast a blank ballot if he wishes, but make him go to the polls; if the state exerts compulsion to that extent, it can afford to leave the rest to conscience. In the country in which compulsory suffrage was first successfully established, the casting of blank ballots is distinctly recognized by the laws.

But if every citizen is required to go to the polls there will be few cases of such utter indifference that no choice will exist and the voter will cast a blank ballot. Nothing vanquishes indifference so quickly as the necessity for action; the knowledge that he must go to the polls, whether or no, would induce many a man to take an interest in politics who now feels none, and as soon as interest begins opinion commences to form.

Indifference Cause of Light Vote.

But what are the facts with regard to neglect of the duty of voting? Our citizens vote fairly well at times, as, for example, at presidential elections, or when there is a hotly contested state or county election in which strong feeling has been aroused, and sometimes in city elections when corruption has been exposed and a new reform movement has been launched. But even under these circumstances it requires a great beating of drums, a large expenditure of money by candidates and committees, and more or less personal solicitation to bring out the vote. On the other side is the record of elections which come and go without sensational incident and in which not even the beating of the drums and the flying of party banners can get out anything like a full vote. Sometimes the poll represents two-thirds of a full vote, and not infrequently only a half. At primaries, which are apt to be the most important elections of all, the vote is usually so light as to give the advantage to the programmers, whose army, made up of mercenaries or gentlemen adventurers in politics, acts under orders and votes with the regularity which the good citizen ought to imitate but does not. When there is a half vote the boss is most likely to win; when there is a two-thirds vote his chances are diminished; but when there is a full vote he has little room for hope.

Habit will reconcile the mind to pretty nearly anything, and we have ceased to be shocked when elections go wrong because a quarter or a half of the voters remain away from the polls, but in truth this is an evil of greater magnitude than some others which occasion outcries of dismay and anger. We have good government intermittently, because citizens do wake up now and then and vote for it; we will have good government all the time when they vote for it all the time, and no sooner. When it is possible to get a full vote without creating a great excitement, the conditions will be more favorable to good government than they are now. No one else realizes quite so keenly how much a full vote would do to make elections go right as the men who are chiefly interested in making elections go wrong—that is to say, the professional politicians. You never met one of those persons who was not ready to stop the mouth of complaint with the question, "How can people expect to get the right men in office so long as they will not turn out and vote for them at both the primary and the general election?"

San Francisco's Chronic Light Vote.

In the San Francisco primary election held last August, although the candidates were numerous, and though in both the Republican and Democratic parties there were faction fights to whet the interest, the number of votes polled was but 36,998 out of a registration of 84,571—less than 44 per cent. The general city election which followed in November was accounted a hard-fought one, and yet there were cast but about 67,500 votes out of a total on the register of 87,179—a record of 77 per cent. In the $18,000,000 bond election held not very long since in the same city the vote was 23,560 cast to 75,388 registered—31 per cent. And, finally, in the recent water bond election, involving a proposal to run in debt $58,000,000, and constituting by far the most important issue ever submitted to the citizens of San Francisco, the vote was no larger than that cast at the August primary.

A comparison of San Francisco general election figures for six years past shows that there has nearly always been a difference of about 20,000 between the vote registered and that cast. If we assume that half of this number represents voters who have removed from the city, or are temporarily away, or are sick, or have died, the other ten thousand, made up of inexcusable delinquents, still represent from 10 to 20 per cent of the entire electorate.

Changes a Full Vote Would Cause.

To answer the assertion that an increase in the vote cast would seldom change the result, it should be only necessary to point to the numerous candidates who scrape into office by a bare plurality and the numerous contests in court based thereon. In the late San Francisco city election six of the eighteen supervisors were returned by pluralities so small that their closest competitors went into court seeking to overturn the result through a recount which might happen to show trifling irregularities in a few precincts. It is quite generally believed that a few thousand more votes cast at the water bond election would have meant the purchase of the Spring Valley works instead of their rejection.

That the vote not cast is always, or even usually, the same in character as that which is cast is another assumption which cannot go unchallenged. The un-cast vote may be inferior to the other in point of interest in the result—though it must be remembered that many indifferent voters go to the polls simply because some one makes a business of getting them there—but, on the other hand, the un-cast vote must be held to include few persons who would have a mercenary interest in voting wrong. In every election, no matter how broad or deep the economic or political issue, there is sure to be a cross-fire of selfish, personal or class interests; in a certain sense this vote is mercenary, and usually a larger proportion of it is grouped on one side than on the other. The vote which is drawn to the polls by selfish interests is bound to be cast more fully than that which is disinterested, until we have compulsory suffrage.

Compulsory Voting a Tried Device.

But compulsory voting is not an untried experiment, a hare-brained theory of some excited thinker, but a working system in at least two countries of Europe.

In the first of these, Austria, it is not of universal application, and I have been able to find out but little about it. It is applied in the election of members of the Reichsrath, or national parliament, in six different provinces, including Lower Austria and Upper Austria. Every voter is required to present his electoral ticket, the penalty for failure being a fine of from one to fifty kronen. In Belgium the system has been in successful operation for more than sixteen years and it has been proved that it is not necessary to have drastic penalties to enforce compliance with the law.

In brief, the penal provisions consist of publicity likely to be the most effective dereprimand or fine for the first offense, a little larger fine for the second offense, for the third the same fine and a more severe dose of publicity, and for the fourth deprivation of the right to vote for a period of ten years. In no event is imprisonment.

How has the plan worked? It was put in operation in 1893, and previous to that time approximately 16 per cent. of the electors failed to vote. Under the compulsory law the percentage of non-voters fell to 4 or 5 per cent. In 1898, out of 1,058,165 electors called to the polls, 5,551 failed to attend without giving previous notice of the reason and were summoned into court; of that relatively small number 2,621 were excused by the magistrates on such grounds as illness, age, or absence, and 2,930 were fined. I find these facts stated in a review of a book by Prof. Leon Dupriez of the University of Louvain.

Effective Penalties for Non-Voting.

A writer in the Annals of the American Academy of Political Science, discussing the effect of the penalties, and especially the deprivation of the right to vote, says: "To some it looked ridiculous to punish a man by taking from him a right precisely because he did not care to exercise it. But it is one thing to wilfully neglect a privilege under certain uninteresting circumstances, and another to be deprived of it altogether for ten years. The facts, as shown by the statistics, fully bore out the soundness of the confidence which the framers of the revised constitution of 1893 had put in the compulsory vote." (A. Nerinx, in Ann. of Am. Acad., Vol. 18, 1901.)

The outcome of the experiment in Belgium has been such as to make the difficulty of discovering an appropriate penalty for the wilful non-voter less of a bugaboo than it seemed to be. A scale of penalties modeled on the Belgian law might be framed for California without serious difficulty. It would be necessary, probably, to begin with the registration, and make that too, compulsory, in order to prevent a considerable number from ignoring or forgetting that essential preliminary. Perhaps the county assessor, whose duty it is to make up the military roll, composed of all citizens liable under the law to bear arms, should also be required to report a list of eligible voters, so that those neglecting to register by a certain date could be brought to book. Immediately following an election, the poll lists, showing who have voted, should be compared with the registers, and a list made up of those who did not vote. This list, arranged alphabetically, by precincts, might be advertised in a newspaper as part of an official notification of all named in the list to appear before a magistrate and present their excuses. Valid excuses, such as necessary absence from town, serious illness, removal of residence from the precinct, etc., should be specified in the law. For wilful failure to vote the punishment for the first offense should be a simple judicial reprimand, with, perhaps, a small fine if deemed advisable, and with each successive repetition of the offense the penalty should increase, as under the Belgian law, ultimately culminating in disqualification, to continue for some years. But from the very first offense there should be kept a correct record of all delinquencies, and it should be public, in order that unfaithful citizens might at all times know their sins of omission were written in the books and could be drawn upon them. Exclusion from public employment, even manual labor, after a second or third offense, and, of course, disqualification for holding office, would naturally go hand in hand with the other penalties. That this code would be generally upheld by public opinion and therefore enforceable, there is no reason to doubt.

It is not well to thrust upon the people too many novelties at one time. We now have the still undigested though promising direct primary law, and I should not favor the adoption of compulsory voting until the time is clearly ripe for it. But it cannot be discussed too soon or too often, and eventually it will be adopted, in the form of an amendment to the constitution, with the assent of an overwhelming majority of our citizens.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

Owing to the severe winter, coyotes have descended into the valleys of Tehama county and are doing much damage to sheep and other domestic stock.

Samuel Farley, a well and favorably known young man of Middletown, Lake county, committed suicide last week by blowing his head from his body with a stick of dynamite.

The Evening Star mine, located near Redding, has been sold to a German syndicate for $115,000.

Mrs. Catherine McGuire, a pioneer resident of Benicia, was burned to death in her home in that place recently.

Ten business houses in the town of Turlock were destroyed by fire last week Wednesday. The damage is estimated at $50,000.

The fruit-growers of the Sacramento valley met in Sacramento last week and organized the California Deciduous Fruit Protective League.

It is reported that a ledge of gold ore running $10,000 to the ton has been uncovered near Hurlton, Yuba county.

According to a census taken by the Women's Improvement Club the population of Willows now is 2,488.

In Healdsburg, a few days ago, the one hundredth birthday anniversary of Mrs. Electa ("Grandma") Kennedy was celebrated by a large number of her relatives and friends.

A colony of Mennonites has purchased 3,200 acres of land near Dinuba and will settle on it. The price paid for the land was $272,000.

An East Side resident of foreign birth was taken before the magistrate in one of the police courts charged with a trivial offense. "Tell him he must not do it again. He is discharged," the magistrate said to the policeman on the bridge. "The judge says you dasset do it. Understand?" almost shouted the policeman to the prisoner. "Hold on, officer. I didn't dare him to break the law again. I said 'must not.'" "That's all right, your honor. He understands what I said better'n he would what you said," explained the policeman. And the prisoner seemed to think so, too.—New York Sun.

Post and Montgomery Sts.

I SCARCELY knew how I got there, the buffeting up the coast against a head wind, together with the tossing, had made me so ill, and then, too, I had arrived in the night and in a drizzling rain, but there I was. The little tub of a steamer had only touched at the wharf and had gone out over the bar again to face the deep sea. How it dared I hardly knew, and, indeed, it did essay one trip too many and now lies on the ocean bottom, with its cargo and most of its passengers, a hundred fathoms deep for aught I know, but that has nothing to do with this story.

"My husband is from home, sir, and will not be back until Friday." Humph! He had gone out on the same steamer I came in on, and this was only Tuesday morning.

The woman only half opened the door and was evidently impatient at being detained at all. Her attitude plainly said: "Time is money, sir." Time is money to all these lumber folk, in the lumbering season, when it is drive, drive, drive from morning to night, with few interests reaching beyond a redwood log. When the weather shuts down on business it is different.

I was in for a wait of three mortal days and began to look about me. Three conical hills tipped over on their sides, bases abutting against the impenetrable redwood forest and apexes converging upon a diminutive flat deeply gashed by two gulches; a lazy bay that laved and lapped a dreary mudflat; a rickety trestle that had put to sea half a mile or more to find anchorage ground with water enough to accommodate small steamers and schooners coming there to load. Back and forth over this trestle, from shore to wharf and wharf to shore, sped a diminutive locomotive, screaming at the top of its voice and dragging little cars now loaded and now empty, but always rattling like the deacon's One Hoss Shay. Back up there in the woods somewhere is a sawmill swarming with swearing, striving, swarthy men hard pressed in order that the autocrat of the camp may, by and by, retire worth a million, unless he gets jammed in some speculative deal into which he has ventured because riches are not coming fast enough even with all this struggle and stress of converting time into money.

Down on the flat is a little plaza and around it are ranged shops and stores. Above them, and back as far as the forest, helter skelter, are, perhaps, a hundred such houses as proclaim lumber cheap and paint dear. From one to other run trails rather than streets, trails flanked with endless brakes, wild blackberries and sumac out of which rise blackened stumps with outstretched, pudgy arms, taking shapes of bears, goblins, ghouls, ugly enough to frighten children and horses night or day. And here I am to spend three mortal days, if not four, merely waiting!

I am made sensible as I walk of a peg in my shoe that has just worked into the quick and I cast my eyes about for a shoemaker's sign. Just beyond the little hotel where I had put up I spy a sign bearing the legend, "William Oden, Maker," but it is not the conventional shoemaker's sign. Instead of having a single boot or boot and shoe, it bears a pair of long legged boots looking for all the world as though their owner were speeding at a cross-country racing gait or urged to his best by the thought that "time is money, and money is what we are all after." I note that there is character in those boots. They are square-toed and square heeled and their owner puts his foot down squarely every time. I enter the little shop, but not until I have noted a larger cottage built on at the back surrounded with a garden of flowers, vegetables and fruits, with vineclad coops and cotes for chickens and cooing doves farther on. A rather extensive place to front on a main street even of so small a town, cheaply constructed but comfortable.

I enter the shop to have that peg rasped down. At work at his bench is a large, fleshy, flat-visaged and half bald man no longer young, yet fresh looking and not unintelligent. "Those boots of yours out there on that sign-board have character in them," I remarked. "Their possessor is making time and conducting himself on the square."

The shoemaker looked up at me with a pleased smile. "Right you are, stranger. The man who walks in those boots can stand alone. You see I run mine over. That's why I couldn't and why I'm here, but that does not interest you. What does?"

"Just a peg that is hurting."

"Sit down there and give it to me."

I did so and in a jiffy it was out. Then we fell to talking. His shop became my loafing place. We had much in common. My business brought me to the place many times in succeeding years and always I spent my spare time in the shop or home of William Oden, but somehow I could only get about so near to him. That he was a man with a history I felt sure, but I made no unmannerly advances and he held his peace. He lived alone, cooked his own meals and talked to himself, when there was no one to overhear, but his house was as neat as a pin and his garden the best kept in town. Nothing could tempt him to work in his shop more than six hours per day and if work was not pressing he worked only four. His bookkeeping comprised only two accounts, profit and loss. Whatever was paid out was set down as loss and whatever was paid in went to the profit side of the ledger. As long as that side was biggest he was content and he had kept it so much the biggest that he had paid for his place in the course of a dozen years or twenty and owned the little hotel next door, although he did not conduct it. The rent from it ought to keep him from the poorhouse, he thought, when he should become too old or too blind to work at his bench. He knew all the people in the settlement by their footwear and needed not to have any phrenologist tell him of their character by the bumps on their heads. A look at the shoes they had worn long enough to need repairing sufficed for him.

My last visit to him was early in March and I was stormbound several days, the little tub plying between there and San Francisco not daring to venture out over the bar. It was the hardest wind and rain storm of the year, a sort of wind-up of the heavy winter season. I sat with him in his little living room. The rain drifted against the window panes and the wind shook the fragile habitation as though it had been a tent. The roar of the forest amounted almost to a bellow and up on the higher ridges the lightnings flashed and thunders reverberated. William Oden was plainly ill at ease, and when a gust of wind came down the chimney and blew the ashes about the room I fancied that he turned almost white. He begged me not to leave him until the storm abated, declaring that he should be indescribably lonely if I did.

"You are too companionable a man, Mr. Oden," I ventured to say, "to have always lived a bachelor, and I wonder that you have."

"Nor have I," he said, with much trepidation, "though I let these people think I have. It saves embarrassing explanations, but, friend, you are young, you have not been long married and, I note, like your dram once in a while as well as anyone. Moreover, you are ambitious to be rich and to have a hand in large affairs. I see that these things make you less mindful of home and family than you should be and I am half a mind to let you learn a thing or two from my experience in life. When such storms as this one come I always feel like talking, but when they have passed I am always glad I did not. It blows particularly hard to-night, and if you have the patience to listen I'll talk."

I assured him I should be glad to know more of his life, but would not press it upon him.

Well, he said, it is soon told, if long in being experienced. I was born and brought up in a little Pennsylvania village half way between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. My father kept the only public house in the town and, until I was seventeen years old, I never knew any other surroundings. At that age I was apprenticed to Uriah Hapgood, the village shoemaker, who was to give me a kit of tools and a hundred dollars when I was twenty-one, which he did; but I worked for him a year longer as a journeyman, partly to earn enough with which to start a shop of my own somewhere, and partly because of Marguerite, his daughter, of whom I had grown tremendously fond, and she of me. We should have been married in another year but for the gold excitement in California. The fever reached me and, packing my kit and buying all the leather my slender means would allow, I took ship for Panama, bidding Marguerite be of good cheer for I should speedily be back with a fortune.

I did prosper. My kit paid me better than many a mine paid its owner and gave me a chance to learn the ways of the country. I bought an interest in a mine up in the edge of the timber belt, near by a crossroads and, with the help of Ellen Butler and her good-for-nothing husband, opened a little public house and a bar. It was in the midst of the best of fishing, hunting and mountain outing grounds and was much frequented, partly, too, because of mineral springs that got the reputation, whether deserved or not, of soaking the malaria out of those who came up from the valley. The business grew on us. The bar was a mine and, if Butler had not proceeded to kill himself with our own "forty-rod" it would have been a mint.

But the tall timber on the ridges above us had attractions for me and I made myself owner of as much of it as I could, longed for a sawmill and husbanded my resources to get one. Then, after a half dozen years since leaving home, I got a letter from Marguerite, one particular letter amid a score of others. It read, "William, dear, could you come for me pretty soon? I am not at all well and old Dr. Whitehorn says that up in the mountains where you are is just the place for me. You know I had pneumonia last winter."

I did not answer her letter. I just packed up and took the first steamer for Panama and the states, taking all the cash with me I could get together, leaving Ellen Butler and her good-for-nothing husband, but chiefly Ellen, in charge. Within a week after reaching home we were married. I had bought the machinery for a sawmill, had shipped it around the Horn and we were aboard steamer for California.

Why linger over the years? It strained my credit to the uttermost, getting that mill set up and to running, roads built and the business set to rights. It was drive, drive, drive from morning to night, but I got it going and then the money began to flow in in a bigger, broader, yellower stream than ever I had dreamed of. Shacks were rented as fast as I could put them up, no matter what the price charged, and the hotel was crowded. It was a lively camp, almost riotous, and not a pleasant place for delicate Marguerite, but Ellen was in her element. She was the life of the place and I don't see how I could ever have gotten on without her, for Marguerite had no liking for such surroundings. She did what she could to make things better than they were in the camp while Ellen and I were doing what we could to make them worse. Marguerite's efforts did not avail much. I was ambitious to be rich, money-mad as it seems to me now, and to keep up my strength while driving business almost day and night I braced up against my own bar more than I should, but I could not remember when a bar had not been as much a part of the home life of my father's family as a kitchen, and no thought of restraint occurred to me.

I knew in a vague way that Marguerite was not happy, that she and Ellen did not get on well together; that Ellen, with her push and vim and her ambition to get on, forestalled Marguerite at every turn and assumed to be mistress of the house, which she was, and of me, too, which she was not, although we advised together more than I and Marguerite. Yet I meant to be kind. When our little Eddie died, and for weeks after, I threw the business upon Ellen and devoted myself to Marguerite, but gradually I got back into the old way and things went on as before.

Then Ellen's good-for-nothing husband, in one of his sprees, accused her falsely, for which I thrashed him. He took a shot at her and missed, put the pistol to his own head and met with better success. But the tongues had started to wagging and I fought a desperate battle in the barroom one night in defense of Ellen's reputation and my own, in which my enemy came near to being my victim.

These things told upon Marguerite. I could not help seeing it, but it angered me rather than otherwise, for I knew that I had been true to her in thought and deed. The climax came at the close of one of those revels we sometimes had at the place where everybody drank and everybody danced and did not go home until morning. I had been drinking more during the day than was good for me, so that the festivities had not gone far that evening before I was first beside myself with gallantry and then dead to the world with drunken sleep. Sometime between midnight and morning somebody, I never found out who, led me off and put me to bed. God forgive me, in Ellen Butler's room. She was not there, but Marguerite did not know this and, when a chambermaid told her where I was, she got together such of her things as were indispensable, emptied the till at the bar and safe at the office (for I had at all times given her free access to my purse) and took the morning stage for Sacramento.

When I awoke the sun was blazing in through the window. It half blinded me, so that I could scarcely make out where I was, but when the truth broke through my befuddled brain I ran half clothed to Marguerite's room and mine only to find everything in disorder and Marguerite gone. I ran down the stairs calling at the top of my voice for Marguerite, for Ellen Butler, for the chambermaid, office boy, anybody, but neither Marguerite nor Ellen was to be found. The chambermaid came in answer to my call, demanding to know where on earth I had kept myself and saying that she had searched everywhere for me. The lying wench! She knew well enough. I ordered my team of bronchos harnessed to my light road wagon and hastened to finish dressing. In a quarter of an hour I was off in pursuit of the stage which had an hour's start of me.

But I had the fastest team on the mountains and believed that I could overtake the stage in a sixty-mile run for it before reaching Sacramento, even if the stage did have relays of horses while I had not. I got my thoughts collected together a little as I drove, and the horses, too, seemed to enter into the spirit of the race, for I never saw them more eager for the road. I saw, too, Ellen Butler's part in the escapade of the night before, although she was nowhere to be found, and I cursed her aloud at every turn of the road. If I could have gotten my hands upon her I believe I could have choked her life out without a qualm of conscience. And then I cursed myself for my stupidity, for my neglect of Marguerite, for my drinking and carousing, but most of all for my money-madness that had blinded me to all else. So, fuming and raging, I let the horses do their best in the hope of coming abreast of the stage somewhere in Rincon canyon where I might signal the driver to stop and await my coming. I knew him well and felt sure he would do it.

HELP THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY.

If you want to do so, whenever you have a dollar to spend, remember its advertisers, and when you spend that dollar with one of its advertisers see to it that that advertiser is made to remember The California Weekly. That will help.

What They May Spend Senator Flint, Governor Gillett and a few other persons have been regretting the terrible expense of running for office under the direct primary law and saying they cannot assume such a burden. Governor Gillett set the minimum of his estimate at $10,000 for his own case, and Senator Flint thought that a candidate for senator could not make the primary contest for less than $25,000. In so saying they assume that the section of the primary law fixing a limit on what candidates may expend is going to be a nullity, for that limit is far below their estimates. Section thirty of the statute provides in specific and yet comprehensive terms that no candidate—candidates for the senate being included—shall spend more than a sum fixed as follows: "When the total vote within the same constituency at the last preceding general election did not exceed five thousand, two hundred and fifty dollars; for each one hundred voters over five thousand and under twenty-five thousand, two dollars; for each one hundred voters over twenty-five thousand and under fifty thousand, one dollar; and for each one hundred voters over fifty thousand, fifty cents." At the last general selection in California the vote was 386,000, and upon this basis the most that a candidate for the senate, the governorship or any other state office can spend is $2,580. No distinction is made between the largest and the smallest office; the candidate for governor can legally spend no more to get his nomination than can the candidate for clerk of the supreme court, the candidate for United States senator no more than the man who is running for superintendent of public instruction. The poverty of Senator Flint, for he is estimated to be worth only about $150,000, would be more touching if it were not for his expressed regret at being unable to expend nearly ten times as much as the law permits him to expend in making a campaign.

Voice of Labor Or Paper Dealer? Gossip of the hour is to the effect that W. W. Shamon, superintendent of state printing, will not succeed himself, although he desires to do so. There are other aspirants, and the ingenious gentlemen who report (or make?) the political news for the daily papers have it that "labor, which always supported Shamon before," is not for him this time. (In the political sense "labor" is often spoken of not as an assemblage of individuals who may be of different minds, but as a sort of abstraction which exists in, say, the mind of Mayor McCarthy.) It is possibly true that some labor union members believe that they have been instrumental in picking out candidates for superintendent of state printing, but they are under a delusion, for that has been done by the unostentatious gentlemen who get contracts for selling paper to the state of California. With its school book and general printing, the state is a big buyer of paper; the state printer is the chief agency in its purchase, and the paper houses are not slow to perceive the advantage of having a man in the office who is under obligation to them. It may not be so in future, with the direct primary operative—it ought not to be so—but we advise the labor union voters, if they think they should have a voice in making this nomination, to watch out lest they be fooled as thoroughly as in the past.

A western business man walking down Broadway encountered a friend of former days. It was evident that times had dealt harshly with him. His clothes were frizzled and he bore every visible sign of failure and dejection. It was evident from his watery eyes and red nose that liquor had played no little part in his undoing. The business man, however, wanted to be cordial and asked him to have a drink. When the other gladly agreed the two stepped into a cafe, and the business man said to the bartender: "Two highballs, please." The derelict edged to the bar quickly and in a tremulous but eager voice said: "Give me the same!"—Cosmopolitan Magazine.

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE MAYOR.

Hon. P. H. McCarthy.

Mayor of the City and County of San Francisco.

Sir:—It is your ambition to bring to San Francisco great material prosperity; to have the term of your administration marked by an advancement in the wealth and physical well-being of every citizen in the community. We are, each one of us, very humanly open to the appeal of wealth and ease. The question arises, however, as to what we shall, in our present state of ignorance, find at the end of this golden vista down which you are so confidently inviting us to follow you.

You will recall that the basis of the complaint of intelligent labor has been, that those individuals possessing the power that is conferred by wealth, have lacked the wisdom that would lead to a just administration of that wealth. It is clear, by the example of these individuals, that wisdom does not accompany riches—that the sudden acquisition of great prosperity does not necessarily make a man wise. To set up before a people the ideal of prosperity and of prosperity alone—prosperity attained at the sacrifice of truer things—more substantial good, is not the act of a wise man. Furthermore it is not, we believe, the essential ideal of the sober working man, and you of all others should know what is the essential ideal of the working man.

If the battle of labor has been fought upon this question of adequate pay for a reasonable day's work—if that battle has been won, is being successively won, by organized labor, surely not one man of the hundreds of thousands who have fought this great fight (unless he has become besotted with labor's victories) has lost sight of the fact that back of the question of dollars and cents, of prosperity, stood the great ideal of human justice. Justice was offering, placing within the reach of the hands of men, for the first time in history, not dollars and cents but their just right in the opportunity for a full and reasonable life.

The question follows: "What is a full and reasonable life?" We believe that the sober working man's reply would be: "Opportunity to work; to do what I can to make myself a responsible citizen of the community in which I live; to marry, to establish a proper home and to bring up my children to be decent and honorable men and women." You will not deny that this is the proper ideal of worthy men in whatever walk of life you may find them, and that that ultimate wish, that a man's children may be better and wiser than he is, is the true foundation of the future. Increasingly the wise leaders of labor are directing the thoughts of their followers to this ideal of the child—the man of the future, whose presence gives us our hold upon the future.

Your administration of the affairs of the city has been in operation little more than one month's time. We, who are interested in the advancement of labor with all it means to the American democracy, have followed your public utterances with the keenest curiosity and interest, and the question uppermost in the minds of thinking men has been: "Is he perceiving his responsibility toward the future of San Francisco; the future of labor—the future as embodied in his children and ours?"

In lieu of an answer to this question you have replied: "Prosperity"; "The Paris of America"; "All pleasures within the law."

Sober men will assure you that this is not the answer to the question. The serious members of the organization in which you are a leader will assure you that this is not the answer to the question; that you have not perceived the higher ideal toward which labor is looking.

The child will speak as a man and assure his contemporaries that "Prosperity in a wide open town" was not, by the bitterness of his own youthful experience, an answer to the question.

You are not necessarily committed as yet to the policy you have outlined in the rashness of an enthusiasm for prosperity, but you are, all unwittingly, committed, and by the future itself, for an answer to our question.

BRUCE PORTER.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Why a Direct Primary Law At All?

The purpose of the series of lessons on the new direct primary law in California is to answer every pertinent question that can be asked in relation to it for which there is an answer, with the view of facilitating the operation of that law in the election of 1910. If any point is not made perfectly clear questions relating to such points will be cheerfully answered if they can be by addressing The California Weekly, 26 Montgomery Street, San Francisco.

Our government is based upon the fundamental proposition that governments are instituted among men for the securing of certain unalienable human rights, among which, but by no means including them all, are the right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, from which it follows that such powers as are not so derived are not just, and are to be resisted.

This word "consent" needs to be broadly interpreted. It must be taken to mean more than a failure to object in the event that a government proceeds to exercise a power that is not agreeable to the people. If the term "authority of the governed," had been used it would have come nearer expressing the intent. Our government, therefore, derives its just powers from the authority of the governed and not otherwise, and any act of government that has not the authority of public approval back of it constitutes a usurpation of power and should be resisted.

How the "consent" or "authority" of the governed is to be ascertained is a problem with which humanity has been wrestling ever since the dawn of human history and perhaps before that dawn, and it does not yet appear that the enactment of California's direct primary law is to prove a wholly satisfactory solution of that problem.

"Consent of the people," is, in our country, expressed in two principal ways, directly, as through a caucus or mass meeting which all may attend and indirectly by representatives whom the voters elect to attend to their governmental functions for them, in their name and with their authority.

Where the number of issues to be determined is not so great as to take too long to thresh them out, and the number of persons is not too great to be brought together in a single hall (so that what is said and done can be both seen and heard) no better instrumentality exists for ascertaining the "consent" or conferring the "authority" of the people than a caucus, mass convention or New England town meeting. At such convocations of the people the issues may be threshed out on the floor, a showing of hands taken and the subject matter settled then and there.

Where circumstances do not well admit of getting the voters together all at once, they may still directly determine the issues by coming to a polling place one at a time and voting on those issues. This is as much direct legislation as the town meeting plan, only that the discussion must take place elsewhere than at the polls. Usually, in such cases, the discussion is carried on in the public press and the voters make up their minds by themselves and at their leisure.

But of the multitude of issues that arise in the affairs of government only a few, and those ordinarily near at hand, can be determined directly by the electors under either of these systems of direct legislation. Some persons must be set apart and authorized and allowed to make public affairs their business as agents of the whole people. That is what we call representative government and, by the physical limitations of direct legislation, government must be mainly representative or not by authorization of the people at all. The choice, then, must be between representative government and government by some dictator, autocrat or king or, as with us, by some railroad or other corporation acting through a misrepresentation of popular "consent" or "authority" instead of representing it.

If all qualified electors were habituated to the discharge of their duties as citizens, or even if 75 per cent. of them were, instead of commonly twenty-five, and if their chosen representatives were faithful to discharge their obligations to their constituencies, the representative form of government, under which we have been working in California for almost sixty years, would be the best imaginable, for issues would then be settled by carefully picked men. But the system broke down through want of interest upon the part of the people themselves and want of fidelity on the part of their representatives.

Despite their much to be lamented apathy in relation to their own affairs the people of California, in common with those of other states in the union, really want to govern themselves and do not wish the powers of government to be usurped by political bosses, of great corporations, and so, inspired by those among them who stand for Right Things, they demanded a direct nominating law to take the place of the representative, or convention, system of party government they had used so long. And they got such a law, the analysis of which will be the subject of these Lessons in Citizenship for a number of weeks.

SHEAR WIT.

"Isn't your hat rather curious in shape?" asked the uninformed man. "Certainly," answered his wife. "It has to be. Any hat that wasn't curious in shape would look queer."—Washington Star

"Men of Rochester, I am glad to see you; and I am glad to see your noble city. Gentlemen, I saw your falls, which I am told are one hundred and fifty feet high. This is a very interesting fact. Gentlemen, Rome had her Caesar, her Scipio, her Brutus, but Rome in her proudest days had never a waterfall a hundred and fifty feet high! Gentlemen, Greece had her Pericles, her Demosthenes, and her Socrates, but Greece in her palmiest days NEVER had a waterfall a hundred and fifty feet high! Men of Rochester, GO ON. No people ever lost their liberties who had a waterfall one hundred and fifty feet high!"—Old Favorite.

To Attorney-General Webb, Greeting!

THERE IS REASON TO FEAR, General Webb, that the prosecution of the San Francisco grafters has fallen into the hands of a district attorney reluctant to prosecute. All the evidence exists that has existed from the first, evidence that has convinced the public beyond any doubt, reasonable or unreasonable, except the presence of the lamentable Gallagher, and his deposition was taken in full for the express purpose of supplying the missing link in the event that he should take himself, or some paid assassin should take him, off. The law makes it your duty in such cases to intervene on behalf of The People of the State of California. Do it. At least sift the matter and let us know what you think can be done with the evidence in hand and available.

Those "Copy-Cats."

MISS MARLATT, in charge of the domestic economics department of the University of Wisconsin, charges her sex with being "copy-cats" in relation to styles and is trying to teach her pupils the better way of dressing with an individualistic regard to what looks well on each daughter of Eve. A noble woman engaged in a noble work! Success attend her efforts! Which reminds also that the edict has gone forth for all "copy-cats," to copy the styles that raged during 1830, or thereabouts, verging upon our great-grandmothers' era. Let us hope that neither the umbrella hat nor the "mop" obtained in those days. Anything but those!

Langdon's Vindication.

NO ONE DOUBTED that Mr. William H. Langdon would purge himself of all dereliction of duty in turning over to his successor all documents and evidence that were at any time in his possession in relation to the graft cases. Therefore it occasioned no surprise that the grand jury exonerated him as soon as a hearing could be had. There have been insinuations thrown out against Mr. Heney of a similar character, but they appear to have vanished even in advance of Mr. Heney's return to San Francisco. Now it is Mr. William J. Burns with whom District Attorney Fickert wishes to talk. No doubt Mr. Burns will accommodate him with a conversation at the first opportunity and, no doubt also, Mr. Burns will be exonerated. These men are not of the kind to foul their own reputations for the sake of affording Mr. Fickert reasons why he should not prosecute men charged with offenses against the state. They went out of office with clean hands and unsoiled linen, every one of them.

California's Baby.

MR. J. C. STUBBS is a serious man, as chill blooded as a turtle, but he enjoys a bit of humor now and then, even on the witness stand. In New York the other day he testified that, "The Southern Pacific is California's baby. It pets that baby more than anyone else and spans it, too, sometimes." Will Mr. Stubbs kindly suggest when the last spanking took place? The Southern Pacific has many spankings coming, good hard ones, too, let us hope, applied with a piece of fence board full of auger holes, but history is voiceless as to when the last one was applied. The unruly youngster has had the old folks terrified over since it was born, and the further fact is that it was born in Kentucky, not California, and had a Kentucky devil in it from the start. But there are indications that the issue of who is boss, California or its Kentucky baby, may soon be tried out. When the spanking is administered the kid will know that there is something doing on the Pacific Coast.

Anxiety Over Ohio.

OF COURSE THE PRESIDENT does not wish again to lose his own state to the Democrats and few will blame him for commissioning Wade Ellis to go to Ohio to put the Republican fences in order, although it does not appear to be quite the right thing to give him a $7,000 roving commission at public cost to enable him to perform the service profitably. The main justification for this anxiety is that the issue has taken the form of Judson Harmon vs. "Slippery" Dick, who is as unfit to sit in the senate as any man Ohio has had there within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. Even Foraker would be better, for, at least, he was of senatorial size, whereas Dick was not by nature so endowed. The President can do a better thing than to win Ohio for Dick. He could lose it to Judson Harmon, a bigger and better man from every point viewed. There has not appeared in the arena any Republican Ohioan fit to enter the lists against him.

Let the Women Say.

A BILL HAS BEEN INTRODUCED in the legislature of New York, which provides that, on the day previous to the next general election in that state, all election booths shall be set up and all election officers be in their places to receive, count and make returns of all the votes cast by all women twenty-one years of age and upward who desire to vote, the issue to be whether or not they wish to have the right of suffrage conferred upon them. This for the guidance of the legislature and the people in reference to that much discussed extension of the franchise. If the women of New York want the suffrage they will get it, but they are not likely to get it if they do not, there or elsewhere. Of course that is not treating them quite as the men are treated, for those of the men who wish to vote do vote and the others do not, but that is not likely much longer to be tolerated. We are moving toward a compulsory voting or disfranchising of the men and the sooner we get there the better for nation, state and city.

A Fall Out of Hughes.

GOVERNOR HUGHES of New York is an able man, and he is able now and again to make a huge mistake. He did so when, in regard to the income tax amendment, he indulged in a "pernicious abstraction," as Lincoln would have called it, that the power to tax all income bonds might be used by congress to invade and cripple the power of the states to issue and sell their bonds. It is true that it might, just as the tail of a comet might poison the earth, but the likelihood of it is no greater in the case of this power than in the case of the tail of the comet. Governor Fort, of New Jersey, in a special message to the legislature urging the approval of the amendment, takes up the objections of Governor Hughes and "eats 'em alive." That dignified and carefully reasoned but absurd and inconsequential message of Governor Hughes' will plague him hereafter.

Did He Look Like a Guggenheim?

THERE ARE INDICATIONS that the effort believed to be making, to which The California Weekly was first to call public attention, to unload upon the United States government the Copper River railroad elephant, may come to naught. At least there will be such a delay in granting plenary powers to a commission for acting in such cases as will give time for public discussion, and that was all this paper was striving for. It appears that the President's Seattle speech, commending such a policy in general terms, without special regard to the Copper River enterprise of course, was made the pretext for bringing forward this scheme to unload. Wonder who gave the President that hunch to make that speech! Did the fellow look like a Guggenheim?

The President's Chart.

Notwithstanding the President's disinclination to take the public into his confidence that public is gradually making itself acquainted with its President, his aims and methods and a better intimacy of understanding and community of feeling are not unlikely to result. Of course everything, or nearly everything, will depend upon results. Nothing succeeds like success or fails like failure.

The chart by which the President proposes to sail the ship of state is the last Republican national platform. He is proceeding upon the hypothesis that that platform constitutes the latest mandate from the American people. So it does, technically, as a lawyer would look at it, and the Taft administration is an administration of and by, if not for, lawyers; but public sentiment speaks oftener than once in four years and does not speak in clearest tones through political platforms. It talks into the atmosphere, like a Marconi transmitter, and those ears only that are attuned to the voice catch the sound and its significance.

When an issue is raised the President takes down the Republican platform of 1908 to see if it be nominated in that document. If not he has little concern for it. If it is there he sends for the party leaders in Congress and says to them: "Redeem that pledge. I am depending on you." Those leaders are not in favor of the reforms promised in the last Republican platform. They threw the platform into the lumber room as soon as the fly season was over. The President retrieved it and made it his chart for his administration. Will that chart suffice? On that issue depends the success or failure of the Taft administration unless, after having tried it out, he gets a newer, better and more progressive mandate from The People.

Marriage and Divorce In California.

The family and not the individual is generally held to be the unit of society. Unmarried folks do not count. If this be accepted as true, then whatever befalls the family befalls society as a whole and is of first consequence to all who care for their kind. Thanks to the painstaking work of Mr. Geo. D. Leslie we are able to lay before our readers this week the best available statistical information in relation to marriage in California as compared with marriage in the United States as a whole. The article may not prove of thrilling interest to the superficial, but those who really care for God's greatest human institution, and for the fair name and fame of their state, will find the article deeply significant. Let it be remembered that the attitude of the United States as a whole toward the marriage relation constitutes one of our national humiliations. With this in mind the unfavorable comparison between California as a whole and the United States as a whole becomes of deep concern to us all. This is not saying that California, in respect to marriage and divorce, is the worst state in the Union. That undesirable preeminence is not ours, but we have need enough to take the issue in hand that we may see what, if anything, may be done to elevate the marriage relation to a higher plane. We have not, in our ideals, exalted the social unit in the measure of its deserts.

The Speculators' Opportunity.

If we take the quotations on Wall street of the entire listed stocks for the first week in February 1910 and compare them with the highest quoted prices of the same stocks at any time during 1909, we shall find that there has been a shrinkage of value amounting in the aggregate to fully a billion and half of dollars. That represents paper wealth to be sure, but it represents wealth none the less. For instance, whoever held shares in the Union Pacific railroad could have sold them at some time during 1909 for $219 each, whereas, during the first week of this month, he could have obtained no more than $181.50, a shrinkage of $37.50 per share.

Many guesses have been made in attempts to account for this tremendous shrinkage of paper values. Some think it wholly artificial and calculated to influence the President and congress against strengthening the anti-trust law or in favor of weakening it. It is thought that it may have been employed also as notice to the supreme court of the United States to go slow in handling the Standard Oil and National Tobacco cases. It may be that the general discredit into which high finance has fallen in the estimation of public opinion has something to do with it. Whatever the reason may be, the fact remains that there has, during the past twelve months been an enormous fluctuation in the stock market.

That the cause is artificial if not political is made evident by the fact that business has steadily improved right through this period of stock fluctuation. Labor has been more generally employed than at any time since the artificial and political panic of 1907. Anyhow, there is little in it for those who keep their fingers out of the speculative trap to worry about. It has not touched the man who has not gambled in stocks, although it has probably made millionaires out of some of the speculators and paupers out of hundreds of others.

One solacing reflection is that the ups and downs of Wall street have not disturbed the President. If the demonstration was meant for him it has failed of its purpose. He called their bluff splendidly and admonished them that if their business activities were not being conducted in harmony with the law they will do well to conform them to the law without delay inasmuch as the administration will do all in its power to enforce the law. The President's warning was splendidly spoken and, whatever the effect upon high finance, the effect upon the public mind will be salutary. In fine, when, in his Lincoln-day address, the President spoke of the antitrust law he scored a tally if not a home run.

Butting Against the Wall.

Kicking against the pricks is proverbially a painful and profitless diversion, but not more so than the President will find butting his head against the tariff wall which Aldrich and Cannon built up. His defense of that measure will convince few beside himself and it opens the door to the fear that when these astute gentlemen hand him other gold bricks he will be unable to detect their bogus character. That tariff bill was bogus and the powers that made it refused to have it anything else than bogus, and the best thing the President can do about it is to taboo the whole subject until the issue can be reopened. Every time he goes to its defense he only confounds himself and his party.

These things are said without questioning the truth of the President's statement that the Aldrich tariff may be 2.94 per cent. ad valorem lower than the Dingley, but what is that? It is not what the country had its mouth made up for. It may also constitute a technical redemption of party pledges, but it does not constitute a practical. The party pledge has not only not been redeemed in good faith but congress refused to constitute a qualified commission of experts to make the needed investigations and gather data for applying the principles laid down in the Republican platform.

William Howard Taft blundered in that he did not swing the big stick early in the tariff campaign instead of ineffectually at its close, blundered when he signed the bill instead of returning it with his objections, blundered at Winona, Minnesota, when he at once defended the bill and apologized for it, and he blundered again in New York when, at the Lincoln memorial banquet, he returned to the defense of that iniquitous measure. The tariff issue will not be settled until it is settled right and that will be when schedules are revised as needed to meet changing conditions in all the markets of the world, and those conditions must be as certainly known to the tariff-making power as to commercial houses of the first class doing business in such markets. The present tariff was not the product of information but of log-rolling and bossism of the rankest order. The American people know these things to be true and nothing the President can say will make them unknow them.

Deadlock With the United Railroads.

The United Railroads has thrown down the gauntlet to San Francisco and it should be taken up with alacrity. It has served notice, in effect, that unless the city recedes from its purpose to construct the Geary street line no more extensions of the United Railroads system will be made except where immediately profitable, no improvements will be inaugurated in the service and the Sutter street line will not be operated to the ferry except under guarantee of exclusive possession of lower Market street.

It will be well for the city to "call that bluff." And this should be done notwithstanding the fact that prudent citizens are disinclined to enter upon a general system of municipal ownership. That burden ought not to be thrown upon government, but bourbonism will apparently be satisfied with nothing else. Its scoundrelism bids fair to make socialists of us all in our own despite lest a worse thing come upon us. The present great national unrest, the fruition of which no man can foresee, has no other cause than such as Mr. Calhoun is exemplifying here in San Francisco.

But it will be objected that the constitutional limitation upon voting bonds precludes such extension of the Geary street system as to make it a railroad system for San Francisco. Amend the constitution. San Francisco is not the only city that has reached the constitutional limit and is looking for a way to get over or around it. New York and Chicago are both considering whether or not municipal investments in income-producing properties should be included in the constitutional prohibition. It is proper that there should be a constitutional limitation upon expense, but why upon investment? If a bank will lend on the property of a person up to within 60 per cent. of its valuation, why not upon the property of a city? If upon a class "A" building belonging to a corporation, why not upon a street railroad or electric lighting plant belonging to a city? If Mr. Calhoun can bond his street railroad system for all it is worth why should San Francisco be denied the same privilege? Why should there be anything that a private corporation may do that a public corporation may not if it wants to?

The California Weekly willingly admits that a private corporation CAN handle such enterprise more cheaply and efficiently than a public corporation, but suppose it WON'T? What will a city of free-born American citizens do? Submit? Not if there be any real manhood in men.

Fortunately there is nothing in the nature of an investment safer or more permanent than a street car system in a growing and prosperous city. There is nothing else in the nature of a public utility where the risk is so slight and the profit so certain.

The Men of California will be generous in so amending the constitution of the state as to permit San Francisco to exceed its 15 per cent. limitation for the purpose of owning a municipal car system. They know how this city has been debauched by the United Railroads influence, how justice has been crushed and the laws flouted, and they know that there is no deliverance for the city except in its emancipation from corporate control. The issue may be put up to the manhood of this state without danger of a rebuff.

Dividends or Burial Permits.

Last week we spoke of a fear entertained that, when the casualty statistics for the last year came in from the railroads, they would be found to be very serious. There is further evidence at hand to the same effect. During July, August and September, in train accidents alone, the railroads of this country killed 193 persons and wounded 3,752. Other than train accidents added to those just given bring the total up to 852 killed and 19,241 injured. There is little doubt that when the figures for October, November and December come to hand they will make a still more serious showing. A great part of this killing and maiming is to be charged to scrimping the maintenance-of-way and the repair shops in order that dividends not rightfully earned might be paid, for no railroad that does not first put its track in order and its motive department in ship shape has any moral right to pay a dividend. Every dividend declared without such moral sanction has its equation expressed in burial permits, hospital charges, endurance of pain, loss of life or limb and, fortunately, in damage suits. Whoever knowingly votes to declare such a dividend is guilty of manslaughter and, sometime, somewhere, will answer to that charge. It is the pitilessness of greed that makes right-minded men hate it so. Nor were dividends of more than secondary consideration. That which went before dividends was the sustaining of the market quotations of railroad shares. Government cannot regulate all such details. Something apparently must be left to the consciences of men who haven't any.

Not Thrown Off On Heney.

Certain enemies of Francis J. Heney and of the public good are trying to make it appear that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, and progressive Republicans generally, have "thrown off on him," because they are not intending to make him their candidate for governor this time. It is no such thing. There is no other man in California whom progressive Republicans, in common with progressive Democrats, love so sincerely or would support so heartily as Francis J. Heney, as there is no other man in the state who deserves so well at their hands; but this does not imply that they must all join John-the-Baptist Boke in trying to force his nomination whether or no. Mr. Heney has been consulted in relation to the matter, not once but a hundred times, and his wishes have been deferred to much against the preferences of many. It is recognized, as explained in these columns some time since, that Mr. Heney is entitled to a rest, entitled to recover from the strain of having fought the devil with fire for three straight years, entitled to recoup his fortunes which he seriously impaired in years of public service without one farthing of recompense, entitled to make the people of the nation as well acquainted with him as the people of California are, that they may love him as well for the work he has done and for the enemies he has made. There has been no throwing off on Heney, but there has been a taking counsel with reason and judgment, justice and fair play with the result that Mr. Heney's wishes have been acceded to in great love and good faith. That's all.

Do These Things First.

Before raising the rate on second class matter the government should concern itself with what it is paying for the transportation of the mails. It is understood that the government pays the railroads from three to five times, and in some instances eight times, as much as the express companies are paying for the performance of essentially similar services under essentially similar conditions. If this be so, and the government can ascertain the fact, it is either because the express companies have more influence with the railroads than the government has or because the railroads have more influence with the government than the people have. Both of these alternatives may be well founded.

Pay the railroads what the express companies pay them for a similar service, abolish the franking privilege and suffer those who want public documents to advance the postage on them, permit the rural routes to do a parcels post business, suffer the government to pay its own postage as the states do and then, if there is a deficiency in postal receipts to meet postal expenses, The California Weekly will stand an increase in postage rates without complaint.

Being neither a graven image nor a stone post, but a conscientious, justice loving judge, it must be hard for Judge W. P. Lawlor to witness from his high position the attempt to bring to naught all the efforts that have been made to fetch malefactors of great wealth to deserved punishment for their crimes. He has heard the evidence over and over, has looked into the faces of the witnesses day after day and, not being bereft of his senses, he knows that the accused are guilty, not only guilty of the crimes with which they are charged but guilty of the greater crime of crushing the law and of making the temple of justice a den of conspirators against the public welfare. But he can no more make a reluctant district attorney prosecute effectively than he can make a reluctant bird sing or an unthirsty horse drink. Except the attorney general of the state intervene there seems to be nothing for it but to let the unconvicted felons go unwhipped of justice, save as they shall walk to their graves in the shadow of the condemnation of all right-thinking people. Verily, the position of Judge Lawlor is a trying one, but whatever transpires the public will hold him guiltless of any miscarriage of justice.

"We Shall Win."

In a letter to a friend in San Francisco Gifford Pinchot writes: "Now that the lines are being clearly drawn between the special interests and the rest of us in the fight for conservation and the square deal we shall win, for the people are on our side. What has happened to me is of no consequence except as it will help us to win." Gifford Pinchot may be what Joe Cannon recently declared him to be, an uncomfortable subordinate, but the American people take great comfort in the fact that he is to lead the forces for conservation and the square deal. It gives us all courage to believe with him that, "We shall win."

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

It was the Persian philosopher, Hafiz, living half a dozen centuries ago, who declared that, "On the neck of the young man there sparkles no gem so gracious as enterprise." Without enterprise the world is dead or so inert as to move tardily, but the fire of enterprise, when once it has been kindled, well, nobody can foreknow in what the conflagration will result. It is a terrible passion to arouse in a man, and if he does not hold the impulse in leash it may lead him whither he would not go.

There is nothing that whets enterprise to so keen an edge as competition. From childhood to age we are all of us striving to excel someone else in something, or if we are not it is because we are so much dead timber, just human punk encumbering the earth. What is the spirit that enters into every game that ever was played if it be not that of competition, rivalry, trying to beat someone else at doing something? Without that spirit there would be no such thing as play, and without play the child would never make a man.

And yet what a terrible thing this same competition is if it gets away from us, if it be left to do its unhindered worst! Within the past week a great suit at law has been argued at Chicago. The point at issue was the constitutionality of a law limiting to ten the hours which a wage-earning woman may work in a day. Without such a law many employers will force their woman workers to toil for twelve or fourteen hours a day, and their excuse for the barbarism is that competition forces it upon them, that they must exact that number of hours of toil because other employers do it. The women complain, too, that unless they are permitted to toil twelve or fourteen hours per day the pay they receive per hour will not furnish a livelihood.

This, then, is what the twin blessings of enterprise and competition, blessings without which the world would be dead and poverty universal, if they were suffered to do their unhindered worst, would mete out to the toiling mothers of the children of men. It is costing years of time and effort to so control these splendid forces as to prevent their injuring, if not destroying, the race, and yet the race would be as inevitably destroyed without them.

Over against these innate forces, these fundamental impulses of our nature, God-given, every one of them, we must learn to set in wholesome check certain other God-given forces and impulses to see that the first do not carry us too far. The doctrine that we must suffer these fundamental forces to work out their unhindered wills is false doctrine. Above and beyond them all, master of them, if it cares to exercise its mastery, is the unconquerable soul of man. That soul is responsible to no force, to no impulse, to no innate tendency, but only to the God who made it, and that God will some day, somewhere, force that soul to give an account of its stewardship. For the hardships it has suffered to be inflicted upon the helpless, "competition" will afford a poor excuse and "enterprise" will serve no better.

Here, then, is a truth which we must all learn, as individuals, communities, states, nations—that the soul is indomitable, triumphant, that it can and must control all things for the common good. We can prevent an overreaching spirit of enterprise making us industrial slave drivers. We can prevent our competition driving some one else to destruction. We can prevent competition and enterprise forcing women to toil so many hours each day that they are no longer fit to become mothers of American citizens. And, too, we must prevent children being driven, by these same unrestrained impulses, to forfeit their childhood to become little, old pack animals. That obligation is upon us and our children forever. No excuse can divest us of that responsibility.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Cost of That "Object Lesson."

Report which bears considerable semblance of truth, has it that the recent panic in Wall street was manipulated by "the interest" as an object lesson to President Taft, so as to give him an understanding of what might happen to the country if the affairs and methods of the higher-ups were in any way disturbed. Supposing this to be the case, it is of interest to note just what was the cost of this little object lesson. This may be done by comparing the prices of leading stocks during the panic with the higher recent prices of the same stocks. For example, the shrinkage in prices of United States steel common was, in round numbers, $86,000,000; in Union Pacific common, $81,000,000; in Pennsylvania railroad, $82,000,000, or a fall of about a quarter of a billion dollars in just three stocks. In thirty-two railroads and twenty-nine industrial stocks there was a slump of $1,307,800,000, and this latter loss, every cent of which was stood by some people somewhere, was what the object lesson cost. It is to be hoped that President Taft appreciated the lesson, and it is even more to be hoped that its moral was clear to him, for it certainly is this: There is no man, or set of men, in whose hands should be placed such power to make or unmake the welfare of the people of this or any other nation.

Wages and Cost of Living in Germany.

The Germany Journal of Social Science, in an attempt to demonstrate the benefit of the protective tariff to working men presents some statistics which might be looked upon with disfavor by an ardent protectionist as not attaining the end desired. But, however one may look upon them, here they are: The Journal contends that wages in general have been largely advanced during the last fifteen years, and cites, as representative instances, the increase in wages of bricklayers from eight to thirteen cents an hour, or 62½ per cent.; in woodworkers' wages from $4.50 to $6.10 a week, or 35½ per cent.; in printers' wages from $5 to $6 a week, or 20 per cent. In these and many other trades there has been an average increase of perhaps 40 or 50 per cent., and there has been more or less of a reduction in the number of hours of labor, which, of course, does not increase the income. All of the foregoing must sound gratifying to any working man, but the Journal kills this effect of it later by admitting that in the same time the cost of household necessities has increased by 100 to 127 per cent. So it appears that the workman's salary lacks from 50 to 87 per cent. of having kept pace with the cost of his living. Perhaps the Journal should try again; its first demonstration seems to prove too much.

And Still the Unwashed Come.

How much heaven does it require to leaven the whole lump? Or, if the lump is fortunate, is it probable that it will succeed in leavening the leaven? These questions become pertinent in view of certain facts relating to immigration, recently disclosed, which follow: During the seven years terminating June 30, 1909, 6,617,155 aliens came to this country, and more than 70 per cent. of these were from southern and eastern Europe and western Asia, principally consisting of southern Italians, Greeks, Hungarians, Roumanians, Slavs, Bulgarians, Turks, Armenians and Syrians. About 4,500,000 of our immigrants came from these countries during these seven years, or fully a third more than would be required to populate the three great Pacific states of California, Oregon and Washington as densely as they now are populated. Now, saying nothing about the quality of this leaven, the original questions recur, and Americans who care for their country will do very well to consider them.

Low Rate of Birth in France.

Charles Turquot, writing in Je Sais Tout, a Parisian journal, predicts that at the present low rate of increase of population France will occupy in 1950 the lowest place among the greater powers, adding that Von Moltke spoke but the truth when he said, "the French lose a battle every day." According to the statistics of the last five years, says Turquot, the population of France has increased but 330,000, while that of Germany has increased by 4,000,000, or in a ratio of seven to one. Again, he calls attention to the fact that while the military forces of France in 1870 were just about equal to those of Germany, the latter nation at the present time could put in the field twice as many men as could France. The low birth rate is responsible for this condition. For example, in the Cote d'Or department, during the last six months of last year, there were 2,843 births and 3,959 deaths, and in the department of Yonne there were 2,382 births and 3,627 deaths. So it will be seen that in the contest between Life and Death in these two rich departments the grim spirit has about 46 per cent. the better of it, and in varying degrees the rule is the same throughout France. Turquot suggests no remedy unless one be implied in his contention that French parents are too desirous to provide well financially for their progeny, so desirous, indeed, that they limit the number of them too closely.

Chicago to Vote on Saloon Question.

Something of a phenomenon in a political way will be witnessed in Chicago next April when the electors of that city vote on the question of putting the saloons of that city out of business, for this perhaps will be the first time in the history of mankind that so great a city has taken such a step. The situation is due to the initiative clause of the charter, under the terms of which a petition signed by 61,000 voters necessitates an election. The antagonists of the saloons have secured a petition with 74,805 signatures, and from this time the war will go merrily on. As the first step in such a war the liquor men's organization is about to investigate every signature in the hope that enough illegal ones may be found to invalidate the petition. As they would have to throw out about one-fifth of the entire number, however, it is not probable that this step will be successful. In the event that it is not, President Knude of the Liquor Dealers' Protective Association promises to "put up a campaign that will help to demonstrate that Chicago will forever have saloons," and he adds, "The dries will be beaten at least three to one at the polls." If the election is a fair one, it is probable that neither side will be defeated by any such majority as he suggests, but neither is there any probability that Chicago will go dry.

A Potpourri of Diamond Information.

As most people know, the most important diamond fields of the world are found in South Africa, Brazil having lost that distinction many years ago. Less people know that the entire annual output of the South African mines is but about a half of a ton annually, or, say, as much as the old family horse could easily carry away in a "democrat" wagon. As the half ton, however, would be worth about $15,000,000, it would be a very interesting haul for the old horse, or its owner. It is now claimed that another diamond field, possibly to rival that of South Africa, may be developed in Liberia, quite a number of fine gems having been found in the blue clay of that country. By the way, speaking of diamonds, it may be mentioned that the proper way to wear them during Lent, as the most recherche authorities inform us, is as a diamond cross set in platinum. The most pious length for the cross is three or four inches, and any other setting than platinum might cast a doubt upon the religion of the wearer. At least, thus our fashionable authority appears to view the matter, and what a travesty of genuine religion it is!

The Guinea Is "Gentleman's Money."

A British guinea is twenty-one shillings, a pound is twenty shillings. This distinction, amounting to about what would be a two-bit piece in California, is not wide, but the distinction that the Briton makes between the two is wider. In his usage the guinea is

"gentleman's money," while the pound is "common people's money." To illustrate, professional men are paid in guineas, trades people and laborers in pounds. An artist must be paid in guineas, but the man who sells him his paints is paid in pounds. A barrister is paid in guineas, and so is a physician; so also is a dentist, unless he is a particularly bad dentist.

Students at German Universities.

There were matriculated at the universities of Germany this season 52,456 students, and of this number 1,856 were women. This does not look like much of a showing for the women, but when it is considered that it is a gain of 748 since last year, it is evident that our German sisters are preparing to join in the worldwide forward movement of their sex.

Poe's Tales and Poems.

A too-impassioned spirit housed in a sickly and inadequate body—such was Edgar Allan Poe. His naturally vigorous imagination, like his body, was always ill, and so it produced, instead of visions of symmetry and beauty, monstrous shapes of decaying loveliness, trembling on the verge of death.

But, weird and unwholesome as these visions are, they glow darkly with the smouldering fire of genius. Poe's stories are the pathological phenomena of invalidism translated into narrative and verse. They are moods and pains personified in characters and songs. And the complete success of this translation and this personification is the triumph of his genius, for the successful translation of moods into words that exactly reproduce those moods in the reader's spirit is one of the most difficult feats of literary art.

Poe has done this, with what power every one realizes who has begun one of his stories, followed it against his own will, shaken by its horror, to the startling and crushing climax, and laid it down, to find himself still enveloped in the weird, unearthly atmosphere of his sickly dream. No matter that the story is unreal, improbable, impossible—the illusion is complete, and whether you will or no you are swallowed up in its mazes and rush on with him through the dank meadows where clouds lower and bats' wings brush your face and sad eyes peer at you from the thickening gloom, toward the sullen glow of the dying sun that will sink and leave you lost, terror-stricken, to sink in the mire of horror he has led you to.

The poems are the same moods, set to music. Pain, disease, the decay that mutilates all beauty and violates all love, the horrors of approaching dissolution, the sweat of the death agony, the sultry flame that flickers in the eyes of the dying—these are the subjects of his songs. And their power lies here, that he who writes of these things finds them more terrible because he loves their victims with all the force of all his passionate heart: the loveliness of feminine beauty and character—how loveable, and how terrible that worms shall feed upon it; the godlike powers of the human mind—how sublime, and how horrible to know that death shall triumph over it; sweet music—how it lifts the soul, and how desolating to know that it must cease and that the soul must fail at last to vibrate in harmony with it!

Wonderful genius! Yet how supremely tragic that it had no philosophy profound enough to give it hope. Think what Poe might have written—the master of moods and music in words—if his spirit could have found the "balm in Gilead" which it prayed for in "The Raven."

STORIES OF PRESIDENT ELIOT.

Press an old Harvard man for some striking characteristic of former President Eliot, and he is likely to tell you it's polar coldness, says the New York Sun. Never in his long career at the head of Harvard was he known to approach anything in the least resembling personal relations with a student, or even with members of the faculty. He took things in the abstract. To illustrate this characteristic, let the Old Harvard Man tell a yarn or two.

It chanced some years ago that Harvard had what was admittedly the better football team as compared with her time-honored rival, Yale. But in spite of this physical superiority, "Yale luck" won the annual game. As the throng rolled out of Soldiers' Field the Old Harvard Man happened to fall in with the then President Eliot.

"A most disappointing contest," remarked the Old Harvard Man.

"Oh, not at all," replied Dr. Eliot. "The winning or losing of the game is of little consequence. The important point is the fact that it was a clean game."

Another year and Harvard triumphed over her old foe, and great was the rejoicing. Headed by a brass band, every loyal Harvard man in Cambridge fell in line and marched, singing the old songs and howling their triumph. When the head of the procession reached the residence of President Eliot a halt was called, and loud shouts proclaimed the demand of a speech from him.

Presently he appeared on his piazza and gave utterance to about these words:

"Much as we are to be congratulated on the victory of to-day, young gentlemen, I can't see any occasion for unusual celebration. The fact is, the most remarkable thing about the game was the splendid rally Yale made at the close."

The brass band silently departed and the 3,000 celebrants melted into the night.

Californian Poets' Corner

THE LOST DAWN.

By Virna Woods.

Miss Virna Woods, the writer of this poem, was a teacher in Sacramento, where she died several years since. She was the author of several plays, which were staged, but her best known work was a dramatic poem, The Amazons, which received a high circumlocution from no less a person than William L. Gladstone.

We look to-day in the olden places
Of storied woodlands, and find no traces
Of all the mystical, dreamful races.
Of lovely nymphs and the bacchanal brood;
The streams that slip to the ocean glisten
As fair as then, but we vainly listen
For a naiad-voice in the solitude.

No more from thicket and leafy hollow
The merry satyrs and dryads follow
The sweet-stringed lyre of the glad Apollo.
Or Pan who pipes on a tuncful reed;
No oreads sport on the sun-lit mountains,
Nor naiads peep from the bubbling fountains.
While fauns through the rustling forests Speed.

The empty altars in temples olden,
The crumbling and unwreathed statues golden,
The niches where silence and dust embolden
The spider to weave her fragile thread;
Are the only symbols of haunts forsaken,
Where the struggling beams of the morning
Waken
No happy sound from the centuries dead.

The light of the sun at mid-day scorches
The faded vine in the crumbling porches,
Where of old, at even, the marriage torches
Blazed fitfully on the marble walls;
And yonder temple is but a ruin
For modern lovers to sigh and woo in.
'Neath figures of dancing bacchantals.

For foreign hatred and inner malice
Have spilled the wine from the altar chalice,
And dimmed the splendor of hall and palace,
And stilled the hymns that were loud and Sweet;
The night of doom on the hill-tops darkens,
The Roman Forum no longer hearkens
The joyous measures of conquering feet

Time with his hapless soul unshriven,
By lightning led and by wild winds driven,
Travels the path by the stern Fates given.
As a barefoot pilgrim in the night,
Only old tales with the breath of roses,
Only the years' faint lamp discloses,
In glimpses and flashes his shadowy flight.

Slumber the gods in the old Pantheon;
Silent the prayer and hushed the paean;
Furled the sails of the fleet Aegean;
Spent the arrows and broken the shields,
Greece has perished and Rome has fallen;
Only the dust of their mighty pollen
Falls on the blossoms of fresher fields.

OF VERSATILE ENJOYMENTS.

Two people reading the same book may enjoy it for very different reasons. A cowboy, for instance, would enjoy Owen Wister's "Virginian" for its shrewd depiction of scenes familiar to him, while a New Yorker enjoys it for its suggestive picture of something pleasingly unfamiliar to him.

This versatility of enjoyments in reading may be described according to other orders, however. Readers of different ages enjoy the same book for different reasons, the young reader for the exciting plot and incidents, the old reader for the accuracy of character drawing and for the marks of experience in life. Another order of varying enjoyments is according to tastes. A student of history finds Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities" to his liking because it presents a vivid picture of the social conditions of a historical epoch, while a psychologist finds it a document in evidence for his theories of insanity and of mob action.

And this versatility of enjoyment is one of the tests of greatness in literature. Shakespeare is supreme partly because his works are suggestive to more types of mind and taste and interest than the works of any other writer. He has history for the historian, pathology for the doctor, games for the athlete, music for the musician, botany for the naturalist, morals for the clergymen, metaphysics for the philosopher, and many things for many others. And, for all readers, of all tastes, he has always an absorbing story, simple enough for the simplest mind to grasp and become interested in, and profound enough to test the intellectual capacity of the most learned and the most nimble-witted. Ruskin once said that the intellectual measure of every man since Shakespeare may be taken exactly by his comprehension of Shakespeare.

And, as one grows older, these refinements of enjoyment in reading become increasingly necessary to the habitual reader. After one has taken his fill of enjoyment in the mere unfolding of a fiction and has come to realize that new plots are few, he falls back upon an appreciation of skill in character drawing. After a time, this resource partly fails. He begins to recognize a common source of human nature, certain general classifications of human types, as the basis of nearly all characters. Then comes a search for other sources of enjoyment. These are many: skill in the choice of words, sonorous rounding of phrases, full of charm as well as sense, musical cadences, aptness of epigram, relations of truth to truth. Few of us, men at least, have the abounding spirit of youth, persisting to old age, such as the late Senator Hoar had, who enjoyed dime novels to his dying hour.

But the most copious reader is never without further resources of enjoyment. If he exhaust one literature, there are ten others; if he drain the pleasures of one period, there are other ages, written of in other veins; if the pleasures of emotion be dry, there are pleasures of the intellect. Such are the inexhaustible variety of the riches of books that no man need ever feel ennui or too much plenty in their company.

But the wise reader will conserve his own resources of spirit for enjoyment in books. Too much fiction deadens the springs of emotion. Too much dry reading deadens the resiliency of the mind. Mix the two. When poetry cloy, read Bacon's Essays. When Mill's Logic wearies, read the Waverley novels. Take water with the bread, wine with the water, meat with the wine. All the courses of a full meal are enjoyable. And a little rest between meals does no harm. Blessed books! guides to living, relief from life, monuments to truth and beauty, friends and intimate companions!

Miss Bateman-Hunter, of the New Theatre, New York, is probably the youngest woman to play the part of Olivia in any production. Although she is only seventeen, she has played equally important roles, having appeared in London as Lady Teazle in "The School for Scandal."

MAKING BETTER DOCTORS

AND AN OPPORTUNITY TO PROLONG THOUSANDS OF HUMAN LIVES

The old-fashioned doctor was a grand old man, and he did the best he knew and served his generation nobly. But he realized always that his education was seamed with great gulfs of ignorance and cramped by inadequate facilities for learning even the best that was then known in the science. He dreamed of the knowledge that is possessed by the modern doctor and of the facilities that are opened to modern students, and would have given his heart to have enjoyed them.

Recall how the old-fashioned doctor learned his profession. The only medical schools in existence were those owned and operated privately by groups of practicing physicians who each took an hour or two a day from his arduous professional duties to lecture to the young men on anatomy, physiology and therapeutics. These colleges were money-making institutions, supported by and making a profit from the tuition fees of the students. They graduated men who knew the theory of anatomy and physiology well enough, and so much of practical surgery and medicine as could be illustrated in the clinics. But of the practical treatment of that miscellaneous aggregation of diseases and problems that make up a doctor's routine work they had only the vaguest notion. It was a familiar sensation for a newly graduated doctor to approach his first maternity case, for instance, in a state of panic because, while he knew the theory of this relatively simple case perfectly well and had passed brilliant examinations on it, he had never seen a case actually handled and would have been abashed in the presence of an experienced midwife who could not tell the difference between a cancer and a bunion.

In one sense, however, these colleges served their day fairly well because, to tell the truth, there was not a vast deal of exact medical knowledge in existence. These colleges were competent to teach what was known, and their most serious deficiency lay in the lack of facilities for studying actual cases under hospital conditions.

But a great revolution was suddenly wrought in the science of medicine. A scientist, who was not a doctor at all, made some studies of crystallization that led him into researches into the causes of fermentation. In the course of these studies he came upon the explanation of the phenomenon of immunity in contagious diseases, and Louis Pasteur became the father of the anti-toxin, or serum, treatment of such infective diseases as rabies. But, more, his scientific explanation of the reason for the success of the serum treatment opened up a long avenue of future applications of his method, resulting in such discoveries as the diphtheria anti-toxin by Behring, and the anti-toxin for meningitis by Flexner. And, still more, it brought about the evolution of a new type of scientific medical research, prosecuted by scientists who were quite independent of medical practice for their livelihood, whose whole time was devoted to laboratory experiments for the sole purpose of increasing the store of exact knowledge of the human body and its ailments. It is from the work of these men that the knowledge of the modern doctor is drawn for his increasingly efficient warfare against disease.

This revolution in medicine threw the old-fashioned medical schools completely out of joint with the times. They had been technical schools with the sole purpose of turning out skilled practitioners. The new science of medicine made it necessary that a doctor should be more than a mere skilled mechanic; he must be a man with a broad culture and with a profound foundation in the philosophy of medical research. He must know chemistry, he must know physics, he must understand the mental processes that Pasteur used in his researches, he must have laboratories and microscopes, he must have access to hundreds of patients, so that he might understand the refinements of diagnosis that have grown up with completer knowledge of disease.

reasons. These things cost money, lots of money. Dr. Simon Flexner's researches, which resulted in the discovery of a treatment for meningitis that has reduced the mortality rate from 75 per cent, to less than 30 per cent, required laboratory equipment costing a million dollars and the whole time of several high-priced men for several years. Of course this laboratory equipment will not soon have to be duplicated, but its maintenance and the salaries of investigators are a heavy charge—far too heavy to be borne by private, money-making institutions.

The other reason for the failure of the old-fashioned college is this: that part of instruction which depends upon the study of actual cases at the bedside could not be given by it. The doctors of the faculty could not take their students with them from house to house; the public hospitals were open to them, but not in a way to give the instructors full charge of the patients; a money-making college could not afford to run a private hospital for the instruction of the pupils.

Then, in America at least, a university made a pioneer movement in the education of doctors. Johns Hopkins University, of Baltimore, put its medical department on exactly the same footing with other departments. Instead of retaining the services of active practitioners for a few hours a week, it got eminent men of medicine as instructors at salaries that commanded their entire time. Thus, the man in charge of the study of anatomy was a distinguished anatomist, who not only lectured and demonstrated at the clinics, but directed consecutive anatomical research work that constantly widened the horizon of knowledge in his specialty. The same was true of the study of physiology, of pathology, of bacteriology, and so on throughout the coordinate branches of medical science. In other words, Johns Hopkins put the instruction of medical students on a thoroughly sound basis of craftsmanship and added to that an inspiring atmosphere of scientific speculation and experimentation and research which resulted in the graduation of physicians who were scientists as well.

It did another thing. It added, as a part of its equipment—just as it would add a laboratory—a hospital where the advanced students had every facility for studying disease in the patient as well as in a book, and for carrying on constructive research in disease as well as practical therapeutics. This was possible for Johns Hopkins, with its vast financial resources, where it was impossible for the private medical schools.

The example of Johns Hopkins was soon followed by the better universities. And the wise private colleges promptly sought the protecting wing of affiliation with universities, to which they turned over their whole equipment.

This evolution by affiliation was worked out in the case of the old Toland Medical School, of San Francisco, which affiliated with the University of California a good many years ago. At first the regents of the University of California were slow to realize the tendency of the time in medical education, with the result that the "Affiliated" is still inadequately equipped in some respects.

But—and here is the point toward which this article has tended—the regents do now appreciate the necessity for a great improvement in its equipment, and the first steps in that improvement have been taken.

The two first years, of preparatory work, have been moved from San Francisco to the university at Berkeley, where the beginners are grounded in the foundation sciences of chemistry, physics, pathology, bacteriology, and the like, under the instruction of such men as Professor Jacques Loeb—soon to go to New York—who is eminent in biological research, who is in charge of the work in physiology; Dr. Alonzo Engelbert Taylor, in charge of the pathological work; and of assistant professor Robert O. Moody, in charge of the anatomical work. The instruction given by these men and their assistants makes possible the graduation, not only of modern physicians grounded in the philosophy of scientific medicine, but also of men who are trained to carry on research work independent of actual medical practice.

The development of the remaining side of the college's deficiencies is also in process. This is the hospital equipment. The California Hospital has about seventy-five beds, but only eleven of these are endowed so that cases can be accepted solely for their scientific interest and not mainly because of their pecuniary return. What is needed is to have all of the seventy-five beds endowed so that the whole number could be used for demonstration purposes by the professors in the actual handling of patients, and, more important, for that research work which vastly increases the power of the whole profession for all future time. This would entail too large an expense to be borne by the university, for the maintenance of every bed represents the interest upon about $10,000. So the endowment of these beds must be achieved by private gifts. The eleven free beds have been thus endowed. The endowment of the remainder offers a magnificent opportunity for the exercise of a noble and most useful philanthropy.

Such a hospital would mean that, after the students had been grounded in the theory of medicine and in medical research under the instruction of state-paid scientists and in state-maintained laboratories, they could round out their course under practical conditions that would double their efficiency.

And to the state of California this would mean that her doctors would have a training equal to the best offered in the East; that thousands of lives would be saved; that millions of dollars now lost in human inefficiency would be saved; that specialists would be developed from whom to draw sanitary engineers for the protection of the public health by the prevention of disease; that California would, in time, make a name in the scientific world through its research workers. This is the alluring goal toward which the faculty of the California State College of Medicine is working, and to realize which is needed the aid of wealthy patrons of the sciences. Here is an opportunity for a Californian—or for several Californians—to perform a service that will carry their names down to grateful future generations, for this is an opportunity to widen the horizon of medical knowledge in a way that will aid forever to prevent disease, to alleviate suffering, and to wipe out from the world some of the worst enemies of human happiness.

PERSONALIA.

Robert W. Chambers, Richard Harding Davis, Jack London, O. Henry, Booth Tarkington, John Fox, Jr., Owen Wister, and Mrs. Burnett each receive $1,000 apiece for short stories.

The New York newspapers are almost unanimous in the opinion that the new play, "Just a Wife," by Eugene Walter, author of "Paid in Full" and "The Easiest Way," is not up to his earlier standard.

A monument to Johann Strauss, the "waltz king," is to be placed in Vienna. It will be in the form of a pergola, in the center of which will be a statue of heroic size, representing Strauss with his violin.

Dr. F. J. Furnivall, the famous Shakespearean scholar, founder of numerous literary societies, antiquarian of repute, and athlete of some note, who recently completed his eighty-fifth year, took part the other day in a rowing match over a thirteen-mile course.

Elbert Hubbard has found his appropriate level at last. The "Fra," so Manager Martin Beck announces, is to enter vaudeville at the Majestic theater in Chicago on Monday, March 14. He will appear twice daily in what he calls "Heart to Heart Talks," which will be changed from time to time.

A course in writing poetry is to be given at the university of Missouri. It will be under the direction of Dr. R. H. Miller of the English department, it is announced. A prize of $100 for the best poem has been offered for several years at the university but no poem regarded as of sufficient merit to win the prize has been submitted by a student.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Dig, You Duffer, Dig!

It is dig, you duffer, dig!
There is nothing fine or big
That a mortal e'er accomplished just by idly sitting round,
And the chap who wins the prize
Is the one that really tries,
Not the loafer on the corner, as you've noticed, I'll be bound.

Dig, you duffer! Life's a race
Where the steadfast set the pace,
And the one who stops to dawdle is the one who's left behind,
Genius, talent, wit and might,
I have seen them distanced quite,
Just because they lacked persistence of the upward-plodding kind.

Dig, you duffer! Never mind
If you note you're far behind.
Just keep plodding, plodding ever, and it's certain you will gain,
Gain upon the ones who "buck,"
Or who trust their fate to luck,
For 'tis but by constant climbing that the summit men attain.

It is dig, you duffer, dig!
Play the game, and don't renig;
Play your deuces like the aces, never wincing
as they fall.
Play, and play your very best,
Knowing well that here's the test:
He was often heavy-hearted, but he faltered not at all.

You—

Are the exact center of your universe;
About that center, which is you, swings every star, circles every planet, and wanders every comet in the limitless realms of space;
You can make that center a place of happiness,

Or a cave of gloom;
A home of joy,
Or a haunt of misery;
A haven of love,
Or a den of hate.
In brief, my brother and sister, it is up to
You,
And all that you are and that you ever will be is determined by
You.

Wherefore, whatever you may attain in the end, the praise or the blame for it belongs to You.

And whether the foregoing is, or is not, encouraging to
You
Depends on
You.

A Disturbed Dream.

"I dreamed a dream," said the sad-eyed Visionary.

"You did?" said I.
"You bet I did!" was his somewhat crude response. "It was the Taylor administration, and everything was a credit to the Beaux Arts. I was especially delighted by the municipal band, the entrancing melodies of which were calculated to make Real Art sit up and take notice. Charmed and fascinated,
I would listen to its silvery strains by the hour. Alas! the McCarthy administration came in."

"Why do you say 'alas'?" I inquired.
"Why, McCarthy dismissed the bass-drumbeater and the trombone-player, and it interfered with the harmony."

"Why did he do it?"
"Well, all I know is that he said they wouldn't be needed now that he is in office.
What do you suppose he meant?"

"You'd better ask the school board," said I.
"Which one?" said he.

And, not having heard from court that morning, how could I answer him intelligently?

The Opinions of Rufus.

Take all good of all religions, Elnathan, an' you'll find that a man who long ago had not where to lay his head biled it down in jest three words, "Love one another."

Some people ought to ricollect that they's seeh a thing es a dog's barkin' so much es to make it not worth a dern fer a watchdog.

Melissy Briggs said she'd like well 'nough to move in high s'ciety ef 'twan't that she's so fond of Jabez that she'd kind o' hate to git a divorce frum him.

Ever stop to reflect that probly the main reason you condemn Mohammedanism is 'cause you wan't born in Turkey or Arabia?

Probly you b'lieve in singin', but don't you feel a yearnin' impulse to draw a line when you can't tell whether it's your neighbor's daughter or his cat?

Es I understand it, a fashionable church is a place where sinful saints meet to praise, worship an' wear their best clothes.

Love laughs at locksmiths, but it's no special credit to it, for so do burglars.

Some patryotic Californian ought to tell our women that wear furs on top an' gauze stockin's below that our glorious climate is s'posed to extend more'n two feet frum the ground.

The world's trophy of success too generly is jest gilded to 'low it to average very valu'ble.

I reckon the heaviest load a man can carry in this world is a perpetual grouch.

Asa Peebles says he'd like to see if a sun rise is es pretty es poets say, but that he reely hates to set up all night to do it.

Don't Overwork the Child's Mind.

In a latter recently addressed to the educators of California by State Superintendent of Public Instruction Edward Hyatt, he urges that home studying should be discouraged, as it tends to overwork a child's mind.

This is by way of an amen to that utterance.
It does, indeed, seem strange—to me, at least —that intelligent educators should so have yielded to the cram-it-in system of instruction that such an utterance is necessary, but it is not the less necessary on that account.
Dullard or "infant prodigy," just so much education must every child receive in a given time, and if the child be mentally slow, so that he must work eight or ten hours in a day to secure his slice off the educational loaf, so much the worse for the child—the cram-it-in system must be followed, anyway.

Within the walls of our public schools a pupil performs six hours of almost unbroken mental labor daily, this while his mind is in the formative stage and his body requires much exercise for its proper development.
These six hours are enough; if any of you whose minds are formed doubt it, select some pleasant day, put in six hours at hard mental work, and see if you will not feel that you have another guess coming. The daily limit for good mental work does not overreach six hours, at any rate.

Seven, eight or ten hours of hard mental toil in a day does not kill all children, but there is none of us who does not know that it kills some. It does not destroy all intellects, but it destroys some, and I am not at all certain that it does not in some degree injure all. Superintendent Hyatt's word was well spoken, and it should be heeded, but the advocates of the cram-it-in system are hard to budge.

Get Somethin', Anyway.

Get somethin', anyway,
For every load you heft,
For when you get nothin' else
You're certain to get left.

The Stubbins Family and Economy.

In these piping times of holding companies when the price of nearly everything has gone up, the Stubbins family feels the necessity of economy, but it has not yet begun to economize, because it struck a rock in the very inception of the idea. In the first place Mrs.
Stubbins had a happy idea, which is woman's prerogative.

"I will tell you, William," she said, "you know how much I love you, how dear you are to me, yet I feel that in these strenuous times we should be glad to make any sacrifice, to exercise any economy, for the welfare of our family. I am sure that you agree with me, and so—so—that is, how do you think it would do for us—you know how fondly I suggest it, William—for us to give up your smoking?"

"Mary," said Mr. Stubbins, "I appreciate your thoughtful consideration for the family, and you know how fully your tender love for me is returned. Like you, my darling, I feel that we should economize. In this matter, we must stand together, sacrifice together, Mary, and so let us resolutely make up our minds that we will—yes, though it hurts us, my dear —we will give up your new spring hat and gown."

So the matter still stands. Mr. Stubbins says that he might endure it for himself, but that he cannot bear to see his wife give up his smoking for her, and Mrs. Stubbins says she would sacrifice almost anything for William, but that she cannot bring herself to permit him to give up her new spring gown and hat for him. Each admits that he loves the other too well to permit him thus to sacrifice.

Such is marital devotion, and unless the loving couple can decide on some manner in which the children can economize, I am afraid that their era of economy will not soon arrive.

The Poet Is Heard From.

The pale, cadaverous man who came into the office admitted that he was a poet. "I can't help it," he added, "for Fate often is unkind, but we must heed her fiat."

After he had wept a few moments, he continued, "I felt impelled to dash off the little thing which I will read to you."

I attempted to dash off, myself, but he headed me off with the following:

The American eagle soared on high,
As is the eagle's fashion.

Says he, "I'm monarch of the sky,
Which you can place your cash on;"

But then the eagle wept, you bet,
For price of food flew higher yet.

And left the eagle in a pet,
A really shocking passion.

"That's a good one," said I, "and its chief beauty is its brev—"

"The second verse goes like this," said the Poet.

Great Georgie cut his father's tree.

His father got his number,

And shouted, "George, explain to me
Why limbs the ground encumber!"

Great Georgie wept, "How could I ken,
Since trusts are yet unknown to men,

How high, in Nineten Hundred Ten
Would be the price of lumber?"

I could see that he was about to spring another verse, and so, in order to prevent it,
I appealed to his poetic longings.

"Let's go down stairs and take something," said I.

Thus was the day saved

When you're low you upward spring.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Yes, I am very much pleased with The California Weekly and am delighted to see it improving all the time.

Yours truly,
ALLEN H. SUGGETT.

San Francisco.

If our readers know of the things that The Staff have in mind for making The California Weekly better than it is, and how impatient they are to begin with them, they might become impatient also. It is something akin to the impatience with which an eighteen-year-old youth longs to be one-and-twenty and his own boss, but papers, like boys, have to grow and if the right minded public will stay with The California Weekly it will by and by become something of which the whole Pacific Coast may be proud.

The California Weekly.

Enclosed find check for ten copies of Graft Report. Just finished reading your last issue and think it the best yet. It gets better each issue. We value it more than any other periodical we have.

E. A. GAMMON.

Courtland, Cal.

As Collier's Weekly affirms, there is no estimating the good that a wide circulation of the Taylor Committee Report on the "Causes of Corruption in San Francisco" might result in and if all our readers would follow Mr. Gammon's example and order ten copies sent to ten thoughtful, influential persons somewhere in the United States, it does not matter much where, the essential facts of a great and significant event would become fixed in the public mind. That of itself would tend toward the purification of the municipal life of all cities, for human nature is not different in San Francisco from what it is in other cities. We mail these reports to addresses anywhere in the world on receipt of ten cents each, and nearly every one can afford to send five or ten copies.

I had not examined The California Weekly since shortly after its beginning. I read a copy to-day. Subscribing for it became at once a pleasurable civic duty.

E. O. JAMES.

Berkeley, Cal.

There is a moral obligation resting upon good citizenship to help to sustain, so far as one can, periodicals that stand for Right Things. Satan has a fat check book and an inexhaustible credit for sustaining the other kind of periodicals for the reason that wrongness is immediately financially profitable while rightness endures dividends long deferred but, we hope, cumulative. Therefore, sustaining The California Weekly should become a "pleasurable civic duty," to at least 10,000 persons in the bay district of California alone and to as many more elsewhere in the state.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—Yours of recent date inclosing statement of my account with the Weekly, is at hand, and as I cannot do without that valuable newspaper, I am inclosing my check for $2.00 with which to renew my subscription.

I am a Democrat, but the attitude of the Weekly on all political questions in which the people of California are interested, is so nearly like democratic doctrine that I am glad to encourage the dissemination of such doctrines, even though they are advocated by a republican journal, which, after the nominations have been made by the Republican party for state officers, will, whether the nominees be in accord with the Weekly or not, fall into line and support those nominated, no matter if they be named by railroad influences or not. If the Weekly would "stick to its guns," after the nominations are made, and if the nominees are railroad candidates, give support to the nominees of the Democratic party, if those nominees are not railroad candidates, I would feel much more cheerful in the support of your paper.

Very truly yours,

FRANK H. FARRAR.

Merced, Cal., February 10, 1910.

The California Weekly recognizes the truth that, in a republic government must be mainly by party and that, in the less essential affairs, personal preference must give way to party preference. The only alternative is government by faction and that means unstable government and a government that is unstable must be weak. The irreconcilable is a public menace. But there are issues which transcend party obligation. The emancipation of California from corporation rule is such an issue and The California Weekly does not intend, knowingly, to support any candidate for office named by, and under obligations to, the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company, be he Republican or Democrat. The right to scratch a ticket is divine and should be freely exercised when there is cause. The danger is that if corporate influence succeeds in naming a candidate of one party it will succeed also in naming the opposing candidate of the other party, for that influence does not wish that issue drawn if it can be avoided. It prefers the application of the "heads I win, tails you lose," principle. No, a free Democrat will look good to The California Weekly next fall if we find him opposed to a Republican under bond to the allied infamies and there are tens of thousands of voters to whom he will look equally good, if he be any good.

I think that all of your readers appreciate the fight you are making against the associated criminals on the coast.

Very respectfully,

GEO. F. McNOBLE.

Stockton, Cal.

We think so, too, but there are some tens of thousands of good people in California who should entertain a similar appreciation but who do not yet, and it is in interesting them that we want all our friends to help. Half a dozen right words said at the right time by a disinterested person go farther in the right direction than a whole chapter sent from this office to a stranger.

A. J. Pillsbury

and the Editorial Staff.

The paper is improving right along. The last number is great. Where all is so excellent it is not easy to choose the best, but I have particularly enjoyed "Serving God," "A Fable," "Political Table Talk," especially "State Controller Who Ought to Stay," and "The Legislative Record," etc. Where else can the people look for such a record? I talk about The California Weekly everywhere, and try to get subscribers. I hope the paper will be taken up by the people. It surely will be in time. I hope President Taft sees it. I wrote Senator Bristow that he ought to take it.

Yours truly,

EDW. P. FLINT.

Oakland, February 8, 1910.

The kind of work that Mr. Flint is doing for The California Weekly is the kind that counts. It costs nothing but a little effort, and remembering to put forth that effort at the psychological moment. In that way the human lump can be leavened in time, but the element of time is important to the enterprise. Therefore do it now, please, everybody.

Editor The California Weekly,
San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sir:—Anent your recent editorial, "Let the People Guess Again," and Bishop Bell's letter of January 28th, with your comments thereon, I find the following quoted in "The Homiletic Review" for the current month, page 128, from President A. T. Hadley, of Yale College:

"The private property in the United States, in spite of all the dangers of unintelligent legislation, is constitutionally in a stronger position, as against the government and the government authority, than is the case in any country of Europe. This is partly because the governmental means provided for the control or limitation of private property are weaker in America than elsewhere, but chiefly because the rights of property are more forcibly established in the constitution itself." (The bold face is mine.)

Surely a change is coming when the power of "vested pecuniary interests," controlled by corporations dictating to and directing the policies of government, will be dethroned and "the Rights of Man" will be enthroned. Your paper is nobly working towards that end.

JAMES N. WILLIAMS.

Pacific Grove, Cal., February 9, 1910.

The truth brought out in the discussion above referred to is not as firmly fixed in the public mind as it should be. Our government was founded upon the inviolability of property. It was felt that if property were made secure human rights could not be overthrown, but the hypothesis lacks verification, just as we have seen the right of freedom of contract result in the virtual subjugation of the weak by the rapacious. Property rights must be made and kept secure, but we need to elevate the Rights of Man to at least an equality with the rights of property and with the right of private contract. Society as a whole, out of the plenitude of its power, may fix a wage rate below which no one will be allowed to work, hours of labor which may not

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Johnson or Weinstock The inability of the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League readily to come to an agreement in relation to a candidate for governor is not because of any disagreement, any irreconcilable differences between the members. Judgments differ but partisanship scarcely exists. There are two issues involved: one of sound judgment and the other of the willingness of candidates to serve. By a process of elimination, self or by common consent, the preference held at the hour of going to press appears to have been narrowed down to a choice between Hiram Johnson and Harris Weinstock, each one desiring the other to run. Mr. Johnson feels that, out of consideration for his family, he ought not. Running for office of any kind has never entered into the calculations of Mr. Weinstock, who has retired from active business and, surrounded by his friends and his books, prefers his leisure and the opportunity which that leisure may afford him to lend a hand wherever the common good can be advantaged by it to holding any office. There the issue seems likely to rest until Saturday when the committee meets again to consult. If neither of these gentlemen will accept choice is likely to be made between Belshaw and Mott, both able men who carry good gubernatorial timber under their hats.

A Backhanded Compliment To Southern Intelligence

It is announced occasionally in newspapers which obtain most of their political information from the Burkes, Hattons and Lynches that "Los Angeles will claim the nomination for controller," to which is added the explanation that the reason for this is that the south wants two members of the State Board of Equalization and can only have them by securing the controller, who is a member ex-officio, in addition to the member for the district. This valuable pointer on the interests of the south and the way to serve them has been given out so regularly from the headquarters of the Southern Pacific machine that the thoughtful reader will begin to ask what the machine's interest is in the matter. If one could imagine a truthful answer being returned to that question, it would run like this: "Controller Nye? We don't want him, because he is not our kind, but we would prefer not to have it known that we are opposing him directly. It is a good deal better to go against him obliquely. So we will put up a man from the south who is entirely satisfactory to us and then persuade the south that it ought to vote for him on local grounds. Watch us make the sentiment which will assure the success of this scheme." Although the machine is a good deal bothered by the new direct primary law, it has by no means lost its cunning.

Railroad Districts

From 1879 to 1909 California marked time in railroad legislation. For twenty-nine straight years the statutes were unencumbered by anything in the way of railroad legislation that the railroads themselves did not approve, and for the reason that the railroad political influence so controlled the legislatures that nothing not to the railroad mind could get either in or out of any California legislature. But the political atmosphere has a different feel to it now and it is within the possibilities that a few new chapters may be written into the laws regarding the railroads of California. The latest addition, the Wright law, was a tantalization. It was a bluff and nothing more. If the reader desires to get hold of this subject from the right end let him orient himself as to what district he is in and then prepare to take a hand in the fight for the right kind of a commission. To begin with, then, the first district embraces all that part of California lying north of San Francisco bay, excepting Marin county, and north of the north lines of San Joaquin, Tuolumne and Mono counties. The third district takes in all of California lying south of San Francisco and the county lines above mentioned, except San Mateo county. The second district includes San Francisco, San Mateo and Marin counties and nothing more. Now you know what district you are in.

Eshleman Talked Of John M. Eshleman is being talked of as a candidate to be brought before the Republicans of the third district for nomination. Down south they get awake to these things quicker than we do up north, but we ought not to let them beat us much. It is important to get busy. John M. Eshleman began at the bottom rung of the ladder without health, wealth or education, but he came to California and went to work on a section gang where he got back his health and got enough money to start in at the State University for securing an education. Afterward he alternated between railroading and the university until he graduated from both with good rank in both. Then he studied law and Governor Pardee made him Deputy State Labor Commissioner, an office which he filled with credit to himself and honor to the administration that appointed him. He enforced the laws governing the employment of children with zeal and efficiency. He was elected to the assembly from Berkeley and, in 1907, made a brave and efficient fight for the anti-racetrack bill that became a law two years later. The session's work and bad weather nearly cost him his health again and he went to Imperial county to recover it, and did so. He took a hand in forming the new county and was elected district attorney. There he is now and may be found if the people call him. He is an all right man.

A Good Man Whoever Wins

The Democrats of Southern California likewise are preparing to put an unusually strong man in the field for the office of railroad commissioner from the third district. Sentiment in that party appears to have crystallized on Joseph H. Call, one of the strongest attorneys at the Los Angeles bar. "Joe" Call, as he is familiarly known, doubtless knows more about the transportation business than any other man in the West. For the past twenty years he has represented the United States government in the prosecution of land cases, and in that time has never lost a case. In many of these cases railroads were found to have special interests that needed protection, and as the result of his investigations Mr. Call possessed himself of information that would be of tremendous value in the administration of the affairs of the state railroad commission. He would be a hard man for even the best Republican to beat in the finals. One thing is certain: If Call should win out at the Democratic primaries the Republicans could not hope to defeat him unless they should succeed in securing the nomination of some man of the Eshleman type.

Theodore Summerland Would Like to Hold On

Theodore Summerland is the present commissioner from the third district. This may be news to some for he has been so modest in office that little has been heard from him and, besides, Walter Parker is responsible for him anyhow, having procured his nomination at the odoriferous Santa Cruz convention never to be forgotten. Mr. Summerland likes his job, notwithstanding that he feels that he is rather overworked and under appreciated. He will probably be the "organization" candidate before the Republicans of the district for renomination. Mr. Summerland feels that the fault is with the people rather than the commission, that people do not take the commission seriously or realize what it tries to do for them. But if he will stop to figure up what the people have paid to sustain that commission since its organization he will conclude that the people have taken the commission very seriously. If the commissioners had been anything more than chattels of the railroads they would have been knocking at the door of every legislature since 1879 asking for the legislation they needed, and showing why they wanted it, and they would not have gone away empty handed. That commission could have drawn the issue any time they wanted to and aroused the people to their support. Mr. Summerland has had his chance and should give place to another.

Walter Mallard The Likely Man

The southern part of the state will insist likewise upon the nomination of a capable, honest and efficient candidate for member of the State Board of Equalization for the fourth district, which includes all that portion of the state south of and including the counties of Mono, Mariposa, Stanislaus, Santa Clara and San Mateo. The man most generally mentioned in connection with this office by the anti-machine element in the Republican party is Walter Mallard, now entering upon his second term as city assessor of Los Angeles. Mr. Mallard is highly qualified for the post. He served as a deputy under the late Ben Ward, the best and most conscientious county assessor Los Angeles county ever had, and during his incumbency of these two offices he learned about all that is necessary to be known regarding the methods adopted by the railroads and allied corporations to reduce their assessments to a ridiculous minimum. In his campaign for reelection as city assessor last year he met with no serious opposition. It would have been impossible to beat him, regardless of the character of the man put forward by the machine. Mallard is an authority on land values and everything connected with the work of equalization, and there is no doubt that his services to the state would be on a par, at least, with those for the city and county. Even if the Southern Pacific should happen to gain control of the next board, so far as numbers are concerned, the presence of men like Controller Nye and Mr. Mallard in that body would be of tremendous value.

Anderson No Softy

No doubt Alden Anderson is, as reported, being subjected to a good deal of pressure to induce him to become an "organization" candidate for governor of California, but it is to be doubted if he can be screwed up to the sticking point of going before the people. It is true that he would be strong where Curry is strong and so be able to divide Curry's support, but what good would that do either Anderson or Curry? It would insure the nomination of the Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate and the "organization" would suffer anything to come to pass rather than that, unless, indeed, the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau can name the Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate, too, but that is extremely unlikely. Curry is, apparently, not to be frightened out of the race, Anderson is not to be made a living sacrifice to help defeat Curry and so it is likely that Mr. Herrin will make a virtue of necessity and stand behind Charles F. Curry for governor. He knows Curry for an "organization" man through and through and is merely afraid that Curry may become big enough to try to supplant Herrin himself as boss and so would prefer a less nifty politician for a candidate, but he mistakes his man if he thinks that he can use Alden Anderson for a stop-gap. Besides, Alden Anderson has a mighty good job right now. If he does not conclude to stay with that and let the gubernatorial job alone we miss our guess.

Held vs. Sanford

There is some talk that W. D. L. Held, of Mendocino, may try conclusions with J. B. Sanford for election to the state senate, but that eventuality may be looked upon as still suspended in the atmosphere. Senator Sanford is something of an insurgent among Democrats while Held would find it hard to divest himself of the "organization" taint as a Republican. This would give Sanford odds in his district even if the odds were not in his favor on the score of normal Democratic majority. The fourth district comprises Colusa (about the most hopelessly Democratic spot on earth), together with Glenn, Colusa and Lake, all of the same persuasion. In fact, when the state was districted these four Democratic strongholds were lumped off to keep each other company as the best way to be rid of them. Sanford's majority four years ago was nearly 900. As against any Republican who cannot purge himself of "organization" taint the race against Sanford would be well nigh hopeless. Doubtless the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau would rejoice to see Sanford left at home. He has been troublesome in recent years, but no one not a straight-out Lincoln-Roosevelter can perform that service this year.

Frank L. Caughey Found Him a Job Frank L. Caughey is clerk of the supreme court. The office is elective, but ought not to be. The supreme court should select its own clerk and the ballot should not be burdened with that office. Caughey has lived nearly all his life at the public crib. If he were shut off from it he would lose his appetite and perhaps die. This is not saying that he is not a good officer for he has made good wherever he has been tried, especially in bringing Mendocino county into the Herrin camp as a quid pro quo for Caughey's present $3,000 job. Nobody can beat Caughey for anything he wants in Mendocino county and, to get him a good job, the Republicans of his county have heretofore been willing to vote for railroad government, government by the higher-ups or anybody else and ask no questions. There isn't a thing in the world the matter with Caughey except that, for sake of an office, he will be all things to all men and most anything to the Devil, except being dishonest, for Caughey is square. He has even shut John McNab out of being talked of for governor, which was very agreeable and elevating to John, although it had no deeper significance than talk, all through fear that talking McNab might hurt Caughey's chances to hold down his present $3,000 job. Mr. Caughey's latest favor to the "organization" was in finding a place as deputy clerk for one Dave Williamson. David is a relict of the lamentable Calkinses who taught the Union Trust company and the Hellmans the value of a stiff breeze as security for money. He has been writing lavender editorials for the Sacramento Union, but has come to town where Caughey has installed him as scribe to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau for sending out "organization dope" to the interior press. The Southern Pacific's Political Bureau should be much obliged to Mr. Caughey and doubtless is. The general public should remember him also, anyhow until August.

A Good One On Stanton For many years Alice L. Armour has published the Orange Post and cultivated her memory and when a woman wants to dig up old personalities she always knows right where to go to look for them. The following is told on the authority of the Post. It was away back in 1896, on May 12th, that a Republican State Convention was held at Sacramento. P. A. Stanton lived in Orange then and was one of the eight delegates from that county. Stanton wanted to be state committeeman from that county and persuaded the delegation to select him, which it did, but Stanton was politically a little off-color in those days, as he has been at times since then, and the delegation rescinded its action and selected in his place H. W. Chynoweth of Anaheim. This made Phil hot all the way through and he not only read the riot act to the delegation but informed them that "We'll see that you get nothing in the future." On being asked whom he meant by "we" he retorted, "Why, the railroad that furnished you transportation to bring you here; now you may get home the best way you can." They did. The walking wasn't real bad down through the valley then because it was yet early and not very hot. Nevertheless the incident has not been forgotten in Orange county where the joke speedily leaked out. It appears to have been, too, all the lesson Orange needed, for it has been "organization" ever since, and Stanton and his "We, the railroad," have been doing business off and on from that day to this.

Will Mrs. Armour kindly dig up some more old recollections? They are both interesting and illuminating.

Gage Is the Man to Make the Issue Plain If by any possibility Henry T. Gage should succeed Frank P. Flint in the United States senate it would be a case of King Stork following King Log. Flint was made senator by the Southern Pacific company, and such a thing as that he might at any time become entirely independent of his creator was, of course, unthinkable; still Flint did not go about boasting of his railroad connections, and occasionally he assumed some appearance of independence. Gage, on the other hand, is a man who would not think of denying or concealing his association with the railroad machine; he would be more likely to make it a merit and boast of it, for he would see nothing wrong in it. During the 1906 campaign, when the state ticket, nominated at Santa Cruz, was under fire, Gage made a speech lauding Herrin and calling him a great and good man. He was perfectly willing to have it known who his leader was and that he followed him joyously. Now it is being suggested that Gage is the right person to be the "organization" candidate for United States senator, and with that opinion The California Weekly is in hearty accord. He is "organization" to the backbone, and he has plenty of backbone; he would frankly acknowledge the dependence of the "organization" on the Southern Pacific; he is not the sort of sneak who would pledge himself to the railroad in secret; he would be ready to tell it from the house-tops. Why not have a campaign in the open? If an organization with the Southern Pacific company for its core is a good thing, or a necessary thing, or even an inevitable thing (and one or the other of these propositions is maintained by all who follow the organization), why not make a campaign on that plain issue? Governor Gage would be entirely willing to do it. Moreover, he would make the issue so clear that every citizen could stand up and be counted on the side of it on which he would wish to be reckoned. Yes, Governor Gage is the logical candidate for the Herrin people.

he exceeded and, by income and inheritance taxes, society may take for the common good private property without making any other compensation than that of uplifting the race. The same tendency that would have made Man for the Sabbath, instead of the Sabbath for Man, would make Man for property instead of property for Man, and that must not be.

Editor, The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I, James of yours, spoilers in false lights and dangerous leadards to mislead in public. Modern spoils hire journals to mislead the public. In the one case, as in the other, the misguided are spoiled. A truthful journal of this day is as important to the public welfare as was a fixed, true lighthouse in those days to one sailor and, alas! almost as rare. The California Weekly is now shedding a brilliant light, a guide and a warning. Let me assist to trim the lamp.

Respectfully, JOHN T. DARE.

2472 Clay St., San Francisco, Cal.,

The Staff very gladly avails itself of Mr. Dare's kindly offices. A state paper in whose integrity the people can repose full confidence, even though a weekly, can become a great power for good throughout a commonwealth. It is not given to any editor or staff of editors to be at all times right. It was Emerson who said that even the wise are wise only on great and unusual occasions and say a hundred foolish things to one well grounded in wisdom. How impossible then for an editor to be a fit leader for a people! Fortunately he does not need to be a leader of their thought or their action. If he will only gather the data for them, get the facts they need and lay them before his readers, they will do their own leading, but if there be a shadow of doubt of the sincerity of any writer on the part of any reader the influence of that writer upon that reader is at an end. This we try to keep always in mind.

Miss Elizabeth Moore, a Vassar graduate, has entered the agricultural department of the University of Missouri at Columbia and has announced her intention of becoming an expert farmer. She is a member of several clubs in St. Louis.

A forgotten Homer Martin was found recently in an unused room at the Knoedler galleries on Fifth avenue, New York city. It is a landscape at Port Henry, Lake Champlain (according to Edward Gay, a friend of Martin)—a beautiful work of generous dimensions (30 by 50 inches), and it would be cheap at $7,500, as one would judge by the way Homer Martins are now held. Mr. Knoedler was so much interested in finding a masterpiece of this great individual painter that he proposes to pay Martin's wife half the price the painting may bring,—at least $5000; it will be welcome to Mrs. Martin, who dwells with a son at Ocean Park, Cal., and is not too well off.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE IN CALIFORNIA

STATE AND NATIONAL STATISTICS COMPARED FOR THE PERIOD OF 1887 TO 1906.

By GEORGE D. LESLIE.

A twenty years' review of marriage and divorce in California is afforded by recent publications of the Federal Census Bureau covering an investigation for the United States in 1887 to 1906. The destruction of San Francisco records by fire in 1906 does not affect comparisons particularly, because scattering counties had to be omitted likewise for other states besides California.

The number of marriages in California was 6,229 in 1887 and 17,720 in 1906, the state total almost tripling when the annual total for the United States hardly doubled (483,069 in 1887 against 853,290 in 1906). Even more significant are the totals for successive five-year periods, as follows:

California Marriages.		Per Cent. Increase.		U. S.
5-year period	Total	Number	Per Cent.
1902 to 1906	70,524	25,785	57.6	20.3
1897 to 1901	44,739	4,877	12.2	12.4
1892 to 1896	39,862	5,448	15.8	11.9
1887 to 1891	34,414

The above figures show that this state surpassed the nation in the relative increase of marriages especially in the last five-year period as compared with the one before.

However, the marriage rate is much lower for California than for the United States, as appears from the following figures for number of marriages in proportion to the population classified as total, total adult, and unmarried adult:

Marriages Annual Average per 10,000 Population.		U. S.
Class of Population.	California.
Total population.	84.....	93
1890	80.....	91
1900	114.....	141
Total at least 15.....	228.....	321

For both this state and the whole country the marriage rate was higher in 1900 than in 1890. For 1900 the annual average number of marriages per 10,000 unmarried adult population (including all the single, widowed and divorced at least 15 years of age) was only 228 for California against 321 for the United States. In fact, this marriage rate for the marriageable population was lower for California (228) than for any other state, the next lowest states being Connecticut, 232, Delaware, 236, Montana, 246, Massachusetts, 247, and Wyoming, 249. However, the lack of figures for San Francisco may account for the low standing of California in this respect.

Divorce figures are available for the forty years from 1867 to 1906. The divorce total for California was 200 in 1867, 630 in 1877, 785 in 1887, 1,484 in 1897, and 1,813 in 1906, while the corresponding numbers for the United States were, respectively, 9,937 in 1867, 15,687 in 1877, 27,919 in 1887, 44,699 in 1897, and 72,062 in 1906. The grand total for California in 1867 to 1886 was 12,118 and in 1887 to 1906 was no less than 25,170. Similarly, the aggregate for the United States was 328,716 in 1867 to 1886 and as many as 945,625 in 1887 to 1906. The divorce figures for successive five-year periods are as follows:

California Divorces.		Per Cent. Increase.		U. S.
5-year period.	Total.	Number.	Per Cent.
1902 to 1906	6,784	998*	12.8*	27.6
1897 to 1901	7,782	1,997	34.5	33.7
1892 to 1896	5,785	966	20.0	23.9
1887 to 1891	4,819	58*	1.2*	34.1
1882 to 1886	4,877	1,477	43.4	31.4
1877 to 1881	3,400	847	33.2	30.3
1872 to 1876	2,553	1,265	98.2	27.9
1867 to 1871	1,288

* Decrease.

Except for two five-year periods showing slight decreases, the successive divorce totals for California have increased at about the same rate as those for the United States. The decrease of divorces in California for 1902 to 1906 as compared with the preceding five-year period is evidently due to the enactment of the interlocutory decree legislation at the session of 1903, which caused a temporary diminution in the divorce totals for this state. Thus, the number of final decrees of divorce in California fell from 1,733 in 1902 to 862 in 1903 and 716 in 1904, but then rose to 1,660 for 1905 and 1,813 for 1906.

Moreover, the divorce rate, or proportion of divorces to either the total or married population, has invariably been higher for California than for the United States, as shown below:

Divorces, Annual Average per 100,000 Population.		U. S.
Class of Population.	California.
Total population:
1900	108.....	73
1890	84.....	53
1880	84.....	38
1870	52.....	29
Married population:
1900	297.....	200
1890	247.....	148

The proportion of divorces to total or married population has increased steadily in both California and the United States, the proportion for this state being much higher in each case than for the whole country. However, there are several states with relatively more divorces than California. Thus, while the annual average number of divorces per 100,000 married population in 1900 was 297 for California, it was no less than 315 for Nevada, 326 for Indian Territory, 344 for Arizona, 346 for Oklahoma, 347 for Idaho, 355 for Indiana, 361 for Wyoming, 368 for Oregon, 391 for Texas, 399 for Arkansas, 409 for Colorado, 497 for Montana, and 513 for Washington.

Of the 25,170 divorces in California in 1887 to 1906 only 6,409 or 25.5 per cent. were granted to husbands as compared with 18,761 or 74.5 per cent. granted to wives. For the United States in the same period the divorces granted to husbands were 33.4 per cent. and to wives 66.6 per cent. About three-fourths of the marriages in California alone were granted to wives, against a proportion of two-thirds for the whole United States.

The following table shows the per cent. distribution, by cause, of divorces granted to the husband and to the wife, respectively, in both California and the United States in 1887 to 1906.

Cause.	Divorces Granted: To Husband.		To Wife.
	California.	U. S.	California.	U. S.
Total	100.0	100.0	100.0	100.0
Adultery	13.0	28.7	3.1	10.0
Cruelty	11.5	10.5	26.4	27.5
Desertion	70.4	49.4	34.2	33.6
Drunkenness	2.2	1.1	4.1	5.3
Neg. to provide	19.9	5.5
Comb'n of preceding causes, etc.	2.3	4.5	10.6	11.8
All other specified causes	0.1	3.1	1.3	4.5
Cause unknown.....	0.6	2.6	0.4	1.9

The great bulk of the divorces granted to husbands were for desertion (70.4 per cent. in California and 49.4 per cent. in the United States). Next in order are adultery (13.0 per cent. for this state and 28.7 for the whole country) and cruelty (11.5 for the state and 10.5 per cent. for the nation.)

The divorces granted to wives were mainly for desertion (34.2 per cent. in California and 33.6 per cent. for the United States) with cruelty a close second (26.4 per cent. in this state and 27.5 per cent. in the whole country). Neglect to provide is also an important ground for divorce in California, being the cause for 19.9 per cent. of the divorces granted to wives here as compared with only 5.5 per cent. for the entire United States.

The table below gives for the principal causes, the per cent. of divorces granted to husbands and wives in California and the United States in 1887 to 1906:

Cause.	California.		United States.
	Per Cent granted to Husband.	Wife.	Per Cent granted to Husband.	Wife.
Total	25.5	74.5	33.4	66.6
Adultery	59.1	40.9	39.1	60.9
Cruelty	12.9	87.1	16.1	83.9
Desertion	41.3	58.7	42.5	57.5
Neg. to provide	100.0	100.0
All other causes	9.7	90.3	19.5	80.5

In both state and nation the divorces for neglect to provide were invariably granted to wives, while the bulk of the divorces for cruelty were also granted to wives (87.1 per cent. in California and 83.9 per cent. in the United States). Similarly, most of the divorces for desertion (58.7 per cent. in this state and 57.5 per cent. in the whole nation) were granted to wives. On the other hand, most of the divorces for adultery were granted to husbands, the per cent. being exactly the same (59.1) for California as for the United States.

The great bulk of the divorces for drunkenness and miscellaneous causes or combinations of causes were granted to wives.

Intemperance was a direct or indirect cause in 6.4 per cent. of all divorces granted to husbands in California in 1887 to 1906, as compared with 6.1 per cent. for the United States in the same twenty-year period. For divorces granted to wives, intemperance was directly or indirectly the cause in 17.9 per cent. of all cases in California, as compared with no less than 26.3 per cent. in the United States.

The average number of years from marriage to divorce was 10.4 for California, against only 9.9 for the United States. Similarly, the average number of years from marriage to separation was 7.6 for this state, as compared with merely 6.7 for the whole country. However, the average number of years from separation to divorce was only 3.0 for California alone, against 3.2 for the United States as a whole.

For California in 1887 to 1906, 69.7 per cent. of the divorces were granted to couples who were married in this state, 26.9 per cent. to couples married in other states, and only 3.4 per cent. to couples married in foreign countries. The corresponding per cent. for the United States were 76.3 for divorces granted to couples married in the state where divorced, 20.9 for divorces to couples married in other states, and merely 2.8 per cent. for divorces to couples married in foreign countries.

The following table gives the facts as to children, for divorces granted to husbands and wives in California, 1887 to 1906, together with corresponding per cent. for the United States.

	California Divorces.		Per Cent. for U. S.
	Number.	Per Cent.
Granted to husband.....	6,409	100.0	100.0
Reporting children	2,157	33.7	26.0
Reporting no children.....	3,458	54.0	47.0
Not reporting as to children	794	12.4	27.0
Granted to wife.....	18,761	100.0	100.0
Reporting children	9,828	52.4	46.8
Reporting no children.....	7,377	39.3	36.9
Not reporting as to children	1,556	8.3	16.3

There were no dependent children reported at the time the divorce was granted in about half the divorces granted to husbands (54.0 per cent. for California and 47.0 per cent. for the United States) and in about two-fifths of the divorces granted to wives (39.3 per cent. for this state and 36.9 for the whole nation). This indicates that the presence of children in a family is a factor deterrent to divorce, especially at the instance of the father who would probably be separated from his young children by the court's assigning them to the care of the mother. For divorces in which the number of children is known (in California 11,161 divorces with 21,674 children) the average number of children in each divorced family was only 1.9, this figure being exactly the same for California as for the United States.

Data on the residents of the libellee in divorce suits and on the form in which notice was served are as follows:

	California Divorces.		Per Cent. for U. S.

* Less than one-tenth of 1 per cent

The per cent. of divorces where the libellee

resided in another state was 20.1 for California, as compared with an average of 20.6 per cent. for the United States as a whole. Notice was served by publication in 18.6 per cent. of all the divorces in this state, against only 16.1 per cent. for the entire country.

Further information is available about the residence of the libellee for divorces granted to husbands and wives, respectively, as follows:

	California Divorces Number.	Per Cent. 1909	U.S. 1908
Granted to husbands:
Residence of libellee:
In same state.....	4,890	76.3	68.2
Outside the state.....	1,457	22.7	20.9
Unknown.....	92	1.4	1.9
Granted to wife.....	18,761	100.0	100.0
Residence of libellee:
In same state.....	17,896	95.4	91.1
Unknown.....	265	1.4	13.5

This table shows that in divorces granted to husbands, the wives resided in another state in 22.7 per cent. of all cases in California, against an average of only 20.9 per cent. for the United States. In divorces granted to wives, however, the husbands resided in another state in only 19.2 per cent. of all cases in this state, as compared with 20.4 per cent. of all cases in the whole country. In other words, more than the average proportion of husbands living in California have been divorced here from wives residing in other states while, on the contrary, less than the average proportion of wives living here have used our courts to obtain divorces from husbands residing outside the Golden State.

The following table presents data on the contesting of divorces and the asking and granting of alimony in divorces granted to husbands and wives, respectively:

	California Divorces Number.	Per Cent. 1909	U.S. 1908
Granted to husband.....	6,409	100.0	100.0
Contested.....	1,274	19.9	14.8
Alimony asked.....	138	2.2	3.8
Alimony granted.....	74	1.2	2.0
Granted to wife.....	18,761	100.0	100.0
Contested.....	3,538	18.9	15.7
Alimony asked.....	3,842	20.5	18.4
Alimony granted.....	2,283	12.2	12.7

Of divorces granted to husbands, no less than 19.9 per cent. were contested in California, against only 14.8 per cent. for the United States. Similarly, 18.9 per cent. of the divorces granted to wives in this state were contested, as compared with 15.7 per cent. for the whole country. Divorces were contested relatively more in California than in the entire United States, especially in cases where decrees were awarded to husbands.

Hardly any husbands asked or obtained alimony in divorce suits, the per cent. of husbands even asking alimony being only 2.2 in California and 2.8 in the United States and the per cent. granted alimony being merely 1.2 in this state and 2.0 in the entire country. Wives, however, asked for alimony in no less than 20.5 per cent. of the divorces granted them in California and in 18.4 per cent. of the divorces granted them in the whole United States. Similarly, wives were granted alimony with the divorce in 12.2 per cent. of all cases in this state and in 12.7 per cent. of all cases in the entire country.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

T. K. Beard has offered to give to the Woman's Improvement Club of Modesto a tract of land consisting of one block and a fraction of another in that city, to be used as a park. The gift is conditioned that the club expend $2,500 in improving the land within the next four years.

The Democratic central committee of Butte county having indorsed George W. Cartwright as a candidate for governor, a Democratic mass meeting was called, which requested the committee to rescind its action—not because of opposition to Cartwright, but because of opposition to any indorsement at this time.

The United States torpedo-boat flotilla on this coast now devotes considerable time to proving and adjusting torpedoes in San Pedro harbor.

T. C. Hocking, manager of the Modesto Herald, has had W. J. Bryan, business manager of the Modesto News, arrested on a charge of criminal libel.

Hughson, Stanislaus county, now is the proud possessor of a newspaper, the Citizen, of which W. C. Stone is the editor.

A lone and unmasked robber "held up" the bank of Highland last Friday, and secured a tray of gold containing $1,000.

Fowler soon will have a second newspaper, to be known as the Independent, of which T. B. Starling will be the editor.

Reports, which may be exaggerated, announce that fully one-third of the orange crop of Southern California has been damaged by recent frosts.

The Sacramento postoffice building is to be remodeled and enlarged to double its present capacity.

Last year the orange-growers of Butte county made about $400 net from each acre of ground planted to the trees.

SHEAR WIT.

"Bull con," a slang phrase which means to flatter, to praise with ulterior motives, had its origin in the West years ago. When the gold brick game was started the bunco men sprang a fine, high sounding combination of words upon the simple farmers. They called it an investment in "bullion consolidated." Years after the words were cut down to "bull con," and came to mean any graft that depended upon the gift of gab. Still later it was used to describe the method of flattery. —New York Sun.

Sometime since a farmer stopped in the cross-roads store to get some horse liniment to rub the rheumatism out of a sick cow, and two or three days later he came back with a life-sized kick. "Look here, Abner," he complainingly remarked, "I wish ye would be a little mite more kecerful how ye throw yerself back o' thet counter. T'other day ye give me cologne instead o' hoss liniment, and gosh-dast if I didn't put it on thet sick cow afore I found out what it was." "It didn't hurt her any, did it?" broke in the groceryman. "Can't say that it did," answered the farmer, "but ever sence she has had thet sweet smellin' stuff on her she hasn't done a derned thing but jes' look at her reflection in the duck pond an' sigh." —Philadelphia Telegraph.

A. JUDSON

I HAD not far miscalculated. The road went down one side of the canyon for three miles, crossed it and went back up the other side to nearly opposite the entrance to it on my side. As I turned into the canyon's mouth the stage was just turning out of it on the other side. I brought my team to a stand. How plainly I could hear the chuck, chuck, chuck of the stage hubs against the shoulders of the axles! I even heard the crack of the long lash as the last pull was being topped. I yelled at the top of my voice. My horses plunged. I yelled again and again. I saw the back of the stage sway and swing as it passed the last rise of ground. It was scarcely more than a quarter of a mile away. I could see the forms of the outside passengers silhouetted against the skyline, could even see the long whiplash as the driver swung it clear. It seemed as though he must hear. Desperate, at the last instant, I drew my revolver and discharged a ball into the air, not remembering that, do all that I could, I never had been able to make my off horse stand the sound of a gun. That was the last I knew for many days. My off broncho must have gone crazy and crowded the other off the grade, for when I was found I was among the rocks far down the canyon side and my team, both horses dead, was piled in a heap hundreds of feet below.

There was a broken leg and shoulder and skull fractured at the base. It was long before I regained consciousness, many weeks before I came to myself sufficiently to recall what had transpired and months before I was able to travel. As soon as I could gather my wits together I cursed Ellen Butler afresh (through the medium of the doctor) warned her never to let me see her face again, and I do not know for certain that I ever did, but to hasten to Marguerite with all possible speed that she might tell her the truth and implore her to come back to me or, anyhow, to be of good cheer until I could come to her. I believe that she did her best to do as I bade, but the steamer she was on was captured by a Confederate cruiser, for the Civil War was then at its fiercest stage, was run into a southern port and she did not reach Marguerite's home until long after I had come and gone.

It was not until toward the last of February, 1863, that I was able to travel. I had written many letters to Marguerite explaining all and imploring forgiveness for all, although I said nothing of what had happened to me through fear of causing her anxiety over the consequences of her going away from me as she had gone. I attributed my tardiness in writing to pique and press of business. In return I heard nothing whatever from her. Her childish old father, wishing to keep Marguerite all to himself, now that he was very old and his wife was dead, had kept her letters and mine. They were all found among his effects, hers unmailed and mine unopened.

I took what money there was available, in safe and in bank at Sacramento, and gave my superintendent power of attorney to transact all my business while I was gone. I knew him to be weak and feared that he might be dishonest, but had to trust somebody and there seemed to be no other way.

The ocean voyage was uneventful, save that as we neared the Carolinas my impatience scarcely suffered me to rest and drove me on deck before daybreak. I remember one such morning as though it were yesterday. The atmosphere was wonderfully soft, but rain was threatened and now and again great drops fell upon the deck and splattered as though the deck had been spat upon. The engines seemed to be breathing hard and the wreaths of smoke from the funnels fell upon the stern and lay low upon the waters. Was it a voice speaking in heavy whisper or was it the exhaust from the steampipe into the funnels? I only know that I heard, as plainly as I ever heard anything in my life, in a hoarse, heavy whisper: "Too late! too late! too late!" Three times I heard it and no more, and my heart sank within me.

I reached Philadelphia on one of those beautiful April days which we commonly speak of as "weather breeders" because the lapse from serenity is likely to be both sudden and sharp, and by the time I reached my old home town, the day was drawing to a close and clouds were lowering. I sent my luggage to the hotel by the porter and made a bee line for Uriah Hapgood's cottage where I had lived for five years and, although he worked me hard, had known more happiness than I have known in all the rest of my life.

The doors of the cottage were wide open and I ran up the steps with the eagerness of a boy, mentally noting as I hurried through the gate that the lilacs my Marguerite loved so well were in full bloom, save that many had been cut away leaving parts of the bushes denuded of blossoms. I stopped neither for knocking nor for ceremony, but, calling, "Marguerite! Marguerite!" hastened on through the house from room to room, calling her name again and again, and so on out into the back yard and around the house to the front again.

There was no response and I was about to spring up the steps a second time when a whining, tremulous voice came to me from somewhere out in the yard, saying: "Why don't you call louder, you fool, you don't expect she can hear you whispering like that, do you? Call louder, I say, louder."

I turned in the direction from which the voice came and beheld old Uriah Hapgood, sitting on a bench beside the gate, his long staff in hand, leering at me with as imbecile an expression as ever the face of idiot wore, and yet there was a look of malignancy in it that made him appear more like devil than man.

"Where is Marguerite?" I demanded, not unkindly I am sure, and yet with an impatience I should have striven in vain to conceal.

"Where should she be if not by the side of her mother's grave?" he replied. "She has gone there with flowers, lots of flowers, all the flowers, pretty much, there were in town. If you hasten to the cemetery you may find her there, but you'd better hurry. She may be gone."

"At the cemetery!" I ejaculated. "Why, she must not be there. Can't you see that there is a storm arising? She'll catch her death a' cold."

"So she will! So she will!" the old man muttered maudlinly. "Yes, she'll catch her death, she'll surely catch her death. You'd better hurry. Call to her, call to her. If she don't answer directly call louder. Don't whisper the way you did here. In a wind like this coming up, and the forest roaring, how can she hear you when you whisper like that? Hurry! I'll get a rain coat and come after you as fast as I can," and he started tottering toward the house.

I scarcely waited until he had finished speaking before hastening at the top of my speed toward the old cemetery just at the edge of the village and, in a few moments, had reached it. I ran up the stile that spanned the wall and down the other side. I knew where the family burial plot was, for a sister and a brother of Marguerite had been buried there years and years before, and was no time in finding it, although the trees and shrubbery had grown amazingly since my last visit. As I approached the spot I called lustily, as the old man had suggested, for the wind was roaring through the treetops, as it is now doing out on the ridges yonder, and the rain was already beginning to fall. "Marguerite!" I called, "Marguerite!" but there was no answer. Parting the branches of the hedge by which the plot was surrounded I saw there, not Marguerite, but a wealth of hali wilted lilacs wreathed about a newly raised headboard bearing the inscription: "Marguerite Hapgood, born October 8, 1830, died April 24, 1863, aged 32 years, 6 months and 16 days." She had gone to her grave not even bearing my name, or so it seemed from that headboard. And the day of her death was the same one upon which I heard the hoarsely whispered words, "too late," on the steamer's deck off the Carolinas. We had been detained by bad weather. I had been forced to go to New York and so had reached her grave side on All Fool's Day.

The blow staggered me. I fell upon my knees clasping her wreathed headboard in my arms and groaned aloud. The storm broke in all its fury. The old man, his long white hair and beard streaming in the wind and rain, parted the branches and looked in upon me. His visage, well nigh as white as hair or beard, seemed half demoniacal, half imbecile. "Why don't you call to her?" he cried. "Call, and she'll answer you. Don't be moaning and groaning there like a fool," and he cursed me with great, round oaths such as I have heard else only along a skid road in a lumbering camp.

"Oh! that I could wring your heart for you," he screamed into my ear, "as you have wrung hers. Oh! that I could make you see the look of pain and longing upon her face as I saw it the morning she died! By the eternal, you shall see it! It shall be my curse upon you that you see that look as I saw it, that the earth betwixt her and you shall become as transparent as air, her coffin be like polished glass, that you may see her as I saw her in her shroud, heartbroken, wasted, dead. May that vision never leave you night nor day while you live!" Then, lifting his hands in attitude of prayer, "Almighty God," he pleaded, "grant me this revenge upon him ere I die."

There was a flash, a crash, a stunning roar. The next I knew I was in bed in the little old chamber in our tavern home where my brother and I slept during all our boyhood, and my aged mother was sitting by my bedside. A shaft of lightning had struck a pine in the cemetery and a riven limb had fallen where Uriah Hapgood stood, crushing his fragile body into a shapeless mass and rendering me insensible. They buried him by the side of Marguerite.

The rest is soon told. I remained at home until after Uriah Hapgood's funeral, made my will for the benefit of my father's family, and turned over to them what means I had save enough to take me to the front, where I enlisted in the first regiment that would take me, which chanced to be the Fifty-sixth Massachusetts, Col. Griswold, whom I saw fall in his tracks when Sorrel charged. I, who longed for death, escaped unscathed until Spottsylvania where I received a pistol bullet through the chest, was carried to the rear to die and afterward invalided home to the same end.

It was while I was at home, so far convalescing from this wound as to be able daily to visit Marguerite's grave, that the old man's curse began to be verified. Perhaps it was owing to weakness, but the earth separated between us and I saw her in her shroud as plainly as I had ever seen her sleeping by my side, but, oh, the pain in her face! The heartbreak written there! I would be walking along when, upon the instant, her grave would yawn at my feet and I would stop short lest I tumble into it, and there at the bottom she lay as though graven in marble. Then I saw the old man with hair and whiskers flowing, holding his hands up in supplication for this, his revenge upon me. I thought it would drive me mad and, to be rid of the vision, I reported for duty before I was able, went to the front, was wounded in the knee, fell into the hands of the Confederates and was sent south where I remained in prison until the war ended.

As for Ellen Butler, Marguerite and I have forgiven her. Marguerite first and I long afterward, but I have not seen her or heard of her since my sister told me of finding her at Marguerite's grave, after I had gone to the war. She had prostrated herself at Marguerite's feet and, sobbing aloud, was calling upon God, not for forgiveness nor yet for mercy, but for opportunity here upon earth, to expiate her fault through suffering as she had inflicted. She followed me to the front, my sister declared, to serve as army nurse, but what befel her I know not. I have learned to look upon her with some charity. It was evidently as hard for her to be good as it would have been for my Marguerite to be anything but good, and I have left her case in the hands of her maker without protest from me.

Released from prison, I made my way back to California where I found my brother trying to get hold of my estate by probating my will, I having been reported as killed in battle. Meantime my superintendent, with the aid of a knavish lawyer and a complaisant judge, had been trying to loot my estate under my power of attorney. I tried to get things into shape again, but the current had set the other way and, my hallucination still besetting me, I transferred all my equities to my brother, retrieved my kit from the garret, invested a few hundred dollars in leather and other supplies, and came off up here where I was wholly unknown to begin life anew. I began it by stopping my drinking, how I may tell you some other time, but that is another story, quenching at the same time any remaining hunger for money I may have had, and going to work. Gradually the hallucination left me, save on such occasions as this to-night, when, if I am left alone, it is not unlikely to come back upon me with all its terror of former years. I feel the presence of Marguerite ever near me when I am good and clean and fit for her companionship, and I am devoting my life to trying to be fit for her company when this life has ended.

The storm has now abated and I'll not detain you longer, but, three times during its height, that grave back in Pennsylvania opened not three feet from my feet, yawning wide, and at its bottom, marble white, I saw my Marguerite with her strained, pained face and sightless eyes as plainly as I saw her in the summer of '63. Not roar of battle, greed of gain or a night's debauch could blot the awful spectre out, but only tranquillity of spirit and the strength of being clean. Good night.

The next afternoon, being about to take my departure, I stepped into William Oden's front yard to say good by. He was snipping the dead blossoms from one of the many marguerites with which his garden was plentifully supplied. It was evident that he had not seen me for he was talking to himself. Or was he? This is what he was saying: "There, how do you like that, Marguerite? Aren't they splendid after the rain? There isn't a dead blossom in the whole garden. I made sure it would please you to have them all cleaned up to-day."

Stepping softly upon the moist path I retraced my steps without disturbing him, and so took my final leave of "William Oden, Maker."

H. B. Irving appeared two weeks ago in London in Comyns Carr's dramatic version of Stevenson's story of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde." A cable dispatch to the New York Tribune says: "H. B. Irving's success in impersonating strongly contrasted characters in 'The Lyons Mail' has been followed by a similar triumph in 'Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.' He has not used the dramatic version of Robert Louis Stevenson's story, in which Richard Mansfield appeared in America, but a superior one, provided by Comyns Carr.

At last the seagoing theater is a fact. When Charles Frohman announced some time ago that plays at sea would be his next theatrical innovation, some said no transatlantic circuit would be practical, but Mr. Frohman has arranged to inaugurate the custom this week on board the Mauretania, of the Cunard line, during her run from New York to Liverpool. He has arranged with the Cunard steamship company to present Miss Marie Doro in "The Climax" in the saloon of the Mauretania when the liner is two days out from New York and in the general vicinity of mid-ocean. He is sending the company to London for an engagement in the Globe theater, beginning the 21st.

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS AND CHILD DEVELOPMENT.

By John L. Murray.

Eighteen years ago the whirligig of politics landed me in the office of state superintendent of public instruction in the state of Colorado. I had not been a school worker, and immediately upon my election I began a thorough study of the workings of our public schools. Very early in my investigations I came to the conclusion that all human weaknesses and wickedness existed, or rather failed of eradication from our natures, because of our treatment of children. I, Sancho Panza like, hastened to remodel the entire school system. I received much favorable comment from the state press as well as from many educational journals of national reputation. But I learned this, to reform conditions in republics you must reform public opinion and to reform public opinion you must reform men, and to reform men you must go to the cradles of the nation. So lasting reforms only come after a generation of propaganda.

I am now in a position to once again get a hearing, but I am not going to be so dogmatic in my assertions, yet I appeal to the teachers and the preachers of California to read what I have to say and if you approve or have any suggestions to make, kindly write me.

Few acts are unpremeditated. As a man thinketh in his heart so is he. How very necessary, then, that we give children an atmosphere that will produce proper thought.

As half-baked bread will give the individual dyspepsia, so will half-developed children give free government dyspepsia.

If individually we are mental and moral pigmies, government cannot be a mental and moral giant.

Children are innocent at birth. If they early become criminals are we not to blame? And shall we not have to pay the penalty of our neglect?

Never have human activities been wholly just. Nations have risen and fallen, civilizations have come and gone; yet the cry of despair is ever, "Man's inhumanity to man." What change is necessary in our rearing of the child, in directing its every thought and shaping its character, that one may be worthy to hold high place and great responsibility while the many go on quietly about their daily task? All doing as they would be done by. Each giving according to his ability and receiving according to his needs.

All are united in acknowledging that human affairs are awry; we do not get the best out of life nor do we make the most of our opportunities. Yet when it comes to suggestions for remedial legislation we scatter like chaff before the wind. Still it is the duty of thinking men and women to endeavor to create a thought center which will attract all lovers of truth and justice; against which corruption and ignorance may rage and dash in vain.

Shortcomings of Our School System.

I early learned from the records of our then National Commissioner of Education, W. T. Harris, that there were over forty million children in our government. Of these over twenty-three millions are of school age. Sixteen million are enrolled in our schools, while but few over eleven million is the average daily attendance, about one hundred days in the year. These figures tell their own tale.

We act like the retired merchant who purchased a fruit farm. Finding thereon thousands of young, straight, thrifty trees, and a few old gnarly trunks, he spent his time in a vain endeavor to straighten out the old hulks. At fruit-picking time he found most of his young trees with bodies bent and broken, with limbs twisted and misshapen, and all because of his neglect or misapplied effort.

We have developed brains and boddlers, literature and license, privilege and poverty, palaces and penitentiaries.

"Oh ye blind and selfish freemen, boasting of your land and time While the children soak and blacken soul and sense in filth and crime."

The children are the state's greatest undeveloped resources. Their development contains all the questions of human activities. Drinking, gambling, divorce, greed, would be abolished or minimized if we gave the child full development. I would that I could attract the attention of every minister of the gospel, every editor, every political reformer, then would I say to them, why spend your talents and time upon conditions instead of causes, why apply the pound of cure when the ounce of prevention would avail?

A fundamental error in our present school system is our separation of labor and letter. The child is reared in the belief that the two do not harmonize. The premise is false and it follows that our civilization is false. To put a child at work for gain dwarfs its conception of life's duties, to allow the child to spend its time in idleness and vicious company is sowing the seed of sloth and crime.

An Ideal School System.

The child needs loving home influences as much as a plant needs sunshine and dew. Teachers are handicapped by politics, hence our schools should have a home atmosphere and teaching be made a profession, a life work.

It is impossible to keep from grading classes in our present system. Grading means that bright pupils are held back, not needing to give much thought to their studies they become careless and mischievous. Dull pupils are hurried through their studies so rapidly that they fail to grasp the meaning thereof and are thus made shallow reasoners and superficial thinkers.

The first natural law of childhood is activity. The foundation of our present system is inactivity. Keep the child close to nature.

Nature calls to men and women, "Marry." The school law says, "No." Again I say obey Nature.

The first thing for us to do is to fit our girls to be heads of households and then give them to understand that the farmer's wife is the real "first lady" of the land, and that the mechanic's wife is her sister.

Select as a school site a patch of ground from ten acres to a quarter section, according to the use and productiveness of the soil. Have two teachers marry and make this their home (home in every sense), the parents of the district being the only power to remove. Every orphan in every school district to have a home in the schoolhouse. Each school home and ground to be as beautiful and comfortable as the grounds and homes of our millionaires.

These would be workshops where the boys would be grounded in the art of iron, wood or leather work. Each boy must become a master mechanic in at least one of these useful branches of industry. The boys being competent to erect the needed buildings, there would be cottages, conservatory, gymnasium, auditorium, library, music room.

The farm lessons would give enough outdoor work to keep the physical side of the boys in perfect condition. The person who lives an out-of-door life is the perfect man. His blood rushes through his veins with such force that disease flees before it; his brain is clear and his stomach strong as rubber. How different is the city man, weak stomach, sluggish blood, general debility.

Here the girls who get no real home training would learn the true art of homemaking, which is the foundation of all life's successes. How can our daughters make home happy and comfortable for their husbands and children if they have neither knowledge nor desire to create a home atmosphere, and are compelled to depend upon the caprice or ignorance of servants?

Our Moral Forces as Ropes of Sand.

We have so environed our children that they are becoming criminals in childhood. Rotten before ripe. We have no moral stamina. Corruption runs riot in high and low places.

On our school farm the children would grow to manhood pure, healthful and steadfast, then, when they entered the business vocations of life, they would be morally strong and numerous enough to remodel all life's activities. Just to grow, free from all care, in pure and loving surroundings, is the thing most needed by children.

Our schools must become the living, the vitalizing soul of every community. They are as a great mill into which we pour every kind and condition of people and expect that superior grist, an American citizen. How varied, how far-reaching and steadfast must be the influence to accomplish this great work; what fullness of time is required.

An Ideal Uplifting Influence.

Think of the uplifting influence of such a school home. Every child neatly and comfortably dressed, tucked into bed each night with a smile and a kiss. Too many go to bed under present conditions dirty and hungry, with a curse and a kick as their benediction.

Here an education would mean the completest development of the individual. A wider knowledge, a broader culture, a stronger character, a higher standard of morals.

We are not fitting our girls for a beautiful motherhood when we force them in childhood into our factories and workshops, keeping them there long hours, often all night, surrounded by misery and vice. Such treatment embitters them against restraint, against government.

Each district would have a pumping plant and an electrical power plant. How easy and natural for the school district to furnish water, light and power to the farmers of the district.

Each teacher should be commissioned a postmaster. The rural mail carrier, instead of trudging around from house to house could ride up to the school house in his automobile, hand the incoming mail to the teacher, get the outgoing mail, then speed away to the next school house. In the evening the teacher would hand out the mail to the children as they started for home.

School district bonds should be taken by the national government as security and school notes issued thereon on the same terms as national banks get bank notes. If a school district bonds itself at 6 per cent. for twenty years, it pays more to the money lender than it does to benefit the children. Let the national government see to it that when bonds are issued for school purposes the children get the full benefit, dollar for dollar.

The pearl of greatest price is at your feet. Pick it up.

Hold Your Own.

The farmer said, as he talked one day: "The way to succeed in the earthly fray. The way to win out in the struggle dread"—The farmer thus to the young man said—"Is to hold your own with your full might's store;

Just grip it, and hold it, and e'er add more. Oh, the way to give failure the lasting slip Is to hold your own in a mighty grip.

Now the farmer he had a daughter fair, So the young man found he had business there.

Well, the business kept him quite late one night,

And the farmer came in (he was impolite). "There are other chairs in this room," he cried;

"You might have found two had you really tried!"

Said the youth: "I follow the light you've shown,

For I'm pleased to announce I'm holding my own."

While holding your own e'er unto it add— 'Twas the farmer's rule, and 'twas not so bad, And the evidence hints that the youth and maid

To the farmer's words have deference paid: They are married now, and he holds his own Whenever he pleases, his knee her throne, And now they have added—they have, begad— Five tiny editions of ma and dad.

Miss Martha Berry, head of a school for poor white boys near Rome, Ga., has just succeeded in raising the $50,000 necessary to secure an equal sum from Mrs. Russell Sage and Andrew Carnegie. This school grew out of a little Sunday school that Miss Berry started in the mountains of Georgia about ten years ago. The school now owns a thousand acres of land, a large part of which is under cultivation, and several good buildings. It has 150 pupils and fifteen teachers. The $100,000 will be used as an endowment fund.

SHEAR WIT

"What is the price of your wine?" "A quarter a pint." "Neither. I want a gallon." —St. Louis Star.

Little Lola, accompanied by her mother, was enjoying her first ride in a sleeping car. "Mamma," she queried, "who occupies the flat above us?"

"Billy Sunday proclaims that dancing is merely hugging set to music," says the Philosopher of Folly, "so I suppose we moral people will have to cut out the music."—Cleveland Leader.

"If you could have one wish, what would it be?" "That my wife would sometimes tell me to my face some of the fine things she says about me to her friends."—Chicago Record-Herald.

William Pruette, the singer, tells of a servant girl who came to Mrs. Pruette in tears and asked permission to go home for a few days. She had a telegram saying her mother was sick. "Certainly you may go," said Mrs. Pruette, "only don't stay longer than is necessary, as we need you." A week passed, and not a word from her. Then came a note, which read: "Dear Miss Pruette I will be back next week and please keep my place for me mother is dying as fast as she can."

Little Willie had been very much impressed with his Sunday school lessons, the hymn "Onward, Christian Soldiers" especially taking his fancy, says the Baltimore American. The first Sunday after Christmas he was playing with a box of tin soldiers he had been given, when his mother, who was rather strict in her views, saw and reproved him. "Willie," she said, "do you think it is right to play with your soldiers on Sunday?" "Oh, but mamma," replied Willie, quickly, "these are Christian soldiers."

A Durham farmer was traveling to London to consult a lawyer, when the fear struck him that he had left certain important papers behind. He made a hurried search of his bag, says Tit-Bits. "If I did leave those papers," he remarked, "I'm a fool!" The search proceeded, and a moment later he said: "I believe it'll turn out I'm a fool!" Just as he was examining the last bundle of papers he exclaimed: "Well, I'll bet I'm a fool." A man on the other side of the compartment lowered his newspaper for a moment and said, slowly and deliberately: "Oblige me, sir, by laying a little money that same way for me."

"I married a widow who had a grown-up daughter. My father visited our house very often, fell in love with my step-daughter and married her. So my father became my son-in-law, and my step-daughter my mother, because she was my father's wife. Some time afterwards my wife had a son—he was my father's brother-in-law and my uncle, for he was the brother of my stepmother. My father's wife, i. e. my step-daughter, had also a son; he was, of course, my brother and in the meantime my grandchild, for he was the son of my daughter. My wife was my grandmother, because she was my mother's mother. I was my wife's husband and grandchild at the same time. And as the husband of a person's grandmother is his grandfather, I was my own grandfather."—Old Favorite.

Miss Pearl A. Billings is said to be the youngest hotel woman in Chicago, perhaps in this country. Several years ago she inherited from a cousin the lease, furnishings and good will of the Newberry Hotel. By good management Miss Billings has made it a success without a bar, a thing which the hotel men of Chicago told her would be impossible. Of her fifty employees less than one dozen are men. Miss Nell Billings, her cousin, is the manager, and there are women bookkeepers and clerks.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't. —.

The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants. Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.

[Seal of Superior Court] H. L. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

Memoranda.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:

The City and County of San Francisco, whose address is at the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Part that Political Parties Play.

The new direct primary law was approved by Governor James N. Gifford March 24, 1909, but it did not take effect until June 1st of that year. Its title reads thus: "An act to provide for and regulate primary elections, and providing the method whereby electors of political parties may express their choice at such primary elections for United States Senator."

It is seen at the outset that a voter who does not belong to any political party has no part in the direct primary law. The man without a party must select his candidates, to be voted for at a general election, under the law that provides for going on the ballot by petition. That law, entirely separate from the one under discussion, will be explained in these lessons at the proper time.

It should be understood at the outset that our laws contemplate two kinds of elections, first a primary, or preliminary election, in which the voters within each political party name, or "nominate," their candidates to be voted for at the general election, and then the general election in which all electors may participate whether they belong to a political party or not. Before these voters at the general election is spread out, on what we commonly call a "blanket" ballot, because it is so big, all the nominees of all the political parties and all the names of persons who become candidates by petition. There the issues are settled, not always on party lines, because we are coming to have a great deal of independent voting and the candidate believed by the largest number of voters to be the best man for the place is not unlikely to secure the election no matter how nominated, especially if there be a full vote.

What is a political party, and how does the direct primary law recognize its existence?

The old-time theory of political parties was that men similarly minded in regard to certain issues or candidates would come together and work together for the success of their candidates and the issues in which they believed, and so they did. But it has happened that men so brought together have remained together and worked together long after they had ceased to be of one mind either as to measures or men. In effect they became an association, almost a corporation, for carrying on the business of conducting government and it has been held little short of treasonable for a man to desert the party he had acted with for the purpose of joining another.

Nevertheless, there are splits in all parties. If the discontented element is small it is called a "faction." If it is large the party is said to be divided into two wings, as in the case of the "regulars" and "insurgents" in the Republican party at this time. These factions, or wings, generally fight out their differences in the preliminary elections and then stand together in the general election unless the division of sentiment is very deep and strong, in which case the party ticket is generally "scratched" in the general election (by voting for the candidate of the opposite party) or else a new political party is formed, which does not often happen in this country. The Democratic party has been in existence since 1801 and the Republican since 1856.

Under the laws of California in order to be recognized as a political party a political organization must have cast, at the last presidential election, at least 3 per cent. of the total vote cast, as estimated by the candidate for presidential elector of such party who received the highest vote. If the party did not have a presidential nominee at the last presidential election then it may have a place on the ballot if any one of its candidates at the last general election received 3 per cent. of the total vote cast. Otherwise the party must go on the ballot by petitions signed for all its candidates.

Every elector must be registered on the great register of his county before he can vote at any election, a matter that will be explained at some convenient time, and every voter who wishes to vote at a primary election must declare, upon oath, when he applies to have his name inscribed upon a great register, with what political party he expects to affiliate at the next primary election. If he declines to state what party he expects to affiliate with that fact is recorded and he cannot be given the ballot of any party at any primary election as long as that state of affairs exists. But if an elector, at any time prior to the closing of the registration before an election is to be held, which must be at least twenty days before a primary, concludes to affiliate with some political party, or to change his party affiliation, he may go before the county clerk and, without cost to himself, make affidavit to the fact and so qualify himself to vote at the next primary.

Unless members of a political party will stay on their own side of the party fence in a primary election and let the internal affairs of other parties severely alone a primary election becomes a farce and a fraud. Honest men will stay where they belong, but dishonest men will register their affiliations with the party their boss wishes them to, as many Union Labor Party men did in San Francisco, in the fall of 1909. The success of primary elections is absolutely dependent upon fidelity in this particular, and the penalty for a general lack of good faith will be the destruction of political parties in our political life.

A couple from a Central Kansas farm went to the Shirley hotel for dinner last night. They looked like bride and groom, says the Denver Post. Their meal included some sliced tomatoes for the young man. He ate them with a relish. When the tomatoes were gone he discovered a queer-looking dish, containing a queer-looking fluid, on the table. He called the young woman's attention to it. "What's that for, Lulu?" he asked. The waitress was standing near. She overheard the question. "That's for the tomatoes," she said. "It's dressing that is put on tomatoes." "Oh, pshaw, Lulu!" said the young man. "I've already eat my tomatoes. I can't put this dressin' on 'em now." "Yes, you kin," she replied. "Drink it." And he did.

What It Is All About.

THE CITY OF BROTHERLY LOVE is in the hands of a mob. The occasion is a strike of car men. The cause is the discharge of men because they belonged to a union that waged a strike a year ago. By agreement the men were to return without prejudice. They have been weeded out ever since in the interests of "loyal" men, meaning non-union, discharged for the "good of the service." Public sympathy would have been with the strikers but for the violence done. Rioting is as stupid as it is brutal, but we should remember in charity that it is not long since Protestant and Catholic, those who stood for freeing the slave and those who did not, enacted just such scenes as are now taking place in Philadelphia. It is the price that society pays for allowing private warfare to determine an issue that should be determined by a lawful hearing and determining.

Chief Bluffer.

MANY FRIENDS OF HOME RULE for Ireland are concerned through fear that John Redmond may become so intoxicated with his new-found power that he will go too far and demand so much as to provoke a revolt of British sentiment against the whole Irish program. There is some danger of it, but the chances are that John is now merely bluffing for home consumption and that he will content himself with what he can get and fall into line with the Liberals in organizing a stable government.

The League of Justice.

A CONFERENCE OF MEMBERS of the League of Justice is to be held this (Thursday) evening. The League should show no loss of spirit. The idea for which it stands is eternally right. The movement deserves to be national in scope. The administration of the criminal law is a reproach to the national life. Some organization must make the remedying of this evil the one thing it will do, and the League of Justice may as well undertake that service as any other organization. The California Weekly tenders its best services and most heartily.

Glavis.

THE DISPATCHES EMPHASIZE only the sensational features of the testimony taken in the Ballinger investigation. This makes it difficult to form a correct idea of what is being accomplished, but The California Weekly gathers that Mr. Glavis, who stepped down from the grill this week, acquitted himself admirably. He told the whole truth instead of so much of it as suited the purposes of Mr. Ballinger's attorney. This became tiresome to some members of the committee who evinced more desire to hurry on than to get to the bottom of the case, but Glavis came out of the ordeal unshaken.

A Man of Sorrows.

THE PREFACE to President Taft's Newark, New Jersey, address touches the heart. He feels sore all through at a press that has handled him, not untenderly, yet with a familiarity that has bred contempt on his part. No one pretends that the President has not done the best he could. His devotion is not to be questioned, but there is doubt as to his capacity as an executive of a great nation. Perhaps he would do well, as he himself intimated, to begin all over and, next time, appeal to his friends instead of to his enemies to help him through with his policies and, above all, appeal to the American people instead of to the machinery of his party. It is not enough that a president do his best. He must do the best thing to be done,

They Out-Roosevelt Roosevelt.

A POSSIBLE REASON why Theodore Roosevelt prefers to return by way of New York instead of San Francisco is that California has developed a few Roosevelters that so out-Roosevelt Roosevelt as to make him a small toad in the reform puddle. Alden Anderson has lately become a terrific Roosevelter, but it was different in the winter of 1907 when he was trying to hold the banks of Sacramento together because of what was then called the "Roosevelt" panic. And Charley Curry, too! What a come-outer he has become! Beside that glowing orb of reform the Roosevelt policies merely twinkle.

A Wide Open-and-Shut Town.

IT WILL BE GOOD NEWS to those who like it that many persons in San Francisco are availing themselves of Mayor McCarthy's proffered opportunity to "touch elbows" and "exchange ideas," always "within the law." Some forty-odd clubs have been licensed and more are in process of evolution. To be sure, the expectation is that "elbows" will mainly be "touched" over card tables, that the "exchanges of ideas" will be effected by means of red, white or blue "chips" and that to be behind barred doors will be to be "within the law." If these suspicions be less than well founded then are many gentlemen investing good money to small purpose.

Got Flint To Wobbling.

MR JUSTICE HENSHAW and Mr. Walter F. X. Parker have been in Washington seeking to get Senator Flint to withdraw his withdrawal from the senatorial race and Justice Henshaw has declared that they "Got Flint to wobbling." Perhaps they made it clear to him that the matter of expense of making the campaign need not stand in his way. As for the part which Mr. Walter F. X. Parker plays in these negotiations no exceptions may be taken. He is a proper potentiary to send upon such an errand, but when did it become any part of the duty of a justice of the supreme court of California to make even Frank Flint "wobbly"? Justice may be tempered to advantage by mercy, but never by politics.

Cryptogramania.

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY does not know what the cryptogramic hullabaloo the Chronicle has kicked up amounts to. It should be laid before the grand jury without delay, but the circumstance of publication is attended with suspicion. It was the Chronicle that "played it up." Mr. Calhoun is greatly shocked. It is made public, after months of delay, on the eve of the alleged retrial of Mr. Calhoun. These three facts taken together wear a mighty ominous look.

Spoiling for a Fight.

IT IS EVIDENT that the United Railroads do not propose to see the Geary municipal line inaugurated without a struggle. The management of that corporation appears to be spoiling for a fight with the city. Perhaps it will never find San Francisco less adequately prepared for such a contest than now when its government is in the hands of men whom the head of the United Railroads was instrumental in electing. But two years soon roll around, and San Francisco will be here two hundred years from now, while Patrick Calhoun will not. There is no hurry. Any gauge of battle the United Railroads throws down should be taken up. If, as Mr. Mullally affirms, San Francisco has no constitutional right to enter upon municipal railroad enterprises the state can be induced to confer that right. A traction system resting upon bribery and fraud can not be looked to for an adequate, safe and just system of transportation.

IS THE PRESIDENT'S PROGRAM PETERING OUT?

The President began his administration with as fine an assortment of reform measures in hand as his heart could wish. It would have been unreasonable to expect them all to be accomplished within the first year of his administration. He will do well if they are written into the statutes during the four years for which he has been elected, but the public mind is beginning to wonder whether or not he is going to secure the adoption of any of his recommendations at this session.

It goes without saying that the people are looking to the President rather than to Congress for legislation, partly for the reason that the people feel that they have the President with them while they are not so sure about Congress. So far as the organizations of Senate and House are concerned the popular belief is that the interests have them so securely that the people's champion, the President, may not be able to extort anything from them worth while. Nevertheless, the test of Presidential prowess is and must be his ability to get from Congress the legislation that the public good requires. If he succeeds he will, in the public mind, be a success, and if he fails he will be a failure.

But let us first give him credit for what he has achieved. He got the income tax amendment to the constitution of the United States submitted to the states and he got a national incorporation tax law enacted. He did not get the tariff revised downward far enough to count for anything and his tariff commission, upon whose labors he builds such great hopes, is merely a vestige of what the good of the service so urgently requires.

In an off-hand way the Taft program, at the assembling of Congress in December last, may be outlined as follows: The appointment of a commission to revise the procedure of the United States courts; legislation restraining the abuse of the power of injunction in labor disputes, a ship subsidy bill; the wiping out of the postal deficiency; the issuance of bonds in aid of the Reclamation Service; postal savings banks; statutory power to withdraw from entry public lands for reservation purposes; the admission of Arizona and New Mexico as states; a National incorporation law; National control of water power privileges on government lands; the establishment of a central transportation court; the strengthening of the Interstate Commerce law.

Here are twelve measures of greater or less importance. Of these the appointment of a commission to reform the procedures of United States courts appears to have been forgotten; the ship subsidy bill has gone overboard; the postal deficiency is being allowed to take care of itself; the issuance of bonds for the relief of the Reclamation Service, to overcome a technical objection raised by Ballinger, slumbers in a state of unconsciousness; National control of water power privileges totters on the verge of failure.

Arizona and New Mexico seem likely to be admitted as states. It were better that they waited a decade longer. They are not yet fit. An illiterate Mexican people makes up too large a percentage of the population, and some very poor legislative timber is almost certain to be sent from these states to Senate and House, or they will open the way for the political advancement of some more Guggenheims.

It is doubtful if any national incorporation law will be enacted at this session. The interests are afraid of it and some of the states are hostile. It is too good a thing to be adopted without first being made to fit the views of the interests, by which time it will be too bad a thing to be made the law of the land.

The postal savings banks bill may come through in some form; a central transportation court may be created and the Interstate Commerce commission somewhat strengthened. It is probable that the President's power to withdraw public lands from entry, a power that has been exercised by many Presidents, and was never brought into question until the advent of the unfortunate Ballinger, will be confirmed.

Cancelling out the measures that are not of great importance to the country, measures that do not make for efficient control of those interests that are threatening the destruction of free institutions, about all that is left of the President's ambitious program is the strengthening of the interstate commerce law, and it remains to be seen what that will amount to. Those measures have not yet taken their final form and therefore can not yet be judged.

It looks at this distance as if the President's legislative program might be "petering out."

WAKE UP, YOUNG MAN!

Wake up, young man! No era in the world's history has had greater need for such as you than the present era. These are not piping times of peace. They are times of struggle, of stress, of strenuous endeavor. A great revolution is now in progress and the demand is for you to bear a man's part in it. Will you do it? Take a thought as to the meaning of it and then answer.

The Civil War marked the end of one great struggle for human rights and the solidarity of this nation. With peace came the need for rehabilitating the fortunes of the American people, north and south. A great, new continent lay open inviting hazards of new fortunes. The Civil War had given American manhood a lesson in power. The value of railroads had come to be understood. Here was an escape valve for the surplus energies of a buoyant and enterprising people. The winning of the West, the building of railroads, the enhanced consuming power of the nation and a protective tariff fostered manufacture and production. Every wheel turned and spindle hummed. The waste of the war was soon made good. The fortunes of the people were speedily rehabilitated.

But enterprise did not stop there. In the work of rehabilitation of impaired fortunes money-making came to be the supreme passion of great men. They saw nothing else worthy of any man's endeavor. They were swept off their feet. They lost their bearings with relation to the stars in their courses. In their greed of gain they scrupled not to coin into money the blood of countless thousands of their faithful workers so that industry became more destructive of life than war. Every effort made by society and government to mitigate the risks of labor was resisted and is still being resisted to the uttermost. Womanhood was drafted into service because cheaper than manhood and worked longer hours to the impairment of motherhood. Even now an effort to limit by law the hours of a day's labor for women to ten is being resisted with all the power that legal talent can afford. Little children were dragged into the shops, deprived of their childhood, their health and their opportunities for education merely that they might augment the swollen fortunes of persons already rich beyond human need.

Nor is the foregoing more than a part of the indictment against that passion for money-making that for nearly half a century has ruled our American life like a madness. Our forests have been slaughtered, our mines spoliated and our soil mined rather than cultivated. The men of this generation have robbed the heritage of their own children. So thoroughly do men see this that the word "conservation" is now on every tongue.

Nor are these the gravest wrongs that have been inflicted. That rapacity which has ruled our commerce and industry has ruled our government. By hiring men of astute minds and crippled consciences to devote their whole time and thought to methods of subverting free government, that end has been attained until congresses, legislatures, executive offices, courts of justice and political parties have come to be the bond servants of as unscrupulous a plutocracy as ever cursed humanity.

Here, then, young American manhood, is your task cut out for you. It is to undo what your fathers have been doing during the last five-and-forty years. The denuded mountains and hillsides have got to be reforested; the filled-up rivers dredged, jettied, rectified and commerce restored to them; the mines have got to be so supervised as to guarantee that all the wealth, not merely that most accessible and profitable, shall be extracted; the exhausted soils, which a single generation has bereaved of their virgin fertility, have got to have their fecundity restored to them that they may feed the children of men to the end of time.

To these ends government must be restored to the people from whom it has been filched; statesmanship must be revived and made an honorable profession as it was in the days of your great-grandfathers; agriculture must become a learned profession and a premium must be put upon expert knowledge in all the walks of life. Somehow the common good must, in the minds of men, become the supreme good and the common earnings of a hundred million people must be distributed among a hundred millions and not among a hundred thousand, to the end that fortunes, so colossal as to stagger the imaginations of men, may not be vested in a few patrician families to their eventual destruction and to the deprivation of those who toil all through life only to become dependents in age. You are to set higher, more intelligent and juster standards by which American manhood may order its life. Wealth is desirable if it be rightly gained. There must be no limitation upon honorable enterprise, but what does it profit a man or a nation to gain wealth at the cost of all that is finest in life and truth and patriotism?

AN UNFORTUNATE PARAGRAPH.

In referring to the efforts of the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to make up and lay before the Republicans of California a state ticket for their adoption or rejection at the August primaries the Santa Cruz News has this to say:

"All this is foreign to the very spirit of the new primary law, which contemplates that there shall be no conventions, no secret political meetings, no indorsements, but that all men shall have equal chance to win a party nomination and subsequent election. It ill becomes the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, at the very inception of the campaign, to subvert the very letter and spirit of this law, and to resort to the very devices which it condemns in the older party organizations."

No man possessing less ability than Editor Devlin could put into eighty-three words a larger number of mis-statements or make them more glaring than he has done in the foregoing paragraph. He defies competition. It will take many more words to set him right, but it is important that the public understand the spirit and purpose of the direct primary law. This is our excuse for a somewhat extended analysis of Editor Devlin's unfortunate paragraph.

According to the view of the Santa Cruz News the new direct primary law pre-supposes that only those persons who volunteer their services to the public are to be voted for at a direct primary, for there are to be no conventions, no political meetings, no endorsements, nothing but the nomination papers.

What is to be done, then, where the office is seeking the man rather than the man the office? Are all to do as Mr. Curry has done, construct a machine and spend years in laying wires to attain an entirely personal ambition? Is that the spirit of the new direct primary law?

The spirit of the direct primary law relies on associated initiative, on the expectation that patriotic citizens will come together for consultation, for canvassing the field with the view of picking the best man for each place and, having reached a consensus of opinion as to that man, go after that man and draft him into the public service, even at a considerable sacrifice on his part. This is exactly what the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has done and is doing through its executive committee.

The need for this power of associated initiative is all the greater in California for the reason that, for more than a generation, candidates have been brought forward, or bought over a convention bargain counter, by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. There has been no other avenue open to state office and, with here and there an exception, self-respecting men, men fit to be in office, have turned their faces against public life rather than humiliate themselves by accepting preferment at that price. Hence we have been governed mainly by second, third or fourth-class men. The direct primary gives opportunity to bring out men of first-class calibre and it is men of this class for whom the League is seeking.

It has been said that if everybody knew what everybody said about everybody there would not be two friends in the world. What sense would there be, then, in holding with open doors and newspaper men present, heart to heart talks over candidates, discussing them up one side and down the other, to have all that any man said about any other man spread before the breakfast tables of the entire state the next morning? Does Mr. Herrin call in the reporters when he confers with Mr. Lynch or Mr. Parker, Mr. Burke or Mayor McCarthy? He would not long remain outside a state hospital if he were to do so.

The acts of the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League are public, and so are most of its conferences, but when it takes up the consideration of candidates, to be discussed frankly and fully pro and con, it very properly and necessarily goes into executive session. And so will the members of every other pre-primary conference held in this state! If any such conference assumes the proportions of a convention the executive conferences will have been held in advance of the convention, for it is a rule in every convention that an advocate may say what he wishes to in favor of, but nothing against, any candidate.

This process is not inconsistent with a free chance for all to win a nomination before the people. The ticket presented to Republican voters by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will have nothing to commend it except, first, the characters of the men composing that ticket and, second, the characters of the men who made up the ticket and offered it to Republican voters with their commendation. The presumption is not violent that the ticket so presented will be esteemed by the people to be a better ticket than the one to be offered by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company; also that the characters of the men who make up the League ticket will rank higher than the characters of the men who compose the Southern Pacific Political Bureau.

Instead of condemning the process of evolving a Republican primary ticket followed by the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, when followed by others, that method is commended to all interests, factions, groups, or handfuls of men desirous of presenting candidates to be voted for at the August primary as the very best and fairest one that has yet been devised. And the field is wide open. Fortunate will the state be if the devices resorted to by the "organization" shall be as void of offense!

The Issue In Plain Terms.

Word has gone out to papers under the domination of the "organization" element in the Republican party giving the cue to "play up" the need for a state ticket composed of conservative men instead of such radicals as the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is likely to name. They would make the issue conservative vs. radical.

But the central issue is not a question of being conservative or being radical. It is an issue between domination by the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau and government by the free suffrages of an unpurchased manhood. It is not radicalism to stand for free government. It is not conservatism to acquiesce in corporation domination. The one is patriotism, the other is treason, and nothing else can be made of it. That is the true issue and by the records of the respective candidates and the records of their sponsors, not by what they say, shall they be known. No candidate ever talked more bravely than did James N. Gillett four years ago and no Governor was ever more subservient to corporate influence than he has been. Those who bite again at the old bait will richly deserve to be hooked.

We Move to Reconsider.

We do not know how much foundation there is for the report that a number of the McCarthy supervisors, on returning from an inspection of the Spring Valley plant, expressed themselves as of the opinion that McCarthy had made a mistake in opposing the Spring Valley purchase, but that he did make such a mistake should become more and more apparent as the subject is considered.

It is not of Spring Valley that we are thinking. It has no claim upon consideration. It has been an enemy to the civic life of San Francisco for more than one generation.

But that system is not only necessary to a municipal water system but stands in the way of obtaining such a system. As explained before in these columns, the American congress is extremely tender of rights of property and any public enterprise that contemplates the confiscation or destruction of a corporately owned system in which many millions are invested will affect congress and the national administration most unfavorably. In fine, it will block the whole Hetch Hetchy enterprise unless that objection is removed.

Mayor McCarthy should reconsider his action and the people of San Francisco should reconsider the vote whereby they turned the Spring Valley proposal down. The vote stands square across the road to a Sierra Water system.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Those of us who were brought up in what we may call a Puritan atmosphere will remember with what abhorrence we, in our childhood, should have regarded going hunting on Sunday. Fishing was thought to be quite wicked enough on that day, but to shoot, to make a big noise, why that put the guilty person beyond the pale of civilization. To our minds he was an outlaw from that day forth, abhorred by all proper persons.

The purpose of this chapter is neither to approve nor to condemn the change of our institutions which has gone on with the decay of Puritanism and the adaptation, if not adoption, of continental European standards to American life. Our purpose is to speak of the capacity to abhor.

The writer of this meets men, almost daily, and now and again a woman, who appear to have lost that capacity. Perceiving some good in a bad man they qualify his badness by his goodness, usually a form of goodness that is temperamental rather than grounded in character, such as courage or generosity, or money-honesty, until the badness seems no longer to be very bad no matter how seriously it may have debauched those with whom it came in contact. Can we afford to lose the power to abhor? Can we afford to have our children enter into adult life without ever having acquired that power?

In a southern city Madam Vincent took over her husband's saloon when he died and conducted it successfully. As she prospered she extended her financial operations to the ownership and operation of a house of ill repute, which she tore down and built greater until, with its gardens and its architectural excellence, it came near to being one of the show spots of the city. If a band played in the streets there was, in a moment, a bedizened female at each one of the multitudinous windows. When the yellow fever came she sent her inmates all to places of safety, converted the great building into a hospital for the homeless stricken in the streets, herself took charge of it, sickened and died. She almost came to be canonized as a heroine. Brave she was and generous, too, but not in all that city lived there a more abhorrent creature than she, yet people generally forgot that it was so. Courage and generosity, the two flowers that so often thrive in the muck of human depravity, seem to be all the more beautiful because of, but do not atone for, the muck. They should not move us to abhor the muck much the less for their blooming. The balancing of the equation of good and evil in each one we must leave to God. It is our business to hate evil and to teach our children so to do.

There are people who have so cultivated the quality of impartiality as to be no longer able to render a decision. They part their hair and their minds with a scratch-awl and as truly as a meridian line. They are incapable of jury service because they can reach no verdict. They love nothing with zeal, hate nothing to the degree of abhorrence and are wonderfully inconsequential, but in so far as they do count for anything it is for breaking down the barriers betwixt good and evil, barriers that can never be too strong or too high.

There is room for difference of opinion as to how far the life of a child should be sheltered and how far it should be permitted to know evil, and the consequences of evil, that the child may be made strong to resist, but of one thing we may be sure, no child will be strong to resist an evil that he has not been taught to abhor. The mind of the child can entertain no fine discriminations. If it hate not evil it will love it. The child paints all its ideals in yellows and reds, blacks and whites. It is not until the hair begins to silver that men and women can grow tolerant of evil with safety, that they can venture to tone down their ideals of good and evil with tints and shades and a mellow running of one color into another. And it is not always safe even then.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Our Multi-Millionaire Senators.

That property interests in the United States are not likely to be overlooked or neglected in the United States Senate is quite generally understood. If, however, there were any doubt of it probably the following facts would remove it: There are 92 Senators, and of these the following (almost one-fourth of the entire number) are multi-millionaires, each being estimated to be worth the number of millions published in connection with his name: Guggenheim of Colorado, $50,000,000; Elkins of West Virginia, $25,000,000; Stephenson of Wisconsin, $20,000,000; Warren of Wyoming, $15,000,000; Nixon of Nevada, $15,000,000; Oliver of Pennsylvania, $15,000,000; Crane of Massachusetts, $10,000,000; Aldrich of Rhode Island, $10,000,000; Wetmore of Rhode Island, $10,000,000; Dupont of Delaware, $8,000,000; Depew of New York, $5,000,000; Hughes of Colorado, $5,000,000; Kean of New Jersey, $5,000,000; Newlands of Nevada, $5,000,000; Lodge of Massachusetts, $5,000,000; Smoot of Utah, $5,000,000; Hale of Maine, $3,000,000; Root of New York, $3,000,000; Brandegee of Connecticut, $3,000,000. Besides these, there are some eight or ten others who are estimated to be worth a million or more each, and those who have less than a quarter of a million or so almost could be counted on the fingers of one's two hands. Yes, there is at least a strong probability that there will be no neglect of property interests, and also that other interests will be looked after, if they do not conflict. And, by the way, considering that list, will somebody name anything that a United States Senatorship guarantees concerning its possessor, save that he probably has money?

Order Your Aeroplane Now.

The aeroplane, which last year was an experiment, this year is an accomplished reality, and it becomes more and more evident that henceforth the atmosphere is to be added to man's navigable domain. Already, this year, more than 600 of the machines, of various types, have been ordered, to be delivered by the opening of the spring season, and the demand so far outruns the supply that speculators are making money by insuring immediate delivery at considerable advances on list prices. It is estimated that more than $300,000,000 will be spent this year for aeroplanes, and this estimate does not include the price of housing the machines, transportation, maintenance, etc. All these things included, it is probable that $600,000,000 would no more than cover the entire cost, which sum, judiciously invested, by the way, might insure comfort throughout the year for every poverty-stricken man, woman and child in the country. The prices of various machines, of course, differ greatly, running from the cheap Demoiselle, which was invented by Santos Dumont, listed at $1,000, up to the costly Antoinette monoplane, which is listed at $10,000. Among the nations France now leads in aeroplane manufacture, but the indications are that the day is not far distant when America will overtake her. There seems to be a fair prospect that it will not be long until the sight of an aeroplane will be nearly or quite as common as that of an automobile.

Automobile Industry Also Booming.

From consideration of aeroplanes to that of automobiles is a natural and easy step, and it may as well be taken. In 1903 about 11,000 automobiles were sold. Six years later, or in 1909, the output increased to about 115,000 of the machines. That is to say, in this brief time the output increased nearly 1,000 per cent. It is respectfully submitted that this was "going some," and yet the speed is to be accelerated in the immediate future, for it is estimated that 150,000 machines will be manufactured and sold during the present year, an increase of fully 30 per cent over last year. Presuming that the purchase price of the machines will average about $2,000 each, the total amount paid for them this year will be about $300,000,000. Last year the value of our exports was $6,890,000, which was about double that of our imports. Manufacturers everywhere are enlarging the capacity of their plants, and it appears evident that this is to be the automobile age—at any rate, until the aeroplane comes in.

The Growth of Galveston.

The growth of Galveston, Texas, in commercial importance is among the phenomenal business developments of this age of business. About ten and one-half years ago the city was practically obliterated by the great storm and ocean waves which swept over it. Hardly more than a decade has passed, and last year the value of its exports exceeded those of any other city in the United States, with the sole exception of New York. They were one-third greater than those of New Orleans, the other great Southern seaport city, and were about one-half greater than those of such cities as Boston and Baltimore. Moreover, Galveston's $189,464,335 of exports were greater than those of all the Pacific Coast ports combined, a fact more gratifying to a Texan than to a Californian. Of course the export of cotton has much to do with this phenomenal record, but the southwestern railroads are making the city a center for exports of all kinds. Galveston still is a comparatively small city, but it cannot remain so if such a condition of affairs continues, as it appears likely to do.

Value and Progress of Irrigation.

Up to two years ago, it is estimated that 11,000,000 acres of land had been placed under irrigation in this country by governmental or private enterprise, and the work has progressed faster since that time than at any time theretofore. It is believed that eventually the area of irrigated land will amount to fully 30,000,000 acres which will support one million families of, say, five persons each, or a total of five million individuals. Moreover, as is generally understood, this irrigated land will be, in its productive capacity, the most valuable in the country. How valuable it will be is indicated by the fact that it is estimated that land reached by the Salt River irrigation project, in Arizona, will be worth from $100 to $750 an acre; that under the Uncompahgre, Colorado, project from $75 to $500 an acre, while estimates place the value of that under the Okanagan and Yakima projects, in Washington, as high as $1,500 to $2,500 an acre. Many millions of dollars have gone into these enterprises, but the expenditure will be abundantly justified in giving to the generations to come a rich asset in productive land.

What We Pay for War's Equipment.

In connection with the subject of irrigation, but bearing indirectly upon it, some facts to which Secretary of Agriculture Wilson calls attention in a recent article are fairly apropos. It costs the United States government $55,000 to make a 12-inch gun, and this sum would reclaim 1,571 acres of land, which would provide homes for 196 people. The value of 196 homes paid to provide but one gun of the equipment of a navy! When all the guns of our fleet have been fired once the salute has cost the government $150,000, or sufficient to reclaim 4,000 acres as homes for 500 people. And these, mark you, are but trivial costs as compared with the total of those of our navy and army. On the whole, can anybody doubt that we pay tremendously high for the privilege of carrying a chip on our shoulder or seeing that our neighbor does not? And is it not time for good citizens to resolve to do their little toward creating the sentiment which eventually will put an end to this mad folly with which our "Christian civilization" burdens itself?

Changed Names Made Illustrious.

In a decision recently handed down by Judge Irving G. Vann of the New York Court of Appeals, in which he decided that any man may change his name without legal formalities, he called attention to names which have been changed by those who made the alias illustrious. Here are a few of them: Melancthon was born to the name of Schwartz-erde, but, not liking it, he changed it to the name he made famous. Rembrandt was a Gertz, and himself changed the name to Van Rhyn. The rightful name of Honore de Balzac was Guez, but one of his ancestors, who also was a writer, changed it to that the great novelist bore. The names of Voltaire, Moliere, Dante, Petrarch, Richelieu, Loyola, Erasmus and Linnaeus were assumed. The Duke of Wellington's grandfather was a Colley who assumed the name of Wesley, which later was expanded to the name England's great general bore. These are a few of the illustrations given by Judge Vann.

"As You Like It."

"Life as we live it is a pretty crude, harsh, contrary, disappointing thing," said Shakespeare to himself one day, "so, to amuse you and make you happy for an hour I will write you a play, in which man will be the arbiter of destiny, everything turn out well, and life will be 'As You Like It.'"

So said—we may imagine it so, at least—so done. And how beautifully done! Who more winsome than Rosalind, more feminine than Celia, more noble than the banished Duke, where a more manly youth than Orlando, a more delightful, saturnine disciple of gentle melancholy than Jacques, a more endearing type of loyalty than Adam? And where a more enticing spot than the forest or Arden, where brooks so musical, vistas more inviting? Where and who, in short, is and are a more "As you like it" land of day dreams come true and characters such as we would be and know?

"Sweet are the uses of adversity," but how sweeter to enter this ideal land of lightly borne misfortunes where the guilty repent instead of forcing the hand of retribution, and where the innocent suffer but mildly to win the great reward. Admirable is Shakespeare in tragedy, moving and just, but, before treading the terrible paths of Macbeth and Lear and Hamlet, learn first to love the gentle bard while life was still to him only a joyous pageant warmed by a summer sun and echoing with happy laughter.

EDMOND ROSTAND, THE MAN.

Next after Edmond Rostand's love for the theater, comes his deep attachment for his lovely home at Cambo, in the south of France, writes Edith Heyer in the Springfield Republican. On this house he has spent a small fortune. He has had one garden made exactly like that at le Petit Trianon, and he has a special gardener to care for it. In another part of his grounds he has a complete English garden. His possessions at Cambo are on a hill, and he has had a clear, limpid spring led there from afar. This French poet has worked marvels at Cambo. It is truly an ideal French home.

Rostand, like De Musset, Balzac and George Sand, is a night owl, and works at his desk into the small hours. Victor Hugo was always up working at his desk at dawn of day, and prided himself on making 50 verses before he took his morning walk. Hugo loved to go to bed early, he was considered a good bourgeois in that respect.

Edmond Rostand goes to bed very late and rises very late. At Cambo he comes down to breakfast about 1 o'clock. As soon as he is seated at table he interests himself about his guests, if there happen to be any present; then reads the news and discusses the questions of the day. After the meal he holds long conversations over his coffee and cigar. Then he walks about the grounds and finally goes back to his study and settles down to work. Every one knows of Rostand's conversational powers. Coquelin has said a thousand times that the author of "Cyrano," if he had wished, could have been an excellent actor, perhaps even greater than as an author. Flattering offers have been made Rostand to go on the stage.

Once at Marseilles, where Rostand was obliged himself to interpret the principal part of "Les Romanesques," at the end of the performance, when his compatriots were wildly applauding, an English impresario presented himself to Rostand in his box and said: "Mon-sieur, I have come to offer you 200 francs per night for a series of performances in London." The Englishman was quite ignorant to whom he was speaking.

Rostand said: "But I am the poet himself." "Ah, is that so!" said the phlegmatic Englishman, "you are Edmond Rostand. Very well, then, I will make it 400 francs a night!" One wonders what this Briton would offer the poet today.

Rostand has two sons who are astonishingly precocious. Maurice, the elder, has a bent for literature, and is quite an original youthful poet; Jean, the younger, is a born naturalist. At Cambo he monopolizes all the empty boxes in which to put his classified insects. He has set up a regular scientific little laboratory, and his tutor predicts for Jean a brilliant career as a scientist.

Edmond Rostand speaks of his own life thus: "Well! when I was 20 years old I knew no one in Paris, not a single artist or literary man. I lived in the most bourgeois surroundings. I amused myself making verses, without the least idea that I should ever become a poet. Then I acted comedies with a young lady, who finally became my wife. One day when we had no play to act, the idea came to me to write one myself—a dialogue in verse. My wife, who was then studying diction, read it with enthusiasm, as has happened frequently since. I carried the play off to Jules Claretie, who thought it charming and said it must be acted. I was for form's sake to read it to the committee. I was delighted. Just fancy it! A work of mine to be acted in 'Maison de Moliere'! I said to my wife: 'When we grow old we shall tell our children that actually one of my plays has been given at the house of Moliere, la Comedie Francaise.' The play was turned down by the committee. This was the beginning of my schooling in patience."

Not long since it was my good fortune to be at St. Jeane-de-Luz, not far from Cambo, so I know that section of France well. Rostand's house at Cambo is situated where the river Nive rapidly and noisily runs toward the river Adour and the little stream called Arnaga. The villa stands on the hill commanding a sweep of the whole beautiful country about. The house is suggestive of an old Basque homestead. It is spacious, light and filled with a sense of joyousness. It seems to laugh from the hilltop at the oaks and ferns below, and the old ivy clings lovingly about the tree stumps as if to deck them in verdant beauty. The Villa Arnaga is easily reached in three-quarters of an hour in an automobile from St. Jean-de-Luz.

Mme. Rostand is a fine-looking, gracious woman, and a good poetess herself. They are an ideal couple, being thoroughly in touch with each other. She is Rostand's good intellectual comrade.

Justice David J. Brewer, of the United States Supreme court, is the author of four books, two of which are on religious subjects. Justice Brewer is a native of Smyrna, Asia Minor, the son of a missionary. He is also a trustee of a great life insurance company.

Californian Poets' Corner

LET THERE BE LIGHT.

(The University of California Hymn.)

By Charles Mills Gayley.

Father of lights, with whom no change
Nor shadow of return
Hath been, or ever star could range
Or sun begin to burn.

O Thou, from whom all power proceeds
To bless Thy worlds with birth,
Bestow on us the Light that leads
To fuller life on earth.

The truth that maketh not ashamed,
The love that maketh one,
The will to lift Thy weak and maimed—
So shall Thy will be done!

And all the praise to Thee be given
For all Thy gifts to us.
Let there be Light in earth as heaven,
O Light most glorious.

OF THE DRESS OF BOOKS.

It is a lofty contemplation of books that can ignore the dress in which we handle them and think only of the thoughts contained in them. And any true lover of books may easily imagine these exaltations.

But, for all that, we feel toward books as toward our wives, we would that they should be set off as well in dress as may be, and feel, when we see them so, not that we love them better, but that we have shown our love toward them the better by providing the carnal trappings. So we would have our best beloved books becomingly arrayed. I can conceive admiring Bacon's splendid prose and subtle wisdom in the type and binding of a Nick Carter detective tale, but I should feel, if I bought him in such guise, except out of dire necessity, that I had put an unbearable indignity upon a great and worthy friend.

In a word, books have each a style of dress appropriate to themselves. I have a fondness for the new feather-weight paper on which many English editions are now printed, and a like fondness for the moderate-size, easy faces of type, but I should not care to have those same Bacon's Essays so dressed in my book case. A weighty man, Bacon, for all his clearness and grace and wit. Give him to me on strong, heavy paper, with rather square type, and bound substantially in sober colors with some leather at the back. I shall then feel that my minister, judge, philosopher and logician comes to me in proper robes and doublet, not like some modern pantalooned varlet in a waiter's undress, with a stained shirt bosom.

For Charles Lamb, give me quite another guise. Here is a nimble-wit, a punster, a lover of "whim-whams," skipping from green-room to old china and thence to the South Sea house, full of pranks and fun. Dress him gaily, margin him with Punches and pig-tails and actors' masks, print him in a skipping face of type, give him large room and light paper, and bind him in joyous colors. Heaven forbid we should prison his books as they prisoned his body, in that dingy clerk's office on a high stool.

Give me "The Ancient Mariner" in a dull red binding, with some richness of paper, and those ghastly Dore illustrations. Never mind what Ruskin said about Dore; that was true enough, but the same is true of Coleridge, and the two are from the same strange unreal world and belong together.

So with all my books. "Tom Sawyer," in the old original blue covers and with Kemble's drawings was a perfect combination. Perdition capture these modern "uniform editions," blighting the blessed individuality of books under a dolorous sand-stone-front, sepulchral sameness of binding, and washing all the character and life out of the pictures with their vile "wash-drawings"—admirably suggestive of "washed-out." The insolence of the modern publisher and the presumption of the new illustrator is here as intolerable as in those base attempts to replace the lovable atrocities with which Thackeray illuminated his own manuscripts.

Here is the weakness of the otherwise admirable and laudable "Everyman's Library"—laudable because it does bring the classics in at least respectable dress to every man's door, however humble—that it takes no thought of this correspondence between the substance of books and the dress of them. The binding they have chosen is good, but the gilt titles, with a lot of gaudy, pirouetting design of scrolls and tracery, the same for the sombre "Opium Eater" as for the lit and passion of Burns, is a grotesque affront to the taste of a sensitive lover of books.

But let that pass. The thing to say is that print and paper and binding, subsidiary though they are to true afflatus of the author's soul, do yet subtly react upon the reader, as much as illustrations do, and should be chosen with no less care for books one cares to live with.

ORGANIZING CHARITABLE WORK

THE AGGRESSIVE WORK OF THE ASSOCIATED CHARITIES.

The Associated Charities of San Francisco performs a double function. This organization is the clearing house of charitable work, the place where a record is kept of practically all the people to whom aid has been extended at any time by any of the leading charitable organizations. This is a most useful service, for it prevents duplications of aid, and it guards the various organizations against fraud and against that class of indigents whom one application of charity makes paupers and who seek thereafter to live upon the good will of the public. Before aid is granted or before applicants are recommended to affiliated bodies for relief, the applicant's name is looked up in the files, and the facts determined about his previous appeals.

Another branch of the police function—if the term may be used—is the investigation by the Associated Charities of the various charitable organizations themselves on behalf of the contributing public. For many years fake charitable institutions were organized by sharpers, who maintained enough unfortunates to make a showing of results, and who, on the strength of the slim work, obtained large subscriptions from merchants and the general public, the greater part of which they pocketed themselves. Another form of spurious charity was the fake "home-finding" society for orphan and abandoned children. The genuine home-finding societies are among the noblest and most useful of charitable organizations, but some of their fake imitators perpetrated unbelievable outrages against helpless children, such, for instance, as selling children committed to their care into actual slavery amongst the Chinese. The promoters of these agencies obtained money from the public on the plea of their good works, and other money from the people to whom they sold the children as virtual slaves—white people buy children in this way, too—thus making double money by "playing both ends against the middle," the middle being, in these cases, the most helpless and pitiable of all objects of charity.

The exposure of these various fraudulent bodies led to co-operation between the Merchants' Association and the Associated Charities, the two together investigating all organizations appealing to the public for funds, and issuing annually a bulletin of endorsed charities—that is, of charities directed by people who are of undoubted sincerity and good intentions, and managed upon lines that indicate a fair return in good works upon the money handled.

But these are rather the negative purposes and functions of the Associated Charities. These are not enough to give vitality to the organization—and to become convinced of its vitality, one has only to walk through the building at Larkin and Jackson street, where a group of highly skilled charity workers are straining every nerve in an intense conflict with poverty and distress and suffering.

This kind of vitality comes from a positive and aggressive ideal of constructive work. It is more than a desire to prevent fraud and to weed out beggars. It is an earnest wish to go out into the city and find the needy that they may be succored, to find the sick that they may be healed, to find the distressed that they may be relieved of their present necessities and put upon a self-respecting footing of self-support and economic efficiency in society.

Such an ideal finds expression in various forms, and the Associated Charities has turned its energies with great effect into many of these channels. The Associated Charities is an old organization, as age goes in the West, and it was reorganized as an efficient public servant before the great fire. Following that disaster, it was natural that its skilled training should be utilized by the Committee of Relief and Rehabilitation. This was done, and to the great satisfaction of the Red Cross, as is indicated by the following letter, written August 28, 1909, by F. W. Dohrmann, vice-president of the San Francisco Relief and Red Cross Funds (a corporation):

"In the beginning of the work of rehabilitation undertaken by the San Francisco Relief and Red Cross Funds it was found necessary to have a force of visitors who would report upon the needs and merits of applicants according to uniform methods and standards. For this purpose the staff of trained workers of the Associated Charities, to which were added experienced visitors from other sources, was made a part of the Department of Relief and Rehabilitation. In this capacity the society rendered faithful and excellent service.

"When the bulk of the relief work was finished and the various bureaus were closed and the departments of Rehabilitation and of Camps began to wind up their affairs, there was still considerable work which could not be left undone without causing great suffering. The details of this were entrusted to the Associated Charities and were executed to the entire satisfaction of the Relief Corporation.

"From the point of view of the latter body the most important work of the Associated Charities during the second period has been the very valuable assistance given in clearing the relief cottages from the public parks and squares. Without such co-operation hundreds of indigent families would have been sent wandering aimlessly about, a menace to the health of the community and a hindrance to their neighbors, while their final rehabilitation would have been prevented or at least long delayed. By careful planning for these families, by helping them to move and remodel their cottages, by advising them and requiring them to observe the sanitary regulations, and thus at small cost preventing unhealthy congestion of certain quarters, the society has done praiseworthy service, not only to the victims of the fire but also to the city at large.

"Another branch of the relief work which had to be continued, if great suffering was not to result, was the care of the sick who were sufferers from the calamity.

"The work of the former Hospital Bureau has been well carried on by the Associated Charities. This has been made unusually difficult by the lack of adequate municipal accommodation for the indigent sick and by the entire lack throughout the city of proper accommodation for tuberculosis patients, who constitute a large part of the applicants for medical relief."

Since July 1907 the Associated Charities has not been directly connected with the Relief Committee, but the major part of its funds are still drawn from that source. These funds are as follows: $1,500 a month for cash relief of worthy applicants; $1,500 a month for the purchase of supplies for applicants; $1,200 a month for administration expenses. Besides these monthly allowances, the Red Cross maintains a cash balance in local banks, subject to the order of the Associated Charities, of $3,000 for the payment of grants to applicants in sums of $50 and over; and of $500 for grants for the purpose of housing the homeless. The Associated Charities expended in 1909, on the first of these accounts, $21,900, and on the other, $2,750. Another standing balance of $500 has been available only since the first of this month for the relief of the unemployed (the method is explained below), of which $368 has been expended.

So much for the finances of the Associated Charities. Some of its varied activities cannot be better summarized in brief than by quoting from a report on its work since the fire: The Associated Charities is the Central Agency for the charities of San Francisco. Its chief activities may be enumerated as follows:

Application and Investigation Bureau.—Societies and individuals may send to this department those who ask for assistance. Through experienced agents, careful study of the circumstances of each case is made.

Whether assistance is really needed is determined; and if needed, how it can be most effectively rendered so as to restore the person or family to self-support. In carrying out this plan, the Associated Charities calls into service the particular agencies whose help is needed, thus bringing to the assistance of any case the charitable resources of our community.

Civic Relief Bureau.—When adequate relief cannot be procured through other sources the need is met direct.

Children's Agency.—This department finds homes for dependent children. It also "boards them out," paying $12.50 per month for the board of each child, and, in addition, supplies clothing and medical care. Eleven dollars of this amount is allowed by the county for each committed child. There are at present two hundred children under the supervision of this department.

Registration Bureau.—For the use of those engaged in charitable work, the Associated Charities keeps a record of all cases applying to its office or reported by any co-operating society.

Department of Legislation and Law.—This department, established in 1902, is in charge of a special committee of the Central Council. Its purpose is to keep in touch with the charitable situation of California, so as to be ready to work in favor of needed legislation and to oppose the passage of ill-advised or vicious measures.

Financial.—Since the fire the Associated Charities has made no direct appeal to the public for financial support. During this period it has been the agent of the Relief Corporation and has been directly supplied with funds to meet necessary expenses and the general needs for relief. This support, however, will be materially reduced during the coming year, and the Associated Charities must depend for $15,000, or at least a third of its income, upon the general public. In fact, the Relief Committee has made its own contribution to the Associated Charities conditional upon the raising of $16,000 from volunteer contributions. This policy has been adopted in order to make the Relief Funds last longer and to give the Associated Charities an opportunity to educate the public to the cost of adequate relief in San Francisco.

It is the purpose of the California Weekly to devote other articles later to more extended reviews of some of these several phases of the Associated Charities' activities, notably to the work of the Children's Agency. It is sufficient for the present, therefore, simply to recapitulate those activities as above.

But it is pertinent in this article to point out a few facts about some of these phases.

For instance, the money expended for the relief of the unemployed is used only to aid married men who are honestly seeking to support their families. After investigation, the satisfactory applicants are given work at the City and County Hospital, where three days' work is remunerated by an order for $4.50 worth of groceries—enough to carry the man's family through the week. This not only relieves the man's necessity but it allows him the four remaining days of the week in which to search for permanent employment.

This relief is independent of the employment agency maintained by the Associated Charities. This agency uses every means to secure employment from business houses and families for worthy men and women. During the last year it has filled permanent positions with applicants to the number of about 500, and it has secured "day work"—odd jobs and housework by the day—for nearly 300 men and more than 700 women.

The Associated Charities has investigated and kept a record of 7,776 families that have applied for relief since July 1907. These records are permanent and are invaluable for future reference. In approximately two-thirds of the cases the distress was found to be real and the families worthy, and aid was extended.

This article takes no account of the district nursing, the nursing of children, the clinical treatment of applicants, nor of the hospital relief given by the Associated Charities, but these subjects, as well as the work of the Children's Agency, will form the matter for articles to be published later in these columns.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The Ships at Sea.

Where'er your ships have floated, dear;
Where'er they sail to-day,
O'er ripples bright or breakers drear,
Or near or far away,
Say to your heart, while yet they roam:
"Some day, some day they shall come home."

One was the Ship of Splendid Dreams,
The dreams of sun-lit dawn.
You trod its deck o'er golden streams,
And then—the ship was gone.
Still by the bar you watch and yearn—
Some day, some day it shall return.

One bore a freight of love you knew
When Life and you were young.
The ship from out the harbor drew,
Love's song one-half unsung.
Some day, returning o'er the sea,
Love's anthem shall completed be.

We two, dearheart, have ships we lost
In sea-mists gray and chill;
We know not on what waters tossed,
Yet we await them still,
For well we know, no faith we lack,
Some day of days they shall come back.

Class in Sociology, Please Rise.

The Teacher—What is the worst feature of crime under our laws?

Bright Pupil—Getting caught at it.
"There is some justification for the answer, as some authorities uphold it, but—well, is there any other answer?"

Another Bright Pupil—Not having money to pay an able lawyer if you are caught.

"This will do, young ladies and gentlemen, this will do. Authorities differ concerning which is the better answer to my question, but there is no question that the one or the other is right. The class is dismissed."

Keep Your Eye on the Chico Normal.

With bravery almost amounting to heroism, President Van Liew of the state normal school at Chico has issued his fiat that dress "agony" henceforth must be unknown in that institution. With his dictum in force, it will be avaut the turned-up trouser so dear to the Willie-boy and a bas the mushroom hat, the maddening accumulation of hair and the multitude of other beautifications or monstrosities so dear to the feminine heart.

Dr. Van Liew's order may "go" with the boys, but if it has noticeable effect on the girls, a million men will rise up, not so much to call him blessed as to ask him how he did it. For he is striking at the gaunt specter which brings anguish to the hearts of numberless law-abiding American citizens who humbly and brokenly question: If any man can in any way influence any woman concerning her apparel, how in thunder is it to be done?

"Henrietta," says the alleged head of the family, "as you love me, I beg of you, I implore you, I beseech you, never to wear one of these dishguring mushroom hats. I am strong, Henrietta, but I feel that I could not endure it. And, my dear, I respectfully pray, I humbly petition, that you will content yourself without any wildly-waving hirsute adornments from China, Patagonia or elsewhere."

It's a moving address, and it might wring tears from a heart of stone, but the next time he meets Henrietta on the street she belongs to the animated-toadstool, mop-of-hair branch of society. I do not exaggerate; thousands of broken-hearted and crushed men would be willing to testify that it is impossible to do so.

This is why I am interested in Dr. Van Liew's experiment. If he can induce his feminine pupils not to make of themselves the misshaped wonders of a once shapely Eden, I wish to know how he does it. But does anybody desire to bet anything that he succeeds?

The Opinions of Rufus.

I don't reckon anybody's case is reely hopeless, 'less it is the feller that can't see where he needs any improvement.

I don't blame swearin' men es much es I would ef I hadn't noticed that lots of them can't express themselves in any other way.

Some men are so oily-good that I can't help a feelin' that they'd 'pear better in society ef they was wrung out.

Josh Bings says that the Almighty made women so beautiful that even modern fashions can only 'bout half undo the job.

The worst thing, es I see it, 'bout these 2 a. m. millionaires is that so often they can't find anybody that's willin' to take a chance on bairin' them out in the mornin'.

Speakin' 'bout the higher education of women interferin' with marriage, my observation is that ef the right man comes 'long they don't generly hunt up their diplomas to see ef there's anything in the Latin to the contrary.

Say, what's the use of payin' juries to try 'leged criminals when the newspapers are patriotically ready to try 'em an' find them guilty without chargin' a dern cent for their generous conduct?

I read the other day that the intention an' the execution ought to count es 'bout the same, but I s'pose the feller that wrote the words hadn't ever seen a woman throw a stone at a neighbor's hen in her garden.

I hope nobody 'll have 'casion to feel es sorry fer me es I feel for the folks that died 'fore this era set in. They're losin' a good many interestin' developments.

Most lives are largely made up of lost chances, an' there's mighty few days when we don't add one or two to the number.

Striking Prosperity.

"These are times of striking prosperity," the well-fed orator announced.

He paused a moment for oratorical effect, and then continued:

"Yes, these are indeed times of striking prosperity. Look at the Rockefellers, the Morgans, the Carnegies, the Ryans, and others who are only less successful. When and where else in the history of mankind has business acumen witnessed such proud results? I repeat, then, that we are living in an age of striking prosperity."

The pale, emaciated little man in the back of the hall suddenly sprung to his feet.

"I see it, I see it!" he shouted. "This is a time of striking prosperity—thoughtfully divided. The Rockefellers and Morgans do the prosperity act, while we do the striking for living wages, don't we, boys?"

The roar, "You bet we do!" which came from the back seats indicated that "the boys" thought the pale, emaciated little man had struck to the heart of the "striking prosperity" situation.

Patriot, and Partisan.

Here is the distinction, son:

You believe in a certain political party (perhaps on logical grounds, perhaps, because you were taught in childhood to do so) and because you believe in it, you vote for it when you know it is wrong.

You are a good partisan, but a mighty poor patriot.

You believe in your party, but you believe more in your country and the God of Right, and accordingly you vote against it when you know it is wrong.

You are a poor partisan, but a splendidly good patriot.

There are very few elections, son, when you are not given the opportunity to be the one or the other.

It is up to you, son. Which shall it be?

Go, Break the News to Garcia.

(Now comes the news that Fra Elbert Hubbard is to appear in vaudeville in what he terms "Heart to heart talks.")

Oh, carry the news to Garcia, although it make him sad.

That vaudeville now has captured his literary dad;

Yes, break unto him tenderly, but do the deed at once.

That soon the Fra will wag his mane in histrionic stunts.

Will wag his mane, and eke his tongue, in new Roycroftie style,

Which is not done in vellum, but stray shekels may beguile.

Oh, carry the news to Garcia, but break it mild, my son.

That queer things are in vaudeville seen when no one has a gun.

Go, carry the news to Garcia, and say the program reads:

"The Armless Wonder and the Toes With Which He Drinks and Feeds.

The Fair Equestrienne Who Thrills as She with Danger Flirts,

Her Bravery Only Equaled by the Briefness of her Skirts.

The Tongueless Marvel, Little Mae, Who Talks with Pa and Ma.

A Heart to Heart Emulsion That's Administered by Fra.

The Handcuff—"Let's the program drop. The news to Garcia take,

But tell it to him gently, for I fear his heart will break.

Thoughtful Man on Curry.

"'Twas the wireless," said the Thoughtful Man, "that was the first instrument in giving a peerless leader to the G. O. P."

"Meaning the Grand Old Party, of course?" I remarked.

"Aw, wake up, man!" he responded. "You're too long ago; you're not up with the times—meaning, of course, the Gilded Organized Plutocracy. Well, Charley Curry was sweetly dreaming of the love of the dear people and what it ought to be quoted at in the market reports, when there came a low, sibilant whisper.

"S-s-sh," it said, 'are you there, Charley?'

"I am," says Curry. 'Who is it at the other end of the atmosphere?'

"Not being interested in politics," says the wireless, 'I'll not inform you, but—are you good at acrostics? If ye are, guess this one:'

"Hurl

Into
Nitro-glycerine.

"Can you guess it?"

"I can," says Charley; 'the beauty of the sentiment alone would reveal it.'

"'Tis well," says the wireless. 'I hear you're a candidate for governor.'

"I didn't know it," says Charley.

"Well, you are. You may take it from me, for I have it from an authentic source. You are a candidate, but you must be careful not to let the Organization know it, for 'tis a tender plant, with feelings easily hurt, and it cannot endure much shock."

"'Twas enough for Curry, for he is a great believer in the wireless, and so he got out at once. 'Whist,' he says to his friends, 'keep it dark. For goodness' sake, don't let the Organization know it, for it might object.'

"So you don't believe in the Organization?" I says to him.

"Very little," he replied, 'but I have much faith in acrostics.' It's a noble and independent campaign he's making—and the Organization never once has suspected what he is doing. It's slow, the Organization is."

"How about Alden Anderson," I asked, 'hasn't he received a wireless acrostic, too?'

"There's suspicion," the Thoughtful Man replied, "that it is an adoublecrostic."

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

The California Weekly.

In our issue of the 18th instant I note Speaker Cannon's characterization of General Pinchot as an "uncomfortable subordinate." How our superior officers love a comfortable subordinate. How useful is the comfortable subordinate to corporate control. Harri- man, Rockefeller, Aldrich, Ballinger, etc., all love and cherish the comfortable subordinate, who sees not, hears not, talks not; but promptly draws his pay and lauds the powers that insure his tenure of office, heartily subscribing to that Vanderbiltism "The people be d—d." The hope of the people is in Pinchotism i. e. devotion to the public welfare, though they render it uncomfortable for their superiors in office.

JOHN T. DARE.

San Francisco, Feb. 21, 1910.

517 Mills Bldg.

The comfortable subordinate is likely to prove a cowardly subordinate and any subordinate who knows his superior to be false to the public interest, in essential particulars, and does not expose him as Glavis exposed Ballinger, is not fit to be an American citizen. There are times when insubordination becomes perfectly splendid, an act of high patriotism. Such insubordination may cost one his job but if he has right and justice on his side, and acts with eyes single to the common welfare, he will have preserved his manhood and that alone will be worth all it costs. The insubordination of Pinchot and Glavis may profit them little, but it is likely to profit their country by tens of millions, a very comforting consolation to carry into seclusion if seclusion awaits such valuable public servants.

Editor The California Weekly.

You are absolutely right in your conservation fight, and The California Weekly seems to me gaining in breadth, coherence and definite purpose. I begin to think that you can make it stick. It is merely a question of time, one and one make two, two and one make three, and so on forever. I believe that more and more I see plainly in these days, as I grow older, that the first great thing is to be willing to burn your own fingers for the thing that is worth doing. You must not complain about it, nor think yourself a martyr; simply burn them, and then put in the other hand without looking around to observe whether anybody is following your example. In the course of time you will find that the thing in which you are interested has become rooted, and that the Almighty is pouring sun and showers over it.

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES H. SHINN,
Forest Supervisor.

Northfork, Cal., February 21, 1910.

There are few things richly worth while that are easy to do and establishing a weekly journal, free and independent, is not one of the easy things. There is no objection to having fingers burned. The only issue is as to whether fingers for purpose of incineration can be had in sufficient supply to last through the crucial stage. We have faith to believe that they can be had. Thanks for Mr. Shinn's words of encouragement. He knows how it feels himself and is not at all afraid of the fire even yet.

Editor California Weekly.

Dear sir:

About a month ago in an editorial about votes for women you suggested that school suffrage be tried for women first, and then one could learn how it worked. You can hardly understand how this proposition looks to me. You probably think it a wise and generous proposal. But it shows a very conservative attitude. School suffrage is no longer an experiment. It is at work now in 29 states and a unanimous verdict in its favor. Besides how do you think it would look to you if you were extremely hungry, if someone should offer you one crumb and say wait till digestion was complete? Women want to vote without waiting years longer. The ballot is withheld from them by men like you who mean to be just and generous, but are conservative. If it is right for women to vote at all, it is right for them to vote now on equal terms with men. Probably you have not thought long and often about equal suffrage, and one advances step by step. Pray give it serious thought and step forward. Women are voting now in four states and in several foreign countries, and it has proved an advantage that no state or country having it would now forego.

How deeply I wish that California would enfranchise its women, I cannot put into words.

Very respectfully,
ELLEN C. SARGENT.

San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 21, 1910.

The California Weekly is not out of sympathy with Mrs. Sargent in her zeal for woman suffrage and the subject is not new to the editor of this paper. His introduction to the subject came with the campaign in Kansas, waged soon after the Civil War closed, by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Lucy Stone Blackwell and others. The writer well remembers just how Mrs. Stanton looked and, as for Susan B. Anthony, she was not only many times a visitor at our father's home, but the writer of this has visited her in her late home at Rochester. Furthermore, the editor of this paper has supported woman suffrage every time it has been an issue and has voted for it, and would probably vote for it again, but, somehow, some of his enthusiasm for it, right off, has oozed out in recent years. He has come to look at suffrage as an obligation and not a right, and he does not wish to see the suffrage conferred upon a great class of persons only a small fraction of which wants the suffrage or takes any interest in it. We are not in as big a hurry as we were. To our mind the electorate is now loaded down with dead timber enough and it is not going to help it to add more. Therefore, we should begin with school suffrage for women which California has not, add to it municipal suffrage and full suffrage as soon as women have grown into the use of the ballot so that they will make general use of it. And this we advocate, not as an enemy to suffrage, but as the best and quickest way to get it for women, and it is not likely to come to them in California in any other way. The men simply will not vote to give it to them.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen: In the columns of Collier's Weekly I note that you have published the report of the committee of citizens who investigated recent political conditions in your city, and that copies are to be had upon application. The evils which have beset your community during the past few years in an acute form are substantially the same that many another city labors under, perhaps in a milder form, and the lessons of your civic demilement and purgation will be of great value to every one interested in higher standards of municipal service. Your public spirit in making this report accessible to interested persons the country over is to be commended, and I should be greatly obliged if you would send me a copy. I enclose stamp for postage.

Thanking you in advance,

Very truly yours,

DON C. D. MOORE.

29 Wendell street, Cambridge, Mass.

In a way it is comforting to know that "there are others," other cities whose public service corporations scruple not to debauch public officials, other cities whose big men feel that if they can not get what they want without bribery they are justified in employing bribery, and yet the more we are assured of the wide prevalence of this condition the greater the danger to our national life. If this malady affected San Francisco alone of American cities we would have little need for being concerned about the nation, but where all, or nearly all, American cities suffer from the same malady we can not avoid being concerned for the future of the Great Republic. The Denman Report is destined to do a great deal of good wherever it goes for it makes the nature of the malady plain, but we hope that those who tell others about this report will kindly tell also that it costs ten cents, not an unimportant item where so many hundreds are wanted.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen: Your very interesting edition of February 11th received. I was especially interested in the article by the Honorable A. B. Nye, "More Light on Compulsory Voting," a matter which should give Good Government supporters food for thought.

It occurred to me that if a tax were levied on all citizens qualified to vote, and a credit given to those who did vote, we would find a very small percentage of the citizens who would not reach the polls. For example, we will say a tax of $3 were to be levied on all citizens qualified to vote. Voters registering would be entitled to a credit of $1; voters casting ballot at the primaries would receive a credit of $1; voters casting ballot at the general election would receive a credit of $1. As a voter registers or votes, he would receive a certificate certifying that he had registered or voted. Such contingencies as blank ballots, absentees and sickness should be provided for. All funds to go toward election expenses. Have the collection of tax on somewhat the same principal as the poll tax.

Of course, this is a very crude example, but the principle might be used to good advantage.

Very truly yours,
E. J. HOOPER.

San Francisco, Feb. 18, 1910.

The more attention given this subject the more will the need for compulsory voting be borne in upon thoughtful minds. The suggestion made in the above letter may not be the best possible, but in default of a better it would serve the purpose. The main thing is to talk up the idea until everybody gets to thinking about it. That will bring a solution of all difficulties in due season.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Hiram Johnson For Governor

In accepting the task of making a campaign before the Republicans of California for governor Hiram Johnson has made a greater personal sacrifice than the general public will ever understand. It may involve an entire change of the plans of a lifetime. Nothing short of the spirit of 1776 and 1861 could have brought him to undergo the ordeal, but without question he is the man of the hour. Other good and true men there were to select from, but among them all there was no other who so well represented just the things for which the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican movement stands. Mr. Heney would have pleased many very much, but Mr. Heney has done so much that he could not now be asked to do more. Mr. Davis or Mr. Rowell would have drawn the line to which the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicans propose to hew as clearly and as straight, but by accepting the presidency of the League, which required Mr. Rowell to name the executive committee, it is obvious that that committee could not with propriety name him for the head of the ticket. Messrs. Mott and Belshaw are both excellent men with excellent records, but, in both of their cases, it would not have been as easy to make it perfectly clear to all voters that the line of battle was irrevocably drawn, with no quarter asked or given, as with Mr. Johnson. The issue is: "Shall California be governed by the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau and allied iniquities or by the manhood of California?" On that issue Hiram Johnson will lead a splendid and, it is to be hoped, a winning fight. If, happily, he shall be nominated in August, and elected in November, California will have a governor who will know how to so amend the laws and procedures as to make it possible to establish justice in this commonwealth, even in the cases of malefactors of great wealth. Hurrah for Hiram Johnson! Had not Johnson been selected Mr. Weinstock very likely might have been, but he refused to allow his name to be used as long as Johnson was a possibility.

Acquitted Itself Most Admirably

The Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has acquitted itself most admirably. It has not been narrow or partizan, as it will not be in the future. Assured where a candidate stands on the main issue it will ask only that he be fit for the place. The man who has made good in office, and has placed the public welfare above private and corporate interest, will have little to fear at the hands of the League. Endorsing Judge Sloss without any advances being made on his part signifies the League's stand for a nonpartisan judiciary. The failure to endorse the candidacy of Judge Melvin is equally significant to the same end. The supreme bench is no place for a man who, throughout his judicial career, has been head over ears in politics. The endorsements of the candidacies of State Controller A. B. Nye and State Treasurer William R. Williams to succeed themselves was, of course, splendidly deserved and if the "organization" has any regard for the decencies of political life, and for the public interests, it will endorse these candidacies as heartily, but that consummation is not likely. There is much more to be done before the state ticket can be made ready for submission to a reform public sentiment for approval, but the task will be finished as it has been begun—in sincerity and truth.

The Cases of Webb And of Kingsbury

The cases of Attorney-General Webb and Surveyor-General Kingsbury, organization men, both of them, so far as their past history goes, deserve and will receive the careful consideration of the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, but there is much evidence to show that they have been efficient in office and not subservient to the interests that put them there. This had not been noticeable in the case of General Webb until within the last two or three years. General Kingsbury has been in office only during the present administration, but there is no question that, so far as the conduct of his office is concerned, he has made good in every particular. In fact he has redeemed the office from a standing disgrace of complicity with speculative interests to the cost of the state and the injury of purchasers from the state. The charges against him are that he allowed Walter Parker to choose his subordinates in office and has allowed at least one of these subordinates to devote time and effort, as a lieutenant of Parker's, to fighting the good government forces in Los Angeles. This is a serious charge and deserves to be investigated, as it will be. General Webb's staff is regarded as of his own selection and loyal to his policy. The issue is, "Bond or Free," and however good an official a man may be he is not good enough unless he will throw the influence of his office into the scale for making California a free state not under bond to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau. By that test must every candidate stand up to be measured.

Will Democrats Take Warning?

If gentlemen of Democratic proclivities are, any of them, laying plans with regard to which way "the cat is likely to jump," they will have to be more astute than most of them have proven heretofore if they do not themselves land in the middle of the morass. With Hiram Johnson at the head of one state ticket, and Theodore Bell at the head of the other, there will be relatively little to fight over so far as the heads of the tickets are concerned. That is, they will both stand for making California free. If Charles F. Curry or Alden Anderson were to win the Republican nomination in August (not very likely by the way) and Bell were to be the Democratic candidate the issue of "bond or free," would be sharply drawn and freemen would know on which side to stand. But if Hiram Johnson should be nominated by the Republicans it would become immensely important for the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company to have a change of horses handy. Just here lies the great Democratic temptation and the state's danger. If Mr. Herrin can beat Bell before the Democrats in this state with some conservative, untarnished but complaisant Democrat he will surely do it. Look out for tricks! Party lines are going to sit lightly. All the votes McCarthy can control, and all the votes that the Royal Arch can muster, all the human off-scouring of the male sex from the red-light districts of all the cities and towns in the state, will be registered where they can do the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau the most good. Watch where they register. Lulled into a security that Bell cannot be beaten at the primaries it may look different on the morning of the third Wednesday in August.

Re-register Right Away

Too late for The California Weekly to announce the fact last week the supreme court rendered a decision that the old great registers are dead, except for certain municipal purposes specifically provided for, and the new one must be used for all things appertaining to the August primary. It is important that the August primary should be the biggest ever known. It will be the first state-wide application of the direct primary principle. The law is defective, purposely rendered so by persons and interests inimical to the direct primary idea. It is evident, too, that influences are at work with the express purpose of rendering the direct primary law so odious as to lead to its repeal and the going back to the convention system, which the politicians attached to the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau so well understand how to manipulate. It is immensely important, therefore, to make the first application of the direct primary law as complete a success as the defective character of the law will allow. By decision of the highest court in our state all petitioners on all the nomination papers of all candidates to be voted for on the third Tuesday in August must have re-registered before they go on the nomination papers. The first duty in hand, then, is to register. Every voter who has not registered since the first of January must re-register before he can have any part in the direct primary election. The best time to do it is now. Go by and attend to it before you forget it. Tell your friends to do the same. Neglect is dangerous. When you re-register you must give your party affiliations or you cannot vote at the primary. Don't register as a Lincoln-Roosevelter. There is no such party. Register as Republican, Democrat or whatever you are as a party man.

A Policy of Rank Political Faking

The Chronicle continues to talk about what "the Republicans" will do when they call the State Central Committee together and about "Republican candidates" as distinguished from Lincoln-Roosevelt candidates. Of course it is the purpose of the organization to arrogate to itself the right to be the Republican party and to claim that the ticket which it will presently put up is the Republican ticket, although everybody must know that the Republican ticket will be nominated when the primary is held next August and not before. Some of the scribblers doing the organization's work go so far as to talk about "the three parties, the Republicans, Democrats and Lincoln-Roosevelt League." These persons are always careful to leave out the "Republican" when they write about the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. It seems a childish attempt to mislead and to prejudice, but such as it is the most will be made of it during the coming months. It will be a more serious offense if, when the Republican State Central Committee is called together, that official governing board of the party shall let the organization misuse its official title in pursuance of this same attempt to deceive voters. It is so elementary that it should be unnecessary to say it, but in view of what is taking place it probably needs to be said, that at the present time any Republicans who choose to do so—Mr. Herrin and his friends as well as others—have the right to endorse tickets of candidates; all of these tickets will be Republican tickets, but the Republican ticket cannot be named until the voters of the party go to the polls and do it next August. Meantime the claim of the organization to name the only genuine blown-in-the-bottle Republican party ticket is a piece of rank political faking.

Free Men Have Free Minds; Before the last Cattle Follow the Boss meeting of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican Executive Committee there was a good deal of merriment in the organization newspapers over the supposed inability of the reformers to agree upon a candidate for governor, and assertions were freely made that the League was about to break up. All this came to a sudden stop when Hiram W. Johnson was nominated and accepted the nomination. It did not seem to occur to the humorists of the organization press that the differences of opinion over the choice of a candidate which existed for a time in the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican ranks and the agreement which ensued when the right man was found, were the best of evidence that the selection was made by free and independent men. How much difference of opinion will there be on the other side when that invisible and intangible thing—intangible except so far as it is solidly apparent in the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau—known as the "organization" has decided who shall be the candidate for governor? There is no difficulty in securing an agreement when there is but one will to be consulted, but where there are independent minds there will usually be different opinions. No one need be ashamed of the manner in which the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League reached an agreement upon a candidate for governor. Who is now making the choice of an opposition candidate and how is it being done?

Two Strong Democratic Judicial Candidates

There are at least two men talked of for judicial preferment through Democratic initiative who are going to impress their voting constituencies favorably and, despite the fact that the influence of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau defeated the non-partisan judicial reform measure in the last legislature, party is going to cut little force in voting for judges at the coming election. One of the candidacies spoken of is that of Judge W. P. Lawlor for the supreme bench. His steadfastness, uprightness, and intimate knowledge of the criminal law are going to speak powerfully in his behalf. And, too, it will mean a good deal to the bench to bring into it a man fresh from the hurly-burly of criminal trials, a man who knows criminal jurisprudence for what it is as a fact rather than as a speculative philosophy. He is a tremendously useful man where he is, but he might be even more useful higher up. The other candidacy, virtually settled upon we suppose, is that of Judge Maurice Dooling of San Benito for the appellate bench to succeed Justice Cooper. He was beaten by Judge Kerrigan four years ago by 806 votes, and it is not impossible that a straight count of the votes might have brought him much nearer the goal. There was at least some ground for suspecting that all was not right in the Santa Clara count, although nothing tangible was gotten hold of beyond a long holding back of the returns from that county. These are both strong men and will make short work of weaker men if Republicans put them up.

The Call of the Sixth For Senator Boynton

It is unfortunate that public service so often entails personal sacrifice, but it does, particularly when the man wanted by an office is especially valuable to an office. This is the case with State Senator A. E. Boynton of the sixth senatorial district, comprising the counties of Butte, Sutter, Yolo, and Yuba, splendid counties, all of them, counties that know a good man when they get him in a place where he fits. Of all men in the legislature in the sessions of 1907 and 1909 none made better records than Senator Boynton and he now knows the legislative ropes so thoroughly that he is in a position to be doubly useful to the state. In fact the progressive, honest, free and independent element of his party does not see how it is going to get on well without him. He knows right from wrong no matter how disguised, will do the right and will not do the wrong, and everybody who has had anything to do with legislation knows that this is so. Of course the "organization" has little use for him, but the people will take care of that if he will consent to go back for four years more. He is a rising man, has his profession to look out for and feels disinclined to make the sacrifice, but it is to be believed that the splendid example set him by Hiram Johnson will not be lost on A. E. Boynton. With enough such men in the next legislature, and no effort will be spared to land them there, California will make a legislative record next winter that will be heard of from ocean to ocean if not around the world.

Iroquois Pow-Wow

The Iroquois League of Democratic clubs held a session in San Francisco this week. It was a good pow-wow and did nothing to be ashamed of. It resolved that democracy is not dead and proceeded to prove it by promulgating a platform. Nothing is quite dead that can do that. It also rejected with disdain a proposal (certainly not emanating from the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League) to endorse the League candidate for governor and not put up any. In this it did right. California needs a good, strong, Democratic party with a zeal for the faith that is in it. The platform was some good and some bad. The things that were good were a graduated national income tax, laws for the elevation of labor, for the Hetch-Hetchy water system, national eight-hour law, national child labor law, emancipation of California from corporation control, the simplification and perfection of the direct primary law, a non-partisanly elected judiciary, removal of party circle from the ballot, initiative, referendum and recall, prevention of acquisition of water power sites for speculative purposes. In fact these planks are all very good and it will be difficult to get up a contest with progressive Republicans on any of them. The planks that are at least doubtful, if not bad, are those demanding that the tariff be re-revised, that all trust-made articles be put on the free list, that imports coming in American bottoms shall cut the duty in half. Only the wool schedule should have immediate revision. Many trust-made articles are also made by independent concerns and cutting import duties in half, if imported in American bottoms, would overdo the business awfully. Keep the old party alive, gentlemen, and keep going.

Scraps of Real News And Political Gossip

The Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will hold another session on Saturday of next week. It would be impossible for any convention to do the painstaking work this committee is doing.

There is some talk that Lee C. Gates may be the running mate of Hiram W. Johnson. If so the people will hear the welkin ring from Shasta to Tia Juana. There are not better orators in the state. The Southern Californians will probably settle that issue, but the most likely candidate appears to be W. D. Stephens, former mayor of Los Angeles and a very strong man.

Alden Anderson seems to be clearly in the fight for the "organization" support for governor, although it is freely predicted that he will come out third in the August race if he goes into it. This will probably force Phil Stanton out of it or into the railroad candidacy for lieutenant governor.

Charles F. Curry is playing a lone hand with great confidence, based, no doubt, on the belief that his strength comes from that constituency that always votes and especially at a primary. He is more to be reckoned with without the backing of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company than Alden Anderson is with it, notwithstanding the fact that Anderson is vastly better.

HELPLESS ANYWAY.

"You've heard about the man that married his hired girl so as to keep her, haven't you?"
"Of course. Everybody has."
"Poor fellow!"
"What's the matter?"
"She got a divorce last week."

WHAT THE DAISY TAUGHT.

A daisy grew in a lonely spot,
In a vale secluded a daisy grew,
And the eye of mortal had seen it not
Where it bravely smiled to the dome of blue.

But the daisy said: "No whit I care
That the vale is lonely and none is near,
For to live is sweet, and the world is fair,
And I know it is brighter because I am here."

A lesson, my bonnie, for you and for me:
In ourselves is the spirit which gives to us cheer;
If our way is obscure, as it haply may be,
Let's make it the brighter because we are here.

PREVOST AND AMERICAN WOMEN.

Marcel Prevost, the distinguished French fictionist and man of letters, declares of the American woman, in the current Harper's Bazaar, that curiosity is her chief intellectual characteristic. "When I sit down at table beside an American woman of Paris she immediately asks me: 'Have you seen such and such a play? Have you been to such and such an art exhibition? What do you think of this novel or of that philosophical or historical book recently published?' * * * And I am forced to admit that I have not seen the latest play, that for more than ten years I have not set my foot inside the annual 'salons'; that I read slowly and carefully and am therefore forced to read but few books. And I know my American neighbor feels great disdain for my unculture. * * * Still, I have infinite sympathy for her charming and universal intellectual curiosity; only long experience has taught me that man's head can not contain too many ideas at once. There is, consequently, an abyss between the way most American women I have met conceive intellectual culture and my own way. Far from me to pretend that I am right. And I give thanks to heaven which sends us, in the American women of Paris, the most wonderful public for books or theaters or lectures."

HIRAM W. JOHNSON, THE MAN

A CHARACTER SKETCH OF THE CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR.

By E. FRENCH STROTHER.

When William H. Langdon made his campaign for reelection as district attorney of San Francisco, in 1907, one of his most ardent supporters was Hiram W. Johnson. In the first speech which Johnson made in that campaign for Langdon he said, in substance:

"I have been employed in the graft prosecution from the first, and I have finished my work. The expenses of these prosecutions have been paid by a private citizen. My conscience does not permit me to take a public part in a political campaign while I am in the employ of a private citizen who is one of the issues of this campaign. I therefore here, now, and publicly discharge myself from all future employment in these cases, and as a disinterested citizen urge my fellow citizens to support William H. Langdon for district attorney."

Several months later, Mr. Johnson sat in his private office listening to the appeal of Matt I. Sullivan that he come back into the prosecution. Mr. Sullivan was speaking as the representative of the League of Justice, which had authorized him to offer Mr. Johnson a handsome retainer and an alluring per diem compensation for his services. Mr. Johnson was obdurate.

"Don't you see, Matt," he said, "I simply can't do it. Leaving the loss of my other practice out of it, there's my public word that I have forever discharged myself from the cases."

Mr. Sullivan approached the subject from a new angle.

"But Heney is tired out, and he is cruelly overworked. You must not leave him in the lurch."

Mr. Johnson was still unmoved.

"There's my word; I can't go back on it."

Just then the door to the outer office burst open and one of Mr. Johnson's assistants rushed in, crying.

"Heney is shot!"

Mr. Johnson would not believe it. The sheriff's office was called by telephone and the reply was:

"Yes, shot in the courtroom; not expected to live."

Johnson and Sullivan stood, facing one another with tears in their eyes.

Controlling himself, Johnson spoke:

"We'll finish his work, Matt."

And they shook hands on it, in silence.

That night, at Dreamland Rink, before a frenzied mob of ten thousand people, who were shouting for vengeance, Hiram Johnson quieted the passions with words of prudent wisdom and then pledged himself and Sullivan to complete Heney's work without compensation and as a public duty. He kept his word, for his presentation of the case to the jury a few weeks later brought about the conviction of Ruef.

This is the Hiram Johnson who is the choice of the executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League for the Republican nomination for governor of California.

Hiram W. Johnson was born in Sacramento, September 2, 1866. He was educated in the public schools of Sacramento, and graduated from high school at seventeen. During the following year he learned shorthand and acted as stenographer and law clerk in the office

He had then, as now, a pair of piercing dark eyes, a most winning smile, and a voice that vibrated as it ranged the whole gamut of emotions.

Johnson was reared in a home atmosphere charged with politics, so much that to this day he recalls with vivid recollection the Hayes-Tilden campaign and the state campaigns of his earliest boyhood. In college, he plunged at once into a native element of inter-class politics of which he was soon leader. The selection of class officers, the management of the college rushes, and the direction of the junior annual were all in turn referred to him. But even at this age the idea of office seeking was so repugnant that he refused to engage in any of these activities except on behalf of others, and he then made himself the promise that never in his life, except in response to an overwhelming call of duty, would he undertake to attain public office. He was elected editor of the "Blue and Gold" in his junior year, but left college to marry and enter the law before he took up the work.

Which recalls an incident told by a room-mate at college, that illustrates the magnetism of his personality. Every Sunday morning Johnson would stretch out on a sofa, with a newspaper or book and cigar, and ask his room-mate to go down to the postoffice and "see if there is any mail."

"And," adds the room-mate, who is now a distinguished lawyer in San Francisco, "he always put it in such a winning way that I never failed to go, though I knew perfectly well I wouldn't get a letter and that the only mail I would find would be a letter for Jack from his best girl."

The "best girl" was Miss McNeal, daughter of Archibald McNeal, a pioneer of Sacramento. She and Mr. Johnson had been engaged for some time, and when she graduated from Mills College in 1886, Johnson, though only twenty years old, threw up his college course and went back to Sacramento where they were married at once. They have two sons, Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., and Archibald McNeal

Johnson, both of whom are members of the same fraternity—Chi Phi—at Berkeley, to which their father belonged in the eighties. Hiram Johnson, Sr., was pitcher of the college nine in his day, and Hiram Johnson, Jr., was catcher of the same nine a couple of years ago.

After his marriage, Hiram Johnson entered his father's law office, where his older brother, Albert M., had preceded him, the father and sons forming the firm of Johnson, Johnson & Johnson. As Hiram junior recently put it, this proved to be "too much Johnson," for the firm was dissolved and the brothers set up for of his father, Grove L. Johnson. At eighteen he entered the University of California in the class of '88.

From the day he entered college young Johnson was recognized as a leader. Former district attorney Seymour, of Sacramento, remarked a few days ago that it was common talk in Berkeley in those days that "a freshman is boss of the whole university." That freshman was "Jack" Johnson, as he was nicknamed. He was lazy physically but extraordinarily alert mentally, and his personal magnetism won him the commanding position which he held throughout his college career.

themselves in a separate office. This was the beginning of the long-since complete separation of Hiram Johnson from Grove L. Johnson, brought about by the wide divergence of political ideals between the father and son.

Hiram Johnson quickly gained a local reputation in Sacramento as an able lawyer and as a sincere political reformer. His practice rapidly increased, and his influence in local politics became increasingly strong. He was a delegate to nearly every city and county Republican convention and to most of the Republican state conventions. Twice at state conventions he split the Sacramento delegation on the issue of railroad domination, once against a notorious railroad congressman and once in favor of a candidate for supreme court justice who was independent of railroad control.

But the most interesting and spectacular political feat performed by Johnson was his support of George H. Clark for mayor of Sacramento. At that time, all kinds of gambling games, prohibited by statute, were run openly in Sacramento, with only such sporadic raids as the bosses authorized for the purpose of making a showing of enforcing the law. These games were so profitable that the proprietors of them became the political bosses of Sacramento, controlling elections so that they might control the city administrations, appointing their choice chief of police and seeing to it that a friendly board of trustees was elected, secretly pledged to pass no ordinances dangerous to gambling. These local bosses were, as is usual, in league with the Southern Pacific state bosses, delivering the city delegates to conventions in return for favorable consideration in the legislature.

Clark was an undertaker, and had been coroner for several terms. He was a good "mixer" and nothing in his record disturbed the local bosses when he wanted to run for mayor, so there was little opposition to him, and he was elected. After his election he sent for Johnson and told him he wanted to make his administration a credit to himself and asked Johnson to become corporation counsel. This is an employment in an advisory capacity, not a public office, and Johnson accepted.

Johnson told him his chief of police was the key to the situation. When the bosses came to Clark and told him whom to appoint chief of police, Clark replied that he already had a man in mind. The bosses stormed and threatened to hold up all Clark's appointments in the board of trustees. They went the threat one better, and contested Clark's own election. Johnson fought the case to the supreme court and seated Clark. Then, when the threat about confirmations was repeated, Clark replied by sending in only one appointment, that of police chief, and announcing that no other appointments would be made until that was confirmed. The bosses yielded, and the new chief at once closed down the gambling houses and kept them shut tight for the next two years.

The bosses and the papers and a part of the public turned on Clark with extreme bitterness. Clark's private history was dug up and distorted, his wife was harassed with anonymous letters, and every kind of threat was used. He sat tight. Gradually the power of the bosses was broken by the loss of their incomes from gambling, but the public clamor grew louder. Johnson was reproached for having killed Clark politically, and was warned that the next election would bury him forever. Johnson retorted that he knew better and added, by way of reply, that Clark would be reelected with an increased majority. At his advice Clark forced the reluctant trustees to pass an ordinance stopping pool-selling as well as the games prohibited by statute, and had the chief of police put on the lid there as well.

When the next election drew near Johnson undertook to make good his promise to Clark. The bosses nominated both the Republican and Democratic candidate. Johnson had Clark nominated by petition as an independent. The bosses got all the newspapers to fight Clark, and they got hold of every hall where public speeches could be made. Johnson started a little paper, The Independent, which he wrote and published twice a week. He also bought a circus tent and some chairs, and made the first "tent campaign" ever made in this country. The tent was pitched every night on a different lot, and Hiram Johnson and his brother Albert carried their message straight to the people.

The result was an overwhelming victory. Clark received more votes than the other two candidates combined, and he made good by continuing his former policy throughout his second term.

Soon after this campaign, about 1902, Hiram and Albert Johnson moved to San Francisco and practiced together under the firm name of Johnson & Johnson. A year or so later this firm was dissolved. Albert Johnson died soon after, and Hiram Johnson has since been in practice alone, with offices in the Mills Building.

In San Francisco he soon made a reputation as a great "trial lawyer," almost invincible before a jury. He convicted the astute and slippery George D. Collins, and has carried a dozen other famous cases to successful issue. But his ability as a skilled court lawyer does not blind his professional colleagues to his solid foundation in law and his intense application to the arduous preliminary office work that precedes his brilliant appearances before judges and juries. He is a scholarly lawyer as well as a brilliant and magnetic speaker.

Hiram Johnson's recent record needs slight review. He gave the public some of his best work in the graft prosecutions in San Francisco, where his skill convicted Ruef. His speech to the jury in this case has rarely been rivalled in California. His political ideals are insurgent Republican, with Roosevelt as his pattern and guide. He has never sought nor held public office, and only consented to be considered a candidate for governor after resisting for weeks an amount of state-wide pressure inconceivable to a person not familiar with the inside facts. He was loth to interrupt the ideal quiet of his home life, for he is and has always been a home man. He was reluctant to give up his books. History especially occupies much of his leisure time, and Napoleon and Lincoln are his historical heroes. He felt strongly the anxiety for the

WHEN Sylvia Grant married Ward Remington, she had attained the rather mature age of twenty-five years and, having been always a serious and thoughtful girl, she had evolved many theories from her study of the problems of life, particularly in regard to marriage. In her own home there had been no friction; her father and mother had lived together nearly forty years in the ideal relationship which is the lot of so few in this life whatever may be the solution of the problem in the next.

She had, however, two intimate friends, one of whom was divorced after but a few years of vain effort at endurance; the other was still struggling for happiness in the face of the odds so strong against her that Sylvia knew what the inevitable result would be.

From her intimate knowledge of their difficulties and from observation of many others of her acquaintances she had decided that not without the greatest care and deliberation would she enter the state which Shakespeare says may be "An age of discord and continued strife, or a pattern of celestial peace." Before love she placed faith which "builds a bridge across the gulf of death," for without absolute confidence in each other how could a man and woman dare to face the future with all its struggles, its trials, its heartaches and days of despair, when bound together by an enduring tie which is often irksome and galling?

Thus argued Sylvia, thinking herself wiser than so many thousands who had gone before her and failed. But with all her calm and discerning outlook upon life, when she met Ward Remington and the love which had been long delayed surged through her heart and fairly lifted her from earthly things to heights whereon she believed no other woman had ever trod, she forgot her theories, threw care and discernment to the winds and went the way which should be the joy of all womanhood to go, hand in hand with the man of her choice into the untried future, without one doubt or misgiving.

Two years passed most delightfully to them both, for they were undoubtedly congenial in tastes and temperament. Sylvia's only dull and sad days were caused by the enforced absence of her husband from home on business trips; for he, being the junior member of a large corporation, found that to his share fell the traveling which had been done by the older men years before. So, when one day he announced a business transaction which would take him to a distant city for a few weeks, she seemed so distressed that he suggested for her a visit to her father and mother during his absence. "I'd take you with me," he said, "only I could not do anything to amuse you. I shall be busy every minute, day and night, and I am sure nothing could be so dull for you as to be shut up alone in a strange hotel, in the very uninteresting city to which I am going." So Sylvia telegraphed to her parents of her intended visit and she and her husband decided to start on the same day, he by the nine a. m. train, she a little later, about eleven o'clock.

On the morning of his departure, when he was saying goodbye to her and she was trying to suppress the tears which would come into her eyes at the thought of a month's separation, he said suddenly, "Where is my automobile coat, Sylvia? I brought it home last night intending to telephone for a tailor to mend it, then I forgot all about it."

"You'll not need the coat now," she said.

"Well, I'll take it to the office as I go. Some one there may need it."

So she went for the coat while he did the last strapping to his suit case and dispatched his trunk by the carrier.

As Sylvia placed the garment on his arm she noticed a large stain of green paint on it and she said: "Where did you get all that green paint? High up on the shoulders, too, where it shows so plainly."

He replied, "Why, I don't know. I am sure I never saw that paint before, and I haven't been near any that I know of."

With housewifely care she examined it closely, and said, "It is all dry, too; it will never come off I am sure."

He only answered, "It is time for me to go now, dear, it is getting late and I must stop at the office before train time."

AN AUTOMOBILE EPISODE

BY

CARLOTTA ELIZABETH HOOPER

So he hurried away and Sylvia, feeling lonely and depressed, started to prepare for her own departure a little later. Then the postman came bringing her a letter from her brother, saying that her father and mother were away on a little pleasure trip and that they would not return for several days. The writer ended by saying that while he should be delighted to have her come immediately he could only be at home in the evening and he thought she might prefer to stay in the city for a day or two rather than face the dullness of a country place without companions.

"Oh, I'll go," said Sylvia, "and surprise father and mother when they come home."

Just then she was summoned to the telephone. Her very good friend Bessie Bradford said, in a troubled voice, "Oh, Sylvia, my dear, can you go in our auto car to-day out to Lakeside? I promised to take my visitor, Miss Gray, but my little Anita is not well. I dare not leave her, and I don't want Miss Gray to miss the trip. She goes so soon, you know. Luncheon for two has been ordered out there and I shall be delighted if you will take my place."

Sylvia hesitated a moment and then explained matters to her friend, but it was finally decided that she should remain another day and go with Miss Gray.

"I'll send the car for you at eleven o'clock," said her friend. "Luncheon will be served at one, then you can come home after you hear the band play for an hour or two. I am sure you will enjoy it, our chauffeur is absolutely reliable and Miss Gray is a delightful companion."

So Sylvia went, and in the pleasure of the rapid driving over a perfect road she forgot her loneliness and felt that the world was good after all. Miss Gray, a mature woman of the advanced type, meanwhile was talking earnestly and unceasingly, elucidating her theories in regard to various occult things. Finally Sylvia, whose thoughts were with her husband, heard her say, "There is no doubt about it, many of the happenings in our lives, indeed all, I might say, are from the beginning planned and worked out by fate, fortune or destiny, whichever you may choose to call it." Then suddenly she said, "What is your fortunate number?"

Her companion evidently did not understand, and she continued, "Let me explain. In my life everything goes by twos. If I have unexpected good fortune in one venture, I have it in another; if I have a sorrow, it comes hand in hand with another sorrow; if I see a strange or unusual sight, I am sure to see something else strange or unusual in a day or two. If I have one disappointment, I am sure to be disappointed again. Everything I do, or have, or know seems to be duplicated, and sooner or later I see the double, or feel it, or know it. I have an intimate friend who says seven is her number, but two is mine. Have you never noticed it?"

Then, without waiting for a reply, she seized her companion's arm, saying, "There, the last time I was out, also with a friend of Mrs. Bradford's (by the way, this is the second time Bessie could not go with me) I saw that man with the paint on his coat."

Sylvia looked at her companion in amazement, and found that she was intently regarding an automobile which had swung into the road, from a side street, just in front of them,

Sylvia felt the blood rush to her face and then recede as she followed Miss Gray's gaze and saw her husband, Ward Remington, seated in his own car wearing his tan auto coat with the identical smudge of green paint across the shoulders she had seen that morning. The other occupant of the car was a woman, evidently young, who wore over her hat a long mauve veil which effectually concealed her face.

Ward himself was wearing, beside the tell-tale coat, goggles and a black cap drawn down closely about his ears. She remembered that she had often asked him why he wore a black cap with a tan coat, and had suggested that one of tan color would look better. The other car kept ahead, but Sylvia could distinctly see its familiar number. Besides, without question, it was her husband. She knew the set of his shoulders, the poise of his head. She said to herself bitterly, this very attitude, as he leaned toward the girl to listen to her words, was proof enough.

Meanwhile Miss Gray was explaining about the man with the green paint. "You see," she said, "I saw them first when we went to the pleasure gardens in the other part of the city. I don't remember the name of the place, and as I said before, Bessie could not go at the last moment, so Miss Reynes and I went together, and we were amused because the man and this same girl (I remember her mauve veil) were so devoted to each other that they did not seem to realize that any one else existed, and while we were all listening to the band, the girl called the man's attention to the green paint which he had just gotten on his coat from the newly painted garden chairs in which they were sitting; the man, in turn, called some of the attendants and berated them soundly for using the chairs before they were dry. This, of course, was what attracted our attention particularly to the man and the girl, for they were sitting directly in front of us," went on Miss Gray volubly, "and now I see them again, as I might have known I should, for two things always happen alike with me. Now you can understand what I have been telling you about, how our lives go on in cycles of time ever revolving and returning."

But Sylvia, who had been listening intently and thinking deeply, presently interrupted the never ending flow of talk. "How long ago was it you saw them before?"

"Oh, it must have been a day or two. Isn't it odd about the magic of numbers in our lives?"

Sylvia merely nodded, she could not control herself enough to talk, but thereafter she heard nothing of the dissertation on destiny and occult influences.

Sylvia urged the chauffeur to hurry a little, she wanted to pass the other car if possible and see its occupants more distinctly, but Miss Gray protested. "I am terrified to go fast," she said, so the poor girl beside her sat in silent misery until they reached the popular resort known as Lakeside. There she looked in vain for her husband and his companion, although the automobile itself stood in plain sight, and Sylvia verified her almost absolute knowledge that it was her husband's car.

At luncheon she could not eat and looked so pale and strained that her companion suggested they should not wait for the music, but go home immediately. Sylvia was only too glad to do so, and felt devoutly thankful when at last she could shut herself in her own room and give way to her feelings. She tried to believe in her husband's faithfulness in spite of the strong evidence against him. The fact that he had expected her to be out of town that day and that he had undoubtedly lied to her when he disclaimed all knowledge of the paint on his coat; and that, according to Miss Gray, he and the same lady had been out together before—all shook her faith so completely that she sobbed aloud.

"Oh, Ward; if I could only have died before I knew these things! If I could only believe in you in spite of them all, but I cannot be mistaken. I have seen you with my own eyes."

No sleep came to her that night, and once, when she lay herself for a minute, a huge car seemed to be bearing down upon her, she trying in vain to evade it. She tried to call out to stop it, but the great machine still plunged toward her bearing Ward, and the girl whose mauve veil seemed to finally encircle them all in a dense mist, and, struggling for breath, she awoke to sleep no more.

future of his family that must suffer with him in the neglect of his private affairs. Mr. Johnson is not a man of fortune, in spite of his lucrative practice. He has twice lost the savings of years in the pursuit of his ideals, and he needs very much to have an uninterrupted opportunity to put his financial affairs upon a solid foundation.

But, now that he has realized that he is the choice of the progressive Republican sentiment of the state, he has cast his own inclination and interests to the rear and has come out with a ringing declaration of his life-long political creed, and he purposes to make a hot personal fight for the cause in which he believes. That creed is the destruction of the power of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau and the emancipation of the state from corporate control. To the success of a state ticket pledged to that reform he will give the best powers of his mature and brilliant mind, his remarkable and winsome personality, and the profoundly sincere and serious idealism of his nature.

RICH AND POOR SENATORS.

Senator Cullom of Illinois, who has been in Washington holding down his job ever since the oldest inhabitant was a kid, is undoubtedly poor, says the New York Times. If he has anything besides the clothes on his back nobody knows it and nobody would believe it if you told him so. Even the most violent enemies of Senator Cummins of Iowa will admit that he is pretty nearly broke, and those who are acquainted with the home life of Senator La Follette of Wisconsin assert that he barely makes both ends meet.

La Follette probably earns $30,000 or $40,000 a year on the Chautauqua and regular lecture platforms. But he has to spend every cent he can scrape together on the sinews of war in his state. At his last election he turned in an expense account, as required by law, showing that his Senatorial race cost him about $125,000. Much of this was furnished by his colleague, Senator Stephenson, the Wisconsin lumber king. As La Follette and Stephenson have had a falling out, Mr. La Follette will look elsewhere for financial help next campaign. Many of the Senators, as well as the Representatives, eke out an honest living by spellbinding to bevy of interested school teachers in the summer time. They will average about $150 and expenses a lecture. La Follette is supposed to collect $350 for each talk he delivers, and Dolliver of Iowa, another popular orator on the same platform, is said to get $200.

The richest man in the Senate, Simon Guggenheim of Denver, Col., is one of the seven brothers of the name, who dominate the smelting business of the country if not of the world. Probably they do not know what they are worth, for like all colossal fortunes the ups and downs of the market changes their millions this way or that every twenty-four hours. Probably their Montana smelters grinding out silver and copper, their mines of gold and coal in Alaska, their silver and copper properties in British Columbia, Mexico, Peru, and Nevada, and their tremendous real estate holdings in half a dozen of the big cities of the country would sell, if placed on the market, for $500,000,000. The Colorado Senator is supposed to be one of the equal partners in the mammoth family combination.

Senator Elkins' principal holdings are in railroads and mines in West Virginia, although he owns a tidy safe full of railroad assorted securities and commercial paper from various parts of the country. Mr. Elkins married a daughter of venerable ex-Senator Davis of West Virginia, and by that happy means was "let in" on the ground floor. Mr. Davis was associated with the late Senators Blaine and Brice and Richard Kerens of St. Louis (now Ambassador to Austria-Hungary) in many business ventures of large calibre. These included railroads and mines in the West as well as in Mr. Davis' own state.

Senator Warren of Wyoming has several million sheep working for him and owns miles and miles of territory in Wyoming. Nixon of Nevada made his in silver and gold. Newlands of the same state married most of his. Depew of New York owns large blocks of railroad stock and much valuable real estate. Mr. Oliver of Pennsylvania is one of the Pittsburgh steel kings. Crane of Massachusetts is a paper-made millionaire. His concern supplies the Government with all the paper that it uses in the manufacture of its money. That is the reason why Mr. Crane was not able, early in the Roosevelt administration, to accept the post of Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Aldrich of Rhode Island is heavily interested in many big New England corporations. His daughter married John D. Rockefeller, Jr. Mr. Wetmore of Rhode Island inherited his millions. DuPont made his in gunpowder. Hughes of Colorado got rich in mines. Kean of New Jersey belongs to a very wealthy family and inherited the bulk of his fortune.

Mr. Lodge of Massachusetts also was born with a fine large silver spoon in his mouth. The Cabots, on his mother's side, grew wealthy by making cotton cloth and collecting a subsidy from the state for the "infant industry." After the state quit paying the subsidy the Government began it in the shape of a protective tariff. Mr. Scott of West Virginia is commonly supposed to have made most of his money in glass. Mr. Bourne of Oregon owns cotton mills in Massachusetts that he inherited from his father and lumber mills in Oregon that he bought or started himself. He is a bachelor. Smoot of Utah is one of the Apostles of the great Mormon church, which is a very large and wealthy business organization. Mr. Root of New York made his in fees from big corporations. So did Senator Owen of Oklahoma, who, by the way, is part Indian. One fee alone, which he collected for settling up a land case with the Government on behalf of his red brethren, netted him $750,000.

Perkins of California, who is chairman of the Senate Naval committee, is interested in the Pacific coastwise shipping trade. Mr. Bailey of Texas has been very fortunate in collecting handsome legal fees. Some of these have made him trouble with his constituents, but he has always been able to prove to their satisfaction that he was entitled to all he got.

MRS. E. H. HARRIMAN.

Mrs. E. H. Harriman is above average height, very slight of figure, with kind, frank eyes, and a smile that is far more than a mere widening of the lips.

"She belongs to the type of 'home women,'" says a writer in the American Magazine, "and one's first thought of her is in her own house, before her own fire—in the big American room of the old house in Arden, surrounded by her children and her children's friends."

"In time doubtless the new palace built on the mountaintop at Arden will become associated with Mrs. Harriman (or Mrs. Harriman will become associated with it), but the old house—a low, rambling farmhouse with additions and outbuildings that were added as they were needed—was far more in keeping with Mrs. Harriman's personality."

"She is old fashioned in her supervision of household and family. She brought her children up in Spartan simplicity. They were put on ponies as soon as they could toddle. They were taught all open air sports and given the freedom of farmers' children. They ran perfectly wild outdoors; in fact they were brought up exactly as the average well-to-do farmer's children might be if the latter were given all the advantages of education."

"Aside from the fact of horses innumerable and land almost without end, there was no evidence of wealth. They kept open house, with really Southern hospitality, but it was all done in the simplest way. Mr. and Mrs. Harriman were examples of utmost domesticity, and both of them took the keenest interest in everything concerning the children. In their games or competitions Mrs. Harriman took quite as much interest as if she were riding or driving or playing herself."

"The big American room was the living room at Arden. Everything in it was American—wood, irons, glass, rugs, furniture and skins. There was one piece in it that came from Honolulu, but Mrs. Harriman said that she would not have had it in that room before the annexation of Hawaii to the United States."

"Mrs. Harriman was the only person in the world supposed to be entirely in Mr. Harriman's confidence. That a great master of complicated finance like Mr. Harriman should have turned his whole fortune over to his wife seemed to the public a curious thing. It had been quite naturally supposed by business men that the will would disclose the property lodged for administration in the hands of trustees."

"Such guesses, however, were evidently made without adequate knowledge of Mrs. Harriman's qualities, one of which is remarkable personal simplicity as contrasted with the extravagance of most New York society women. She impresses one as being independent of footman and lady's maid alike—naturalness and simplicity are her chief notes. Her children were brought up without ever suspecting that their father was even a moderately rich man. In the house now Mrs. Harriman wears white always. Mr. Harriman disliked black."

BERNARD SHAW'S NEWEST PLAY.

George Bernard Shaw, the playwright, in a characteristic interview talked in London last week, according to a dispatch to the New York Sun, of his new play, "Misalliance," which is soon to be produced at Charles Frohman's Repertory theater here. He said: "'Misalliance' in its action is just like getting married, only more so—much more so. I have carefully cherished, repeated and exaggerated every feature that the critics have denounced in my other plays. In the present instance there is no division into acts, no change of scene, no silly plot, not a scrap in fact of what the critics are pleased to call action. To sum it all up, there is nothing if you please but Shaw and some very good acting. I shall be sorry indeed to see my old colleagues leaving the theater angry, broken and tearful, but it will do them good and as they will spend the rest of the year scandalously advertising me as the most brilliant of beings I shall bear no malice whatever."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE.

In the state insectary in Sacramento now are 30,000,000 ladybugs which will be sent out to ranchers who may desire to use them in eliminating insect pests from the fruit-trees.

The Anzar ranch, near San Juan, San Benito county, consisting of 3,440 acres, has been sold to a syndicate, and will be set out to eucalyptus trees. The purchase price of the ranch was about $125,000.

The Esperanza Oil & Gas Company has sold a 12-year lease of 170 acres of land in the Coalinga oil field to J. Hayes Hammond for $400,000. This is one of the largest cash deals ever made in this district.

It is reported that the Santa Fe will build a branch from its main line near Solita to the Devil's Den oil field.

One hundred and ten dollars in currency recently was stolen from the safe of a pool room in Modesto. It is believed that the crime was committed by some patron of the institution.

The Southern Pacific Company has secured rights of way for a railroad to be constructed from Porterville to Springville. It is said that an electric line also will be constructed between the two points.

It is said that funds have been fully secured for the construction of an electric line between Sacramento and Vallejo.

Citizens of Orland soon will vote on a proposition to issue $150,000 worth of bonds to be used for local improvements.

Passenger boats between San Francisco and Sacramento soon will be run in the daytime instead of in the night as they now are run.

Mrs. Patrick Campbell, the English actress, will for a time desert the legitimate stage for vaudeville. She appeared lately at the Colonial Theatre, New York, in "A Russian Tragedy," based upon the play of Adolph Glass, which met with success in Paris.

PERSONALIA

Maxine Elliott's maiden name was Dermot. Her first husband's name was George A. McDermott.

Mary Mannering has recently made a success in a new play, "A Man's World," by Rachel Crothers, who wrote the delightful "The Three of Us."

Miriam Michelson, the well-known Californian novelist, is a native of Calaveras. Her mother's maiden name was Prbbslowski, which probably accounts for the pronounced brunette type to which Miss Michelson belongs.

Gertrude Franklin Atherton was born in San Francisco, daughter of Thomas L. Horn, but declines to give the date of the event. Mrs. Atherton's first novel, "The Dooms-woman," was published eighteen years ago. Nearly all her writing is done at the tavern on Mt. Tamalpais, though she spends most of her time in Europe. Her first play is now in process of incubation, and will probably be produced next year.

Eleanor Robson, whose engagement to August Belmont has been announced, is of English parentage but life-long American residence. Her first stage appearance was at the old California Theatre, in San Francisco, as Margery Knox in "Men and Women." Her mother is Mrs. Madge Carr Cook, who is famous for her impersonation of Mrs. Wiggs in "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch."

Sir Herbert Tree has added another to his long list of vividly-portrayed character parts, says a London correspondent of the New York Herald. This time it is the rollicking, penniless, romantic, fearless drunken Irish soldier of fortune, "The O'Flynn," not Lord O'Flynn, or Mr. O'Flynn, but "The O'Flynn." He is a cross between D'Artnagan and Charles O'Malley, in fact, a sort of Irish Cyrano De Bergerac. The play is by Justin Huntley McCarthy, who wrote "If I Were King," in which Southern made a great hit.

Baroness von Hutton has entered upon a dramatic career. She made her first appearance on the stage at His Majesty's Theatre in London in the revival of the Christmas play, "Pinky and the Fairies." The part which the Baroness took was one which Miss Ellen Terry played last year. Baroness von Hutton is noted for her cleverness and wit. Beerbohm Tree thinks there is the making of a great actress in her, although she enters the profession somewhat late. Before her marriage to the Chamberlain to the King of Bavaria, she was Miss Riddle of Erie, Pa.

Mrs. Minnie Madlern Fiske is preparing for the production of three plays in New York in the month after Easter. These will be Hendrik Ibsen's "Pillars of Society," Gerhart Hauptmann's "Hannele" and Arthur Schnitzler's "The Green Cockatoo." "Pillars of Society" will be the fourth play of the Norwegian dramatist in which Mrs. Fiske will have appeared. "Hannele" is a fantastic "dream poem" and "The Green Cockatoo" a one-act play of comedy and tragedy. When she leaves New York she will start on a tour across the continent which will occupy her time until next October.

Sarah Bernhardt will tour America again next season, appearing in the following roles: "L'Aiglon," by Edmond Rostand; "Jeanne D'Arc," by Emile Moreau; "Les Bouffons," by Miguel Zamacois; "Sapho," by Alphonse Daudet; "La Sorciere," by Victorien Sardou; "Camille," "La Beffa," which Bernhardt presents this month in Paris; "Adrienne Lecouvreur," by herself; "Phedre, La Rampe," by Rothschild; "La Tosca," by Victorien Sardou; "Un Coeur D'Homme," by herself; "Le Passe," by G. de Porto-Riche, and "Faust." She will leave France with her company at the end of October, and will open in New York in November. Mme. Bernhardt is also anxious to continue her tour through Mexico, Chili and most of the South American countries on the Pacific coast.

SHEAR WIT

Teacher—"I want to impress upon your young minds never to strike the first blow." Jimmie—"In dat case I don't see how we are ever goin' to have any scraps." Boston Herald.

"We are never completely happy," said the ready-made philosopher. "Of course not," said the practical person. "A boy wishes he were a man so that he could have all the mince pie he wants and a man wishes he were a boy so that he could digest it."—Washington Star.

"No, sir," said the recruiting officer; "I'm sorry to say your boy won't do at all for the navy." "Why not?" asked the lad's father. "He's cross-eyed." "Yes, I know that, but his eyes are crossed at such a peculiar angle that I thought you might be able to use him as a range finder."—Chicago Tribune.

A white man and a negro got drunk together at a hotel, and were put into separate beds by a practical joker, who took occasion to blacken the white man's face. When the latter was awakened in the morning, as per instructions, he caught sight of his face in the glass. "Why, they've waked the nigger instead of me!" was his exclamation as he rolled back into bed.—New York Times.

A deaf but pious English lady, visiting a small country town in Scotland, went to church armed with an ear trumpet. The elders had never seen one, and viewed it with suspicion and uneasiness. After a short consultation one of them went up to the lady, just before the opening of the service, and wagging his finger at her warningly, whispered, "One toot, and ye're oot!"—Human Life.

Henry E. Dixey, at a dinner at the Lambs, said of an actor who failed in a new part: "His idea of the part was so confused and wrong that it reminded me of Ferguson. Ferguson, you know, awoke one morning after a studio supper—you know what studio suppers are—and groaned and muttered: 'Dear me, what a headache.' He screwed up his lips in disgust. The taste in his mouth was horrible. He thought he'd have a look at his tongue, and, reaching out for the handglass, he took up by mistake a silver-backed hairbrush. He stared at the bristles a long while, then he shook his head and said: 'Fergy, my boy, you certainly do need a shave.'"

An officer who was going ashore from the United States steamship Albatross against a high wind, noticing that the gig made little progress, turned to his colored servant and asked him if he could row. The boy replied that he could not. "What," exclaimed his master; "you have been on board ship a year and can't row?" "Deed, sah, I's nevah rowed in my life." "Then it's time you learned. Pick up those oars and try to row, at least." A light broke over the darky's face, and as he scrambled over the seats to his place he chuckled: "Ef dis is what yo' mean, ob co'se I kin row. I was reckonin' as yo' meant fo' me to ro' like a lion."—Harper's Magazine.

The multimillionaire Astors, Colonel John Jacob Astor and his cousin, William Waldorf Astor, are both authors. John Jacob Astor wrote a book called "A Journey in Other Worlds," which he lists as co-ordinate with such other achievements as building a costly hotel and presenting a $100,000 mountain battery to the United States Government for use in the Spanish war. William Waldorf Astor is the author of two historical novels, "Valentine, a Story of Rome," and "Sforza, an Historical Romance of the 16th Century in Italy," these being diversions from the care of managing the Astor estate, of which he is the head, and his personal fortune, which is estimated at $100,000,000. William Waldorf also owns the Pall Mall Gazette and the Pall Mall Magazine, of London.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137, Dep't.
The People of the State of California:
To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.
[Seal of Superior Court] H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

Memoranda.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

When the Direct Primary Law Applies.

There are certain words and phrases used throughout the Direct Primary law that must be understood in order to know what the law is talking about. For instance, the term, "Primary Election" refers to any and every election held for nominating candidates. The term, "August Primary" refers to the primary election held every four years for the nomination of candidates to be voted for in the succeeding November, at what we call the "general election" at which we elect state and county officers.

It was thought best by our constitution makers to separate the presidential election from the state and county general election so as not to confuse the issues in the minds of voters, and also to prevent that trading of votes among voters which sometimes results in subordinating the interests of the nation to the interests of a county or township fight, for there are persons who care more who is constable in their township than who is president of the United States. For a similar reason it has been found better to hold city elections apart from either general or presidential elections. The voting public votes most intelligently when it does not have too many issues to determine at one time.

With this interpretation of the terms used in the Act we may proceed to consider to what elections the law applies and to what it does not. Or, perhaps it will be easier to specify to what elections the Direct Primary law does not apply. After excluding these we may know that it applies to all other elections.

The Direct Primary law does not apply to elections to fill vacancies caused by death or resignation or from any other cause, but under our laws there are few such elections held anyway. Vacancies are usually filled by appointment of the governor, the board of supervisors or other executive body. In the case of a vacancy in an assembly or senatorial district a special election is ordered by the governor, in which cases candidates will go on the ballot by petition.

The Direct Primary does not apply to cities whose charters provide a separate system of nominating officers. We have two excellent examples of the different methods employed in our two leading cities, San Francisco and Los Angeles. San Francisco provides in its charter for the use of the state system of nomination, no matter how often or how radically the state primary law may be changed. The charter of Los Angeles, on the contrary, provides a separate system which the state law has nothing to do with. Under the San Francisco system nominations have to be made on party lines while in Los Angeles party lines are purposely obliterated and all candidates go on the primary ballot by petition. Berkeley has a system of its own, too, which we shall some time make the subject of one of these lessons.

The Direct Primary law has nothing to do with elections in districts that are not in the nature of municipalities, such as irrigation, sanitary or drainage districts. The law does not apply to the nomination of school trustees in cities of the sixth class, nor to school district officers, except in those districts where a school district is all or partly within the boundaries of a municipality to which the Direct Primary law does apply.

Of course there are many special elections held for voting bonds or deciding other issues, but at which no officers are elected, with which the Direct Primary has nothing to do.

With the exceptions noted, "all candidates for elective public offices shall be nominated as provided in the Direct Primary law," with the further exception that certain candidates for office at certain times and under certain conditions may be nominated by petition, as will hereafter be explained.

For long years there has been objection to a general primary law for all the state, coming mainly from the smaller cities and country districts where fraud is seldom practiced and the caucus and convention system, as a general thing, worked excellently well. The country districts dreaded the expense and bother and so the old primary law, which was not direct but representative, applied only to certain prescribed cities and counties; but the preservation of the state from the trickery and rascality practiced in the larger cities, in state affairs, made it necessary to make the Direct Primary law state-wide in its application. The new system is complicated and costly, as we shall see as our investigation proceeds, but it is less costly than permitting free government to be supplanted by an incorporated plutocracy governing with high hand and in purely selfish interests.

When the country delegations went to the state conventions with their favorite son candidates for office they found the big city delegations banded together in the hands of crafty manipulators and ready to trade a hundred votes for half a dozen for the nomination of candidates acceptable to the big corporation that essayed to govern the state instead of being governed by the state that had created it. In no other way could a country candidate for a state office be nominated except by trading with the boss or bosses of the city delegations. If the bosses of San Francisco, Los Angeles, Sacramento and Oakland could get together, and they generally could for the reason that they were all in the employ or under control of the Big Boss of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, they could come very near to having votes enough to nominate whom they would. If they lacked any number of votes they could trade with some interior county, perhaps with one in the north and another in the south, and so make a combination that could not be broken.

The result of all this, not at all an unnatural tendency among men who care more for office than for free government, was that government mainly got into the hands of second grade, if not low grade, men who conducted it in special rather than the public interest. Hence the demand for a direct primary law and the abolishment of the badly abused convention system.

"For Cause."

NO ONE NOT A SPOILSMAN could have entertained the idea that "for cause," as ground for removal from office, could imply anything other than culpable neglect or gross incapacity. Any other construction would constitute a felonious assault upon the dictionary. P. H. McCarthy's elevation to the mayoralty does not constitute "for cause," nor is the mayor justified in taking his own "vox" to be "vox populi." His election was consummated through the indispensable aid of the associated villainies of San Francisco. He lacked 3,882 votes of having received a majority of the votes cast, and no candidate so lacking has a right to feel that he is the state or the city over whose misfortunes he presides.

Knocks for Knox.

THE TAFT CABINET has been so much under fire that there appears to be a disposition to hit it every time a head appears above the parapets. This is indiscriminating and unwise. In striving to neutralize the Manchurian railway investments Secretary Knox was working in good faith to carry out the John Hay program of maintaining the integrity of China and the open door. His effort more recently made to elevate the international prize court at The Hague into an international court of general judicature was splendidly directed and it militates nothing against it that Great Britain is not for it. France appears to be for it and there is reason to hope that the combined influence of France and America may win other nations to a similar way of thinking. Give Philander his due.

Why Doesn't He Do It?

SENATOR NELSON A. ALDRICH has been quoted as saying that, if he were given a free hand, he could so order the affairs of this nation as to save from its expenditures $300,000,000 a year. Why does he not do it, then? If he has not a free hand (and a lone hand, too) who has? Between himself and the President the most amicable relations appear to exist, he is boss of the ruling house of congress and if the judiciary be not in sympathy with his point of view it has not given recent evidence of strained relations. More than anyone else the public mind is holding him responsible for results. Why, then, does he not inaugurate his policy of saving? But, Senator Aldrich, whose $300,000,000 will that be when it shall have been saved?

The Awful Avalanche.

THE CASUALTIES that have befallen towns and express trains in our mountain canyons have been awful. Are they the acts of God or do they owe their existence to want of human foresight and bad engineering? Have these eventualities been properly considered or has passion for dividends prompted transportation companies to take chances that need not be taken? What are railroad commissions and interstate commerce commissions for if not to make inquiry in such matters?

Beware How You Register.

GET YOUR NAME on the Great Register of your county and do it now, but beware how you do it. The clerk will ask you about your party affiliations. If you answer that you are a Lincoln-Roosevelter he will register you as such, but, inasmuch as there is no such political party, there will be no ticket for you to vote at the August primary. Do not state that you are an independent. The independents do not constitute a political party and, if you register as such, you will have no vote at the August primary. Therefore affiliate with the party that lies nearest to your way of thinking and take a hand in making up a ticket that will be a good one for honest men to vote at the November election. By failing to appreciate the need for this care some of the best men in California are being self-disfranchised and self-deceived as to their duties as citizens.

Power of a Moral Purpose.

CHARLES F. CURRY makes his appeal for the suffrages of men because he wants to be governor, and for no other reason. P. A. Stanton adds to the reason which Curry advances the argument that the candidate ought to come from south of Tehachapi this time. Alden Anderson offers himself on the altar of sacrifice in the belief that the material interests of the state need to be promoted. These justifications for candidacy have their value. But how different in the case of Hiram Johnson! His purpose is the emancipation of a commonwealth from the political domination of a great, grasping and unscrupulous affiliation of predatory corporations, the reestablishment of free government, the simplification and perfecting of the machinery for establishing justice among men. A great and splendid moral purpose! There is no estimating the power there is in such a purpose, but California is likely to afford an object lesson in the potency of that power when the ballots for the August primary have been counted, that is, if there be a God in Israel.

Adamantine Implacability.

THERE IS SOMETHING SPLENDID in the stern, unflinching resolution of a stalwart character. Men admire the will that does not weaken, the determination immovable, but when these high qualities degenerate into an adamant implacability, as in the cases of the managers of the street railway system of Philadelphia, admiration gives place to scorn. No matter what justice or injustice there may have been in the original cause of dispute between the car company and the men, the present attitude of the car company is unjustifiable. Their declaration is, in substance: "We will not arbitrate; we shall rule; our wills shall be unquestioned; what the controversy may cost others is not our concern; we shall establish our authority at every hazard." Unless the wheels of human progress revolve backward instead of forward, that attitude of mind cannot be sanctioned. Autocracy, in government or industry, is not to be endured. Men must agree mutually or some power outside of themselves must judge between them. Their differences must be heard, arbitrated, determined and compliance enforced. Any other policy leads to slavery or anarchy.

Some Interesting Relationships.

WITHOUT THE AID of a detective agency, with a William J. Burns at its head, the public can only know of relationships sustained in public life by putting this and that together and then drawing keen-witted conclusions. Many men are asking if the history made by the Schmitz-Ruef regime is to be repeated forthwith. The query is pertinent. Elsewhere in this paper some interesting relationships are developed. The agency that collects the city's rents is brother-in-law to Tiley L. Ford, and the active factor of that agency is president of the Sutter Street railroad, one of the Calhoun properties. Add to this the known fact that every Calhoun supporter was a supporter of McCarthy and the least that may be said is that the Men of San Francisco will do well to keep their eyes peeled.

Just Across the Line.

No amount of argument, whether advanced by President or precinct boss, can convince a citizen of Detroit that a high tariff does not mean high prices. The little Canadian city of Windsor, just across the river, is a standing refutation of the argument. Prices of such commodities as enter into consumption in ordinary family life range at Windsor from 25 to 40 per cent. below the price level on this side of the river. Yet Canada is a protectionist country and has all the protection the infant industries require. If our country were to enter into a tariff agreement with Canada, by which a mutual schedule could be adopted, and then have free trade across the line, we should be doing something worth while and should be laying the foundation for that "ocean-bound" republic that, one day, might prove to be the greatest single fact in the family of nations. Nothing has crippled us more than the narrow horizons of our American statesmanship. Few of our alleged statesmen have been able to see beyond where the earth and sky seemingly touched. It should be borne in mind, too, that the increase in the world's supply of gold has had the same effect upon prices on the other side of the Canadian line as on this side of it. "All the protection that is needed, but not a dollar for monopolies," is the correct doctrine.

Can Pinchot Make His Case?

When Gifford Pinchot made his opening statement before the Ballinger investigation committee he told in plain English what he believed to be true. But can he make the committee believe it? Can he convince the American people of the truth of his allegations? The burden of proof is on him, and it is no easy thing to prove that a man intended to steal a horse if he did not steal it.

The position of Pinchot is beset with difficulties. Ballinger is cunning. He knows how to cover his tracks. He has committed few overt acts. Pinchot could not wait until Ballinger had admitted the coal lands to patent in order to "catch him with the goods on him." That would have been to lose those lands to the nation, and it was vastly more important to save those lands than to convict Ballinger of being disloyal to the conservation policy.

It is to be hoped that the country will bear in mind the difficulties of Mr. Pinchot's position and judge him accordingly. Becoming convinced of the disloyalty of Ballinger there was only one thing for him to do and that was to head Ballinger off before he could do much mischief, and this he did. All honor to him for doing it!

Nor is it necessary for him to convict Ballinger beyond a reasonable doubt. Ballinger must exculpate himself beyond a reasonable doubt or stand before the country a questionable official, and no questionable man should be allowed to hold such a position. In fact the President can not rid himself of Ballinger any too soon for the credit of his administration and, while he is about it, he would do well to rid himself of Hitchcock, who was responsible for Ballinger and is responsible for much of the public distrust of the President's administration.

Not Surprising.

That Secretary Ballinger should call upon San Francisco to show cause why the Hetch Hetchy permit should not be revoked need surprise no one. It was to be anticipated. Whatever the pretext a fundamental cause will, some day, prove to have been the failure to purchase the Spring Valley system. It can not be too clearly fixed in the mind that neither congress, this administration nor any other, nor yet the courts, will look with favor upon a municipal water system being placed in competition with a corporate system to the eventual annihilation of a great private investment. The inviolability of property is too well established in the official mind to leave any doubt on that score. If a city would have equity it must be ready to do equity. San Francisco had a chance to do equity in the recent election but failed to make the most of its opportunity, although by a narrow margin. For that miscarriage Mayor McCarthy was responsible, and for Mayor McCarthy the associated villainies are as clearly responsible. Not until free government has been re-established can we hope for better things.

The Menace of Morganization.

Not only is the "Morganization" of American industrial, commercial and financial affairs coming to be of great concern to thoughtful Americans but to the financial interests of Europe as well. A German publicist of note lately declared it to be a menace to the human race.

The California Weekly, some time since, gave some figures tending to show the magnitude of these associated interests, but they were incomplete. More recent investigations have well nigh doubled them. They are divided into five principal groups: the railways, with a capitalization of $4,723,453,945; the industrial and commercial group, with a capitalization of $2,313,099,000; the insurance group, with assets aggregating $1,029,626,178; the banking group, with assets amounting to $671,322,500; the trust company group, $438,806,800, or a total for the five groups of $9,176,308,423.

But this includes only the American interests and not those in England and France where the House of Morgan has vast investments and connections. It is believed that the total capitalization of financial enterprises combined in the Morgan system at home and abroad will round out $12,000,000,000 of productive wealth. The railroads in this country alone, which were either financed in the first instance or partly owned by the Morgan interests, total 71,000 miles and have an earning power of one-third of all the railroads in the United States.

A centralization that places in the hands of one man, for guidance if not for sole ownership, one-ninth of the wealth of this nation and one-tenth of the banking power is too great a centralization to be safe. To be sure, J. Pierpont Morgan will not live always, that is, in this world of grab, but neither did Meyer Anselm Rothschild, but for nearly a century and three-quarters the house he founded has grown more opulent and more powerful until now only the American houses of Rockefeller and Morgan are greater.

That human development requires such vast centralizations of productive wealth is more than questionable. It is a menace rather than a benefaction. It has been accomplished by the breaking down of competition and by the erection of an insurmountable tariff wall. Against this thing American manhood must set its face or the commonwealth will cease to be a common property and plutocracy and proletariat will be as characteristic of America as of Asia.

Portable Schools.

Kansas has entered upon a new phase of the policy of carrying the school to the boy and girl as well as sending the boy and girl to school. The agricultural college of that state has organized teaching staffs for a cooking school, a sewing school, a school for dairying and another for horticulture. Each school has a trained teacher and one or two graduate assistants and goes to any place where wanted to remain a week. The community inviting the school must furnish the necessary equipments, except such as may easily be transported, and must entertain the instructors while there. Classes are formed, regular hours devoted to study, recitation and demonstration and, when the week has ended, the pupils have had a new light break in upon their intelligences and a thirst planted for more knowledge on the subject. The college pays the teachers' salaries and their traveling expenses. California should be able to maintain a dozen or twenty such schools to advantage as part of the university extension work. They should leaven a good deal of self-satisfied but unprosperous humanity.

A Matter of Mastery.

The completion of the Panama canal is barely five years away. The transcontinental railroads are preparing for that event. Are the people? If the railroads make preparation for it and the people do not the Panama canal that will have cost the nation so many hundreds of millions, will profit the public not at all, except as incident to the national defense. By controlling transportation by water as well as by land the railroads can make the Panama canal as though it did not exist.

The gospel of railroad control is being preached throughout the land. The President is a convert to it. Nearly all the states in the union are wrestling with the problem. Congress is tugging away at it now. California re-opened the subject, after thirty years of inaction, during the last session of the legislature, with what results we have clearly set forth elsewhere in this issue.

California has been so long governed by its railroads that a whole generation has grown up that never knew any other form of government. It is small wonder that so many accept it as matter-of-course and are loth to attempt to throw off the yoke of bondage. It is trite to say that the people must rule the railroads or the railroads will rule the people, but it is so. And not only will the railroads rule the people in a political sense, but in a material as well. With the railroads in control of government it will be idle to discuss whether rates should be fixed with regard to either the "cost" or the "value" of the service. They will be so fixed as to take from productive industry the net results of that industry, and they will be so fixed as to build up the interior states and municipalities rather than the coast cities and commonwealths, for in that direction lie the railroad interests. They must fetch and carry everything the interior can raise or produce.

The issue of railroad control and regulation was not settled by the legislature of 1909. The analysis elsewhere given of the Webb and the Wright bills makes this evident. The difference between the two measures is too wide and too fundamental to admit of the case being closed. A legislature should be elected with a purpose to supplant the Wright law with the Webb bill, improved as much as it can be, as the Webb bill was supplanted by the Wright law. The issue is one of mastery. Which is the bigger, the more powerful, the more just, the fittest to govern, the Manhood or the railroads of California?

The struggle of the people is for justice. The struggle of the Railroads is for dividends. With justice triumphant the railroads can not be wronged. With the railroads triumphant justice can not escape being outraged. It is a matter of mastery. Let that never be lost sight of. If the people of California sleep on their rights they will never know, in any practical way, that such a thing as the Panama canal was ever in contemplation.

One Year of Taft.

It is not time to judge President Taft by results accomplished. That time will not come for three years, but he has been long enough in the presidential chair to enable us to judge of his tendencies, and these are to be determined by his significant acts. What have they been?

He refused to use his influence with members of the House of Representatives for the substitution of a house committee on committees to supplant those autocratic methods of constituting committees popularly known as "Cannonism," and by so doing continued that system in injurious operation.

He made Postmaster General Hitchcock the George Hatton of his administration with the result that the power of patronage has been employed to reward and punish rather than with an eye single to the good of the public service.

He made an injurious compromise on the tariff issue and has ever since been trying to convince the public that they have no cause to complain of the tariff, whereas the consensus of opinion, outside of New England and Wall street, is that the bill should have been vetoed.

He made a bad order when he commanded that no subordinate official should give out information to members of congress or citizens except through the heads of the departments, an order that makes against a healthful publicity and which goaded Gifford Pinchot to a splendid insubordination which cost the Forest Service one of the most valuable men this country has produced.

He has unduly exalted party solidarity and has, as a result of so doing, sought to coerce independent minded men into "taking program" from that portion of the Republican party which is peculiarly under the domination of corporate interests.

He has, through adherence to party methods, sought to accomplish his purposes through the aid of those who are in fact opposed to his policies instead of by the aid of those who have been for his policies from the beginning, reinforced by a sound and deeply interested public sentiment.

He has done all of these things from the purest motives, in the spirit of the most unswerving fidelity to the Roosevelt policies which he was elected to crystalize into statutes. If he shall yet succeed in so crystalizing them he will put his critics all in the wrong; but if he does not he will reach the end of his administration discredited and unsung and will invite such a demand for the return of Theodore Roosevelt to the executive office as will sweep all opposition from before it.

No president ever went into office with a heartier good will from all sources than William Howard Taft and no president ever closed his first year of administration amid a more wide-spread dissatisfaction with the tendencies it has manifested.

And yet the good intentions and sincerity of no president were ever less seriously questioned than in the case of President Taft. The issue is one of method in getting results. He believes in its efficiency. Few others do.

What Will Roosevelt Say?

Nothing that anybody says that Theodore Roosevelt has said is to be given any credence. Whatever he has to say he will say himself in a public way as to make it authoritative.

Meantime, one man's guess as to what he will say is as good as another's. We'll venture ours.

He will affirm his unshaken confidence in William Howard Taft and the sincerity of his purpose to carry the Roosevelt policies into execution. That confidence is shared by the American people and is not greatly shaken even now.

He will appeal to the American people to stand by the President in his efforts to secure legislation favorable to his policies, an appeal which President Taft has not made, probably because he does not know how to make it.

Then he will wade into the representatives of the interests in control of the Republican organization in a way that they will despise. He will arraign them at the bar of public opinion for having given the President a stone when he asked, as prettily as he knew how, for bread.

In short, he will strive to supplement the judicial poise and sound discretion of Taft with the love of combat of Roosevelt, with the result that the session of congress opening in December, 1910, will prove mighty interesting.

That's our guess.

What May a City Do?

Let it be said at the outset that no city ought to undertake to do anything that it can get anybody else to do for it equally well, at a fair compensation and with clean hands. The indispensable obligations of government are onerous enough, let a city confine its activities as it may.

But what may a city do when its public service agents perform their duties badly, make their charges extortionate and plunge their hands into municipal corruption to the elbows at every opportunity?

The answer is that a city, under such circumstances, should be constitutionally free to do any and all things that any person, firm or private corporation may undertake to do, and if our constitution or our charter are not broad enough to admit of this, then a campaign to so broaden them should be launched forthwith.

A city is a collection of individuals and should have power to do any of the things which an individual may do under the law. If the bake shops of San Francisco were to form a conspiracy to extort an undue recompense for bread, and there existed no other way of breaking up the combination, then the city should have the power to establish municipal bakeries in defense of the citizens.

Let us keep municipal trading reduced to the lowest terms consistent with justice and efficiency of administration and, that such activities may be so reduced and so maintained, let us have no limit to the power of a city to do anything that the public welfare needs to have done.

A Significant Nose-Counting.

That a great city like Chicago, with saloons on every corner and deadfalls in the middle of every block, is to vote on the saloon or no saloon issue should have a significant value to persons most concerned. It is important, within itself, that 75,000 voters could be found in Chicago to sign petitions demanding a referendum vote on such an issue.

It is not likely that Chicago will vote "dry," in the April city election, but there will be so heavy a "dry" vote cast as to make the "wet" interests put their thinking caps on, unless they are so hopelessly Bourbon in their instincts as to be incapable of discerning the signs of the times.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Years ago the writer of this saw on the streets of the town in which he lived an old gentleman who, in former years, had been a merchant and, as such, had paid the writer many a dollar for advertising, but the merchant had failed in business and, as our western saying is, was "down on his luck." The impulse was to go and hand him five dollars with the suggestion that he might be able to make better use of it than the writer. The impulse was not followed, partly through fear of giving offense, partly because the five-dollar piece felt comfortable in the writer's own pocket, a pocket not in the habit of containing too many of them. Afterward he overheard the merchant, once again upon his feet, tell of having gone hungry in that town and the thought has ever since haunted the writer that it was very likely on that day when that generous impulse came into his mind and was not acted upon. He will not rid himself of that thought this side of the grave.

A good impulse is not worth shucks unless it is acted upon. The world is full of people whose impulses are of the best, but little of real benefit to others ever comes of them. Such persons think good thoughts, the heart inspires the brain with noble intentions, but these good impulses are in the plight of the paralytic at the pool. When the angel troubles the waters self love steps in between the good intention and its accomplishment and brings the purpose to naught.

We do not know where these good impulses come from. We all have them, but our paths through life are not marked by monuments erected to their achievements. On the contrary they are strewn with the wreckage of good intentions unfulfilled. Literature and folk lore are full of "premonitions," "hunches," and subtle suggestions that come up out of the mysterious depths of being, and so is the life experience of every man and woman. Some say that these things come to us from the influence of those of our friends and relatives whom we have lost a while, some that we are each of us equipped with a guardian angel to whisper good thoughts into our listening minds, some that the Christ lives and can make his influence felt in the depths of our souls, some that Almighty God walks with us and will speak if we will listen and that these good impulses come from him. Frankly the writer does not know where they come from, but come they do and from no origin of which we need be ashamed. It is not impossible that, when they come, we are, like Moses before the burning bush, standing on holy ground.

In our gardens if we find a flower peeping up through the ground, beset with mustard or tarweed, we instinctively stoop down and weed away from it the enemies that would stifle it. Our good impulses, those "hunches" to do a kindly act, need just as careful cultivation. They are easily choked out. They are not very tenacious of life. They are quite delicate at the first, just as we ourselves, at the first, need the mother's bosom, the crooning song, the love inexpressible to keep the breath of life in us; but there is reason to believe that if these good impulses are cherished, these impulses that come, from where we no more know than we know where we ourselves derive our own souls,—yes, there is reason to believe that if we cherish these impulses they will, by and by, develop into robust purposes, possibly into ruling passions. They may not only be germs of fruitful life but germs of future life, for what can be more grand in this world or the next than a robust, purposeful character ever inspired by impulses to do good in this world or any other?

So, when one of these good impulses comes, though we know not how or whence, let us not cast it aside with a toss of the head. For aught one may know he may be in a celestial presence. For aught one may know there may be One knocking at the innermost door of the soul's being. For, be it remembered while living in one world we stand on the threshold of two more, behind and before.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Non-Graduate as Man of Affairs.

Let the facts go for what they are worth, and let the individual reader form his own conclusion concerning their significance, and, regardless of the nature of this conclusion, it must be admitted that the truths revealed by a recent investigation of the business standing of Yale University's graduates and non-graduates are both striking and interesting. The investigation, conducted by Dr. Charles Brown of the secretary's office of Yale, disclosed the fact that the total of the university's graduates is about 23,000, while the number of students who entered the university, but did not graduate, is 6,872, or about three and one-third graduates to each non-graduate. Yet, vastly outnumbered as the non-graduates are, they outnumbered the graduates in the following professions or callings: Art, architecture and music, governmental affairs, journalism and letters, manufacturing, mercantile business, the ministry, transportation, and farming. In educational affairs, finance, medicine, and science, they ran the graduates a close race, while in engineering and law they were left entirely behind. To sum up, there were eight leading vocations in which they (with a proportion of much more than three to one against them) outnumbered the graduates, four in which they fell but little behind, and but two in which they were largely outnumbered. So stand the facts as announced by the secretary's office of Yale. As for the conclusions to be based upon them, as has been said, the readers may form them for themselves, and there will not be many less shades of them than there are readers.

Strap-hangers Should Look Pleased.

The Public Service Commission of New York has issued an order which, in its operation or non-operation, should be observed with a good deal of interest by strap-hangers, whether east, west, north or south. The order runs to the effect that, in the cars run in the subways, there must at all times be seats sufficient for all passengers. Sounds good, doesn't it? For if such an edict can be enforced in the subways, why not on surface cars as well? Truly, the order looks like a beacon of hope shining in a night of strap-hanging gloom. There is one condition, however, which gives the rejoicing pause: No passenger must be kept waiting for a seat more than a half hour. If the railroad company cannot hang trouble for the public on that peg; if it cannot and does not keep almost everybody waiting, in order to demonstrate that the order is injurious, then does it differ from some railroads that some people have known, say, west of the Rockies. However, the effect of the edict will be observed with deep interest out here.

What Sort of Music Does She Like?

A professor of the University of Berlin not long ago delivered a presumably profound lecture on the subject, "The Influence of Music on Women." He arrived at the conclusion, which he imparted to his hearers, that a woman's character may be judged by the kind of music she prefers. Possibly the same rule might apply to men, but the professor did not say so, and consequently we are left in the dark concerning this phase of the subject. Getting down to the specific, the learned professor revealed the rules by which one may discover the lady of one's choice: Admirers of Saint-Saens' music are well balanced (unless their hats overbalance them presumably), those who are fond of Massenet are timid, admirers of Wagner tend toward megalomania (see Webster, or somebody), vulgarity prefers Flotow, the romantic choose Gounod, Listz's lovers are ambitious, Beethoven's clientele are vain, and those who adore Strauss are mentally and spiritually shallow. Unfortunately the sage professor did not say what are the characteristics of those who display a preference for rag-time or something of that sort. Then, too, suppose that She does not care particularly for music in any form, what — But the waters are becoming too deep and troubled for safe sailing.

Looking for Bodies Forty Years Dead.

On the sixth day of September, 1870, H. Randall, of Boston, and his five guides perished in a terrible snowstorm which raged on the Bossons glacier near the summit of Mont Blanc. That was almost forty years ago, and in much less than that time all that is mortal of the man who has passed away generally has joined the elements which gave it birth. Yet now constant watch is being kept for the bodies of these men, and it is expected that when found they will be as perfect in form as on they day when their lives went out. Through all these tens of thousands of days their tomb of ice in a frozen river has been creeping toward the place where it shall give their bodies up to whomsoever will care for them, and Science informs us that that point now may be reached on any day. Through four decades the mighty glacier, crawling inch by inch upon its tortuous way, may hold its dead in icy chains, but then it must give them up. There may be a delay of even a year or two before a body is caught in the slow-grinding sweep of that remorseless current, but sooner or later it must be, and then the time when it shall be discarded, with rocks, trees and other refuse, at the mouth of the frozen flood is measured and known. So it is that scientists say that the bodies of these men should be set free from their forty-year bondage either this year, or, at any rate, very soon.

Uncle Sam Helps Out Senator Depew.

Uncle Sam lately expressed his belief that magazines and periodicals should pay higher rates of postage. From this serious fact let us lightly turn to consideration of Senator Depew, a gentleman who always richly rewards consideration. The honorable gentleman recently made a speech in the senate, or, in any event, the Congressional Record said that he did, in which he painted a rare, sunset-tinted verbal picture of the glorious sun of prosperity which now beams benignantly upon this people. In considering that speech, Mr. Depew concluded that it was a vote-winner, so, as he wishes, quite regardless of his hard-earned reputation, to be returned to the senate, he decided to send copies of that speech out to voters. He did so—150,000 copies, and every one of them franked. Now, speaking of the necessity of increasing the receipts of the postoffice department, let us reason together a bit. If postage at regular rates had been paid on each of these 150,000 copies it would have amounted to $1,500 at least, possibly to twice that sum. Of course Senator Depew's frank did the business all right, but why should a department that is in need of funds stand the expense of helping to herd the honorable gentleman's voters into his pen? There are 92 senators, and practically all of them have political aspirations of their own. Suppose that each one of them got as busy as did Mr. Depew, it would cost this government $138,000 for its gift of postage for them. And this, mark you, at just one round-up. One shrinks from considering what it might cost in the course of a lively campaign. But it is respectfully suggested that the government might consider this franking privilege, its uses and abuses, before it decides to make it harder for a magazine-publisher to live.

Irish Immigration to America.

By far the greater number of Irish immigrants who come to America land at the port of New York, so the statistics relating to that immigration give a fair idea of the proportions of the total. During 1909 the number that landed in New York was 21,716, a small number as compared with the immigration from southern Europe of far inferior average quality. Of the number that came 11,240 were men and 10,496 were women, which is fairly indicative that the men brought their wives and families. These immigrants brought with them $558,771, an average of $25.73 apiece, which at the present price of meat and other supplies is none too much. Seventy-seven were returned as unable to support themselves. It will be seen that these immigrants are some distance from being wealthy, but what would our police forces do without them?

Russia Still Exiling Jews.

The Jewish Chronicle, published in London, announces that there soon will be a large emigration of Jews from Russia to the United States and Canada. This will be due to the fact that the Russian police are persecuting the Jews in all ways that lie within their power. They propose to drive all descendants of Abraham within the pale of settlement in the cities and to many thousands this practically means banishment, while large numbers already have been exiled.

Hawthorne's Tales.

Hawthorne is Poe's greatest American rival for supremacy in the art of short story writing. He has not the wonderful, the inimitable style of Poe, but his mind wanders through a realm of thought as distinctly his own, in which he is wholly at home and into which he draws the reader irresistibly, until incredulity and hesitation are gone and we yield ourselves to the grip of the story and the fascination of the strange scenes into which he has led us. Whoever has read "Dr. Heidegger's Experiment" has felt the sensation of complete surrender to the story teller's art, as he has slipped unconsciously into acceptance of its impossible miracle and tasted the gentle irony with which Hawthorne saw the cup of life embittered.

Poe sweeps us into a world that never was nor will be, and compels us to believe in its unrealities and to see the murky glory of his transitory dream. Hawthorne leads us quickly by the hand into a world half real and half of shadows, where impossible things happen as a matter of course, and whence we return by easy stages through growing probabilities to the real again. Poe tells a tale for its own sake, for its dramatic appeal, for its sensuous beauty, because his own fierce passions must have outlet in artistic form. Hawthorne writes from a moral impulse; he fashions scenes and characters to make vivid moral crises and personifications of tempted humanity; his stories teach the evanescent character of life, the grandeur of moral courage, the beauty of moral truth, the punishment of moral degradation.

If Hawthorne had been less of a Puritan moralist and more of an artist, his stories would be greater. To be a moral writer is to distort life a little, that a lesson may be taught. To be an artist is to depict life, not necessarily as in a mirror, but always with the relative values of nature, and, this done, truth follows inevitably—and the moralist reader may draw the moral if he will.

But, in spite of his defects, Hawthorne's stories stand in a solitary niche of fame, not supremely high, but full of interest and suggestion to all sensitive readers.

A ROMANTIC REVIVAL.

French literary journals are making much of a change in the public taste for books. They note a waning tendency in the popularity of the realistic novels of the Zola type and of all those kinds of fiction that rely intrinsically upon similitude to current facts. The public appetite is clamoring for a return to the mysterious, a revival of that style of fiction that admits some play of fancy or even of phantasy.

This is the old human cry for something to lift the human heart out of the ceaseless contemplation of the actual into the pleasant unrealities which are of the texture of our hopes and dreams. The only wonder is that the public has so long tolerated the photographic style of writing. Heaven knows we hear enough of life as it is—and should not be—in the newspapers and by word of mouth, without adding to our weariness by reading of it in the mimic world of books.

The French journals mentioned predict that a certain degree of realism will persist in these new writers; that the coming fashion will be pseudo-scientific tales and detective stories. We believe our French prophets are too timid. Our own prediction is that this generation will witness a great revival of whole-hearted romanticism, such as Victor Hugo led years ago, that will once more people the world of books with heroic and admirable figures, too good to be true, but answering to the cry of humanity's heart.

"METALLURGY OF COMMON METALS"

A very considerable portion of the people of California are directly or indirectly interested in mining, and whoever is interested in mining is naturally interested in metallurgy. Even those who have no direct investment interest in mining have a certain modicum of interest in the metallurgy of the common metals in order that they may understand so much of the news of the day as has to do with mining and the mining interests which play so large a part in our national welfare.

To all such persons The California Weekly cordially commends, "The Metallurgy of the Common Metals," by Leonard S. Austin, the second edition of which, rewritten and brought up to date in all respects, has lately been brought out by the Mining and Scientific Press.

The book deals with the metallurgy of gold, silver, iron, copper, lead and zinc and in its 500 pages, with the aid of nearly 200 illustrations makes plain even to the non-technical reader the processes by which these metals are taken from the various kinds of ore bodies in which they are found and reduced to such a separate and unalloyed state as makes them available for the service of men.

In no department of human endeavor has genius found a more attractive and trying field of activity than in reducing refractory ores to metals of commercial value, and the processes described and illustrated in this work are immensely interesting just as a matter of general information. To those engaged in mining enterprises the book will prove invaluable. It has already been adopted as a text book in a number of schools of mines and well deserves a place in any library of the mechanic arts or as a reference book in any private library or office.

Californian Poets' Corner

THE FATHER'S HOUSE.

By Robert Whitaker.

The Father's house is everywhere,

The "many mansions" rise
Wherever worlds are swung in air,

Under our own blue skies,

Or in far spaces none hath known

Save God alone.

He buildeth always, room on room,

Nor knoweth new, nor old;

Under His hand, as blossoms bloom,

So do the worlds unfold:

With neither noise nor strain of strength

From length to length.

His substance doth not fail, nor spoil,

No over-brooding curse

Lieth upon His tireless toil

Who builds the Universe;

He knows not heaviness, nor haste,

Nor want, nor waste.

How beautiful He buildeth all

The heavens and earth recite,

Though slow as creeps through crannied wall

The reluctant light

Our hearts let in, as 'twere distress,

Life's loveliness.

He hath no lack for any child,

Nor here, nor anywhere;

Who seems to lack hath been beguiled

Far from the gates of prayer:

Where all may enter without stealth

Into God's wealth

We have but glimpsed a hallway here;

Yon tapestry of Death,

Though wrought with curious forms of fear

Is lifted with a breath,

And lo! His parlors stretch away

For aye, for aye.

OF OLD TALES AND NEW.

It may not be denied that age sweetens literature as it mellows wine. For one thing, the earlier generations of readers stand between us and the books as a series of connoisseurs stand between us and the choice of wines; they have tasted all, and those that were too dry or too sweet, those without enough "body," those that were muddled with lees—all the bad, in short, have been drunk off or thrown in the gutter, leaving us only the choicest vintages. Of these—such is the gracious property of books—we may drink inexhaustibly and at our pleasure.

For another thing, time also softens the memories of men's failings, and as the book and its author are indissoluble, feeling more kindly toward the author (whose asperities of temper, fopperies of vanity, and like thousand irritations to the public have been glozed over by many years' forgetfulness), we feel more kindly toward his book also. Who knows what petty frailties gentle Chaucer may have had that made his contemporaries sniff a little at his books? What acid humor may Shakespeare not have shown toward Greene, that called out his bitter gibes about stolen plots? But, again, who now cares? And, still again, why should we care? By their best men must be judged by posterity; their contemporaries punish them for their worst, and Heaven claims title to all vengeance after death. All we know, and all we care is that, when we would lift up our spirits in assonance with beauty, we have only to take down Chaucer or Shakespeare and invade a world of men who lived and loved and fought and found things good or bad upon a scale majestic as compared with ours, upon whose passions and whose fate we may muse with disinterested enjoyment or quiet pity.

But, as we come down the generation of books and approach our own time, we feel the extraneous element of partisanship. This author's life is still a subject of disputation, that author fought the creed of things in which our hopes are set. We may not longer read his books with an eye single to the emotions he means to evoke; partly we read as critics, weighing each page, and balancing his truth against his error.

Of authors of our own day we are worse beguiled. Some of us think Elbert Hubbard should be exiled as a fraud, and find it hard to enjoy even irrefutable truth in his writings, phrased, it may be, in deathless words. Jack London is a Socialist; can we forget it while we sink consciousness in the enjoyment of "The Sea Wolf?"

But the reader of current literature has one opportunity for pleasure that is denied to those who will have none but tried and proven books. This is the joy of discovery. We know a man who himself has done worthy things in writing and grown old in books, whose first pride is the recollection of his scent for greatness in having declared, upon reading a news-paper column years ago signed "R. L. S.," that this man would make a great figure in the world of bookmen. Honest pride, too, for who would not be proud to have recognized the stamp of genius in Robert Louis Stevenson before Stevenson himself dared sign his full name to his work?

Another enjoyment of contemporaneous reading is open to the judicious. Times change, customs change, to paraphrase Cicero, and nothing quite so sharply reflects these changes as the conglomerate mass of current literature. The slang of today—much of it—will be the classic usage of next century, and in this we may watch the growth of language. The moral tone of the day will make the Puritan or the profligate civilization of tomorrow, and here we may study the tendency of our times. The ideals of today are expressed in the heroes of our current admiration, and these heroes make the history of tomorrow; here we may judge the present and forecast the future.

To round it all: old books are for pleasure and for lofty contemplation; new books are for information, for study, and for the lively enjoyment of the hour.

HOMES FOR HOMELESS CHILDREN

THE GREAT SERVICE OF THE CHILDREN'S AGENCY.

Dozens of motherly women are crowding the assembly room in the building of the Associated Charities of San Francisco, each one leading one or more small children or holding a baby in her arms, comparing her charge with her neighbor's and exhibiting a fond pride in the hearty appearance of her own. A nurse and a doctor are moving from group to group, inspecting the children, asking questions about them, and prescribing their diet for the following weeks. No group of mothers could be more volubly enthusiastic about their offspring or more eagerly solicitous for their well-being.

And here is the charm—and the pathos—of the scene. For these women are not the mothers of the babes and children in whom their whole lives are centered: these children are orphans, and children of loveless households, cast upon charity, and children of illicit loves that contained no thought of home and its responsibilities—children of, misfortune, in short, rescued by organized charity and restored to a chance for love and home training by the nobility of character of women other than their own mothers.

This is the charm of the scene: that there are women who will rear nameless children as their own, and that waifs, who might expect nothing, in the course of nature, but destitution and unlovely lives, are here in the protecting arms of pure women and under the shadow of a motherly, if not maternal, love. The pathos of the scene is this: that over these women, who care for these children as their own and around whose hearts the little fingers weave an unbreakable chain of affection, is the ever-present fear that one day a drunken or dissolute mother will come back, in a moment of passing emotion, and invoke the letter of the law which permits her to take back into her own debauched society the innocent being to whose care she has forfeited all moral claim. The hearts of enough good women have been this way bruised in this work to make a man wonder that they dare to jeopardize them even for so large an opportunity to serve the helpless.

There have long been many societies in San Francisco for the rescue of abandoned and homeless children, and many institutions for their care. But several years ago a feeling got abroad amongst charity workers that the institutional life is an inadequate provision for the homeless child. It is better than the provision to which chance would consign them—infinite better—but not the best. That best is a place in a home where a child is always welcome, where the child's spirit is fed with personal affection and where its character is formed by those constant, individual attentions to personal conduct that can only be given in the home.

This feeling took concrete form in the co-operation of the Boys and Girls' Aid Society and the Associated Charities, when those two organizations, in September, 1903, appropriated sufficient funds to maintain for one year a Children's Agency, which should find homes for homeless children.

The year's work was successful, and it has been continued until today the Children's Agency is one of the principal activities of the Associated Charities—undoubtedly the activity closest to the hearts of the managers of that organization. Miss Katherine C. Felton, the general secretary of the Associated Charities, gives this work her most enthusiastic support, and Miss Theresa Earles McCarthy, who has immediate charge of it, has made it her life's work. Today, the Children's Agency is the home-finding organization for the following societies and institutions: San Francisco Foundling Asylum, Boys' and Girls' Aid Society, Sacramento Children's Home, West Oakland Home, California Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children, the Juvenile Court of San Francisco, the Juvenile Court of Alameda County, Infant Shelter, Florence Crittenton Home, Ladies' Protection and Relief Society, Fred Finch Orphanage, Associated Charities of Oakland, Associated Charities of San Francisco, San Francisco Nursery for Homeless Children, Ladies' Relief of Oakland, and the Armitage Orphanage.

The work has two district branches: that which attends to the "placing out" of children, and that which attends to the "boarding out" of children. These terms are explained directly hereafter.

"Placing Out" Children.

Children who are "placed out" are of two classes: very young children who are placed in homes where the people want a child to adopt; and older children who are placed in families that are willing and able to give them a public school education and the proper moral surroundings, and who expect to receive, in return, the amount of household services that would be expected in any family of an own child of the same age and sex.

Children placed out for adoption are necessarily infants or less than six years old, because people who want to adopt children and make them their heirs naturally want a child who will have no recollection of a former home or of other parents to come between them and the child's complete affection. These infants are also, necessarily, either whole orphans, or abandoned children to whom the parent or parents have given legal sanction for adoption, or those foundlings who were born of illegitimate unions. These last-named, by the way, generally prove to be the best children for adoption, for they are usually the offspring of better mating than those children who were not wanted by lawful parents and who were hence abandoned.

In the six and a half years of the Children's Agency's work, about 800 "placements" have been made, though that figure does not mean 800 children, for sometimes, for one reason or another, a child has been re-placed. At the present time the Agency is responsible for 185 children that are placed out. One hundred and fourteen of these are now in the homes of families who want to adopt them but who will not be allowed to acquire legal control of the children until they have had them on probation for a year, to the satisfaction of the Agency. The remainder of these children have been placed in "free homes"—that is, in homes where they are treated as members of the family but in which they may not acquire legal status.

Mrs. L. C. Fay is in charge of the placing out department of the Agency. She investigates every "free home" that is offered and every applicant for a child for adoption, visits the family itself and makes inquiries of its neighbors, and satisfies herself—or otherwise—of the moral fitness, the financial responsibility, and the temperamental qualifications of the applicants. Her report must be an approving one before any charge of the Agency is allowed to be taken away. Mrs. Fay also makes periodical visits of inspection to the homes of adoption until the legal status of the child is vested in the family, to see that it is properly treated, properly nourished, and altogether suited. Similar visits are made to the free homes until the children are old enough to care for themselves.

A notable addition to the efficiency of the placing-out department was recently made by the co-operation of the orders of the Native Daughters and the Native Sons of the Golden West, but as this was described at length in a previous article on this page, it need not be dwelt on now.

The "Boarding Out" Work.

Sometime after the fire—in July, 1907, to be exact—one deficiency in the Agency work was supplied by the institution of a department to attend to the "boarding out" of children. The wholly abandoned infants were cared for by the finding of parents to adopt them; the older, but only partially abandoned (in a legal sense, only) children were taken care of by the free homes. But those infants who were only partially abandoned in the legal sense were not provided for in an ideal way. These are the children whose indifferent or debauched or financially incompetent parents put them upon the charity of the public and the disinterested affection of strangers, but whom the law permits to come back and drag down again to their own lower level their more fortunate children.

These children, whose legal status is a bar to adoption, had been kept in foundling asylums, cared for to the best of the ability of such institutions. But this best was poor enough. Infants nursed and fed in the mass are poorly nursed and fed. Babies sleeping twenty in a room are a constant menace to the health of one another. The mortality rate in infant asylums was frightful.

The boarding out plan has changed all this. The Agency sought for homes in which a babe is welcome for its own sake: sometimes such a home is childless, and the woman longs for the touch of baby fingers and the sound of a baby's prattle; sometimes it is a home where the children are all grown and the mother instinct persists in its desire for a baby in the house. Usually it is the home of a family in moderate circumstances. The Agency never utilizes a home where the money it pays for the care of the child is an absolute necessity of the family income: that makes the charge a temptation to make more money by skimping its care.

But, whenever a fully satisfactory home is found, a baby is placed there, and the family is paid the $11 which the Agency is allowed by the county for the care of a committed child. To this the Associated Charities adds another dollar and a half and, besides, provides the child's clothing and medical attendance. Once a month the foster mothers are required to bring their charges to the office of the Associated Charities, where the doctor and nurse examine them as described in the first paragraph. The Collegiate Alumni pays the difference in cost between ordinary milk and certified milk for these babies, so that they all have the best possible food. The results of this better feeding and the better care under this individual method of home rearing are strikingly illustrated in the quick improvement made by the babies. They grow strong and fat and lusty, and lose that appearance of listless indifference that is characteristic of the institutional child. And, more striking proof of the method, the mortality rate has dropped to practically zero, for of the more than 60 infants boarded out in the last six months only one has died.

It is well, at this point, to make note of the fact that the Children's Agency has no quarrel with institutions for the care of children. They do a great and humane and necessary work. Many children, for a variety of reasons, can not be handled at all except in institutions. The aim of the Agency is to work in co-operation with the institutions, supplementing their work wherever possible with the better remedy of homes for children.

Besides the inspection of the children made at the office, Mrs. Laura Reyfisch, in charge of the boarding out department, whose principal work is the investigation of the homes of applicants for children; makes house to house inspections, assisted by Miss Ida McCune, the trained nurse, and by an assistant who gives half her time to the work. They pay especial attention to the treatment of the child by its foster parents.

But in most instances this precaution, except as a necessary safeguard against sporadic cases of neglect, is really superfluous. It is astounding to learn of the quickness with which these helpless babes weave a protecting web of love about themselves and fix themselves so firmly in the affections of their foster parents that they cannot bear to give them up. Pathetic stories are told of the occasional instances in which the real parent has returned to claim a child boarded out in this way, to whom the baby was far less an object of devotion than to the woman who had to give her up.

One story in particular, though it concerns a case of legal adoption instead of a boarding-out case, is especially appealing. This is the story of the first child placed for adoption through the co-operation of the Native Daughters. A miner and his wife, in one of the mountain counties, grew lonely as their

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

Percy Pawkins-Jones.

Dear little Percy Pawkins-Jones was trained, when he was small, By a mama who was anxious that he shouldn't sin at all. He didn't play with other boys, for they are rude, you know, And often lead a guileless kid in paths he shouldn't go. He didn't dream of carnal ways or gross and shameful facts; His mama fed his childish mind on Liftem-higher Tracts. Oh, he was isolated from the merest hint of vice, And only played with little girls, for they are always nice.

Ah, there is not a question that, kept free of every taint, Dear little Percy Pawkins-Jones was sure to be a saint.

Now time was swift with Percy dear, as is time's wont to be, The while he wore his hair in curls that mama loved to see, And all the mamas said, "My, my! He's such a perfect lad." While all the boys yelled, "Sissy Jones!" which made poor Percy mad. He never fought, for if he did 't would spoil his clothing spick. And, oh, he was the sweetest thing that ever made men sick, And thus he grew, and still he grew, a perfect mama-boy, Who never knew a thoughtlet tinged with evil's sad alloy.

To see that he was wisely reared I'm sure you cannot fail. But Percy now is fully grown—and also he's in jail.

Recipe for Lamb Curry and Rice.

(Taken from the Organization Cook-Book.)

Select the same old Lamb from the Popular Sheepfold, as it is used to being sacrificed and does not mind it. (In doing so, look out for the Reform Ram. It butts.)

Roast over a hot fire. (It must be very hot, or the Lamb will not notice it, as it is so used to being roasted.)

Add a slight sprinkling of Anderson Salt and a mere suggestion of McNab Pepper. (These will serve to disguise and slightly modify the overwhelming flavor of Curry when it is added.)

Now do the Popular Lamb to a beautiful brown. The browner the Lamb is done, the better it likes it. (For proof of this, see California Political Cook-book.)

Now add Curry ad libitum. (In doing this, take care that the Organization Cook knows nothing about it, as he is deaf, dumb and blind, and it would hurt his feelings if he suspected what you were doing.)

Never mind about the rice.

When the dish is ready for the table, swallow it in accordance with the plan advocated by the Santa Cruz Convention of Political Cooks. Never mind if it makes you sick, remembering that you have been sick before and have lived through it.

A Premature Flood of Tears.

"Senator Sanford is getting nervous as the time for election approaches. If he announces for governor he knows that he has not the ghost of a chance for election, and if he comes out for the senate again he knows that former Assemblyman Held will wipe him off the earth. Really his is a sad ending for a political career."—Ukiah Republican-Press.

That's right; shed your tears of brotherly sympathy in advance, thus insuring moisture, for I have heard of cases—and this is not unlikely to be one of them—in which a "sad ending" concluded not to end.

The Opinions of Rufus.

A thing of beauty may be a joy forever, but I know a feller that married one of them, an' he says it ain't so.

Man puts in his hull life buildin' a reputashun, an' lots of times it's mighty discouragin' to look at the result.

Some folks' reelection reminds me of some women's complexions—don't wear well in bad weather.

It's easy to aim too high in this world, but I've noticed that I never seen a feller shoot high by aimin' low.

Among the fascinatin' joys of life that I s'pose I won't ever realize is that of list'nin' to a heart to heart talk 'tween Binger Hermann an' Patrick Calhoun.

I s'pose the greatest wonder some women ever know is why in thunder they married him—an' like es not he's doin' some wonderin', too.

The main objection to the old plan of scarin' reelection into folks was they were likely to get over their scare an' their reelection 'bout the same time.

Let your child see that you suspect him, an' I'll bet you fifteen cents that he'll give you a reason to do it.

I look on conscience es more or less of a fraud. So fer es I've saw, it generly yells the loudest to them that need it the least.

I tell you, son, I'm glad that I can cut out all the parts of all man's creeds that stick out over the edges of the very simple creed the Nazarene give to the world.

The sayin', "Make virtue of necessity," reads better the other end to, "Make necessity of virtue."

Experience is a dear teacher, and, even at the price she asks, she can't learn some people anything.

The Consecrated Millions.

The consecrated millions of a Rockefeller kind,

The consecrated millions, and the shackles that they bind

On the poor man at his labor, on the childish slave of greed,

On the women who are broken as a tempest-shattered reed,

They are blinded to the sorrow of the weary pauper brood,

They are deafened to the voices that are clamoring for food,

Till I think the devil chuckles, being neither deaf nor blind,

O'er the consecrated millions of a Rockefeller kind.

The consecrated millions! See their holders in the church—

Rockefeller, or a Morgan, whom the eye of God shall search—

Note the pious genuflections—Still the sobbing voices call

From His little ones who hunger, and they heed them not at all.

Still the East Side neighbors rudely with the Wall Street Mammon knows,

But he looks upon it coldly, lest its mire be on his clothes.

Ring, ye bells upon the temples, while old Satan's joy-inclined

O'er the consecrated millions of a Rockefeller kind.

Oh, the consecrated millions! If the Christ should come again

With a lash for money-changers who have made his house a den;

If that heart, attuned to pity, now were warmed within his clay

By the sob of stricken thousands, while the money-changers pray,

How these "consecrated millions" might be consecrated then

To the service of the needy and the betterment of men,

And no more would Satan chuckle, being neither deaf nor blind,

O'er such consecrated millions as a Rockefeller kind.

Day From Diary of a Busy Mayor.

6:13 a. m.—Waked by a horrible dream that Paris had "got religion" and lost its high standing.

6:48 a. m.—Read in the Chronicle that Isidor Jacobs has been talking about me. Unscrupulous cuss, that Jacobs! He would talk about the Almighty, and yet he doesn't belong to our union.

7:01 a. m.—Telephoned the Chronicle to find out if its report is true or was paid for.

7:02 a. m.—Chronicle says the report is true. Note this as the only circumstance at all in Jacobs' favor.

7:10 to 8:47 a. m.—Considered various unassailable reasons why the Geary street railroad, instead of beginning with sale of bonds, should commence at the other end.

8:50 a. m.—Directed my secretary to tell Jacobs that he is a supposititious liar and a non-union man and that I shall challenge him as soon as I have fairly introduced the Parisian duelling code.

9:05 to 10:11 a. m.—Practiced on my voice. Find it improved by wear and tear.

10:28 a. m.—Received an explanation from Jacobs. He is a noble man, and I instructed my secretary to tell him that I love him.

11:23 a. m.—Received delegation of voters who wanted to know what is being done about the Geary street railroad. Explained that operations on the rear end of the job soon would begin. Introduced a few graceful allusions to the treachery and falsifying habit of Isidor Jacobs.

12:46 to 1:53 p. m.—Practiced on my voice.

2:18 p. m.—Telephone message from my unnamed financial backers in late campaign saying that Heney has been talking about me. Heney is a liar! He is a——liar!

2:27 to 3:19 p. m.—Practiced my voice saying what I think about Heney. Great practice!

3:46 to 4:13 p. m.—Read religious tract entitled, "Pat Calhoun and McCarthy, or, Little Hands Were Never Made to Scratch Each Other's Eyes." Great stuff!

4:15 to 4:37 p. m.—Voice culture on Heney.

5:09 p. m.—Heney is dead. I hated to do it, but felt that I must.

5:34 p. m.—Why doesn't somebody bury him?

5:53 p. m.—Feel that it is a reflection on my administration to have a corpse lying around in this way.

6:10 p. m.—Heney showed symptoms of reviving, and I had to do it again.

6:34 p. m.—A rumor that I may have to do it frequently is aloof.

7:04 to 7:31 p. m.—As mayor of city, studied cryptograms. Clearly justify non-prosecution of grafters.

7:35 to 8:09 p. m.—Practiced on my voice. (Moral for the young: Make the best of your best qualifications.)

8:36 p. m.—Going to a banquet. Good thing, for I find that in the stress of my hurried hours I have forgotten to eat anything.

It May Pay to Take Time.

I know a man, Henry, who says he "can't afford to monkey with reform"; says he "hasn't time to spare for that sort of thing."

There was a time, in England, when many people desired reforms, but Charles the First and his advisers "didn't have time for that sort of thing."

Ever read the history of Charles the First, Henry? Yes?

He would have done well to have taken time, would he not?

There was a time, in France, when the people demanded reforms, but Louis XVI and his nobles "didn't have time for that sort of thing."

Have you read the history of Louis XVI, Henry? Something happened to him, you remember.

Don't you think that he and his nobles would have shown good judgment if they had taken time?

PAYING McCARTHY'S POLITICAL DEBTS?

A CURIOUS TRAIN OF FAMILY AND BUSINESS RELATIONSHIPS.

The San Francisco daily papers, on the morning of February 27th, told of a complaint made against the action of Mayor McCarthy in turning over the collection of rents due the city to a private real estate firm. The Southern Pacific company, one of the city's tenants, refused to pay this firm because it was afraid the payment of city money to a private concern would not be recognized as a legal settlement by the courts.

The complaint above mentioned was referred to City Attorney Long, who returned an opinion that the collection of public moneys was a function vested solely in public officials and could not be delegated to private individuals. To emphasize his certainty as to the illegality of this action, he compared it to the hateful custom of "farming out" the collection of taxes, a custom still practiced in Turkey and Russia.

Mayor McCarthy retorted that he was satisfied with the legality of his actions, and explained that his private secretary, E. C. Leffingwell, was too busy and too important a personage to be running around collecting bills. (Harry McKannay, ex-Mayor Taylor's secretary—who did "run around" on this errand for two years—may take envious notice.) Undoubtedly, also, Mayor McCarthy had the legal advice of his counsel, Cleveland Dam, ex-tailor, who recently attempted to teach some phases of "elemental" law, as he phrased it, to the Hon. Curtis Lindley, the scholarly president of the California State Bar Association.

At any rate, the act of the mayor stands, and Trevor & Sloan are collecting the rents and deducting their commission for doing it.

These are the facts known to the public. What follow are the facts that are not known to the public.

Until the first of February, the firm of Trevor & Sloan was composed of the following named, whose then respective interests in the firm are indicated by the percentages appended to their names:

Henry Trevor	33 per cent.
James R. Sloan	33 " "
Fred Boeckmann	33 " "
L. F. Byington	1 " "

That was a month ago. The firm of Trevor & Sloan was then reorganized (for reasons explained at length below), and the relative interests were—and are—as follows:

Fred Boeckmann	66 per cent.
Henry Trevor	33 " "
L. F. Byington	1 " "

The firm name now is Trevor & Co., in spite of the fact that Boeckmann owns two-thirds of its stock. Who is Fred Boeckmann?

Fred Boeckmann is the president of the Sutter Street Railroad, the most important subsidiary company of the United Railroads.

Fred Boeckmann is the brother-in-law of Tiley L. Ford, chief counsel of the United Railroads.

But who is L. F. Byington?

L. F. Byington is also the brother-in-law of Tiley L. Ford. To be exact, Fred Boeckmann and Tiley L. Ford married L. F. Byington's sisters.

L. F. Byington is one of the lawyers who defended Tiley L. Ford on the charge of bribing the Ruef supervisors.

L. F. Byington is one of the lawyers who defended Patrick Calhoun on the charge of bribing the Ruef supervisors.

But who is Henry Trevor?

Henry Trevor is the name on the door of the new city rent collecting agency—Trevor & Co.

Henry Trevor is also the man who, immediately after Mayor McCarthy's election, besieged Mayor McCarthy's eminent personal counsel, Cleveland Dam, to secure the work of collecting the rents due the city. Whether Henry Trevor is the man who originated the idea of getting this work is a question.

Now as to the old firm and the new as a whole. It was well-known in real estate circles as long ago as last summer that James R. Sloan had lost interest in the firm and was anxious to retire. Some people attributed this loss of interest to differences of opinion as to methods of doing business. Bearing in mind the fact that Boeckmann and Byington—brothers-in-law—between them controlled 1 per cent. over a third of the stock, it is conceivable that Sloan was occasionally outvoted on matters of policy. Bearing in mind the fact that Trevor is a member of the firm since Sloan's withdrawal, it is conceivable that Trevor did not throw his vote with Sloan.

Other people close to the firm attributed its reorganization to the settled differences of political faith amongst its members. In the mayoralty campaign last fall the poll of the firm was as follows: For McCarthy, Boeckmann, Byington, Trevor; for Crocker, Sloan. Mr. Sloan was evidently playing the lonesome part. Mr. Sloan's office is now in the Merchants' Exchange building, while Trevor & Co. continue to abide at No. 32 Montgomery street, where rents due the city will hereafter be collected.

The public continues to believe that Patrick Calhoun paid a large share of Mayor McCarthy's campaign expenses.

Tiley L. Ford continues to be general counsel to the United Railroads and brother-in-law to Fred Boeckmann.

Fred Boeckmann continues to be the president of the Sutter Street Railroad company, brother-in-law to L. F. Byington, and chief stockholder of Trevor & Sloan, now Trevor & Co.

Mayor McCarthy continues to be mayor, and to insist that eminent personal counsel, Cleveland Dam, is more eminent than City Attorney Long, and to insist that Trevor & Co. may collect rents due the city and deduct their usual commission.

As we remarked above, this leaves the whole matter still a question. Is Mayor McCarthy paying his political debt to the United Railroads by way of the real estate firm of Trevor & Sloan? The facts recited seem to point to that conclusion. They also strengthen the already general belief that Mayor McCarthy owed his election directly to the interested zeal of Patrick Calhoun. And this by a chain of remarkably related facts.

H. J. Grayson, a self-taught mechanic, is a member of the staff of the University of London. He is the only man of our day who can do certain things, of the greatest use in exact scientific investigation, that call for special manipulative skill. He does them with a machine of his own design and construction. With this he can rule five parallel lines on metal and glass at even intervals, yet so close together that as many as 120,000 go to the inch. This is an immense advance on anything of the kind before achieved. There was a time, not so very long ago, when 4,000 lines to the inch was considered wonderful, and until recently about 15,000 was the highest number obtained.

Mrs. Alexander Graham Bell, wife of the inventor, lost her hearing and what little baby speech she possessed at so early an age that she has no recollection of ever having spoken or heard, and thus occupies the position of one congenitally deaf. At that time the art of reading the lips was but little known or practised, but fortunately her mother instinctively adopted the best possible method of teaching her mute child. She was brought up with her two younger hearing sisters; they all received the same viva voce instruction; signs were never used by herself or others nor did she ever have any inclination to employ them in communicating with those around her. To a passionate love of reading, which her mother saw was fully gratified, she ascribes most of the facility she afterward gained in speech reading. This she considers an intellectual process and the function performed by the eye or by the finger (in case of deafness and blindness combined, as with Helen Keller) in tracing the movements of the lips, though necessary, as entirely subsidiary.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Alden Anderson The Watchman has been loth to believe that Bank Commissioner Alden Anderson could be marked for sacrifice as the putative "organization" candidate for the Republican nomination for governor of California. We believed him too astute a politician to get caught in that trap, to place himself betwixt the upper and nether millstones, so to speak; but he is in it and in it all over. The fate of William Crocker in San Francisco meant less to Alden Anderson than those who know him well had a right to expect that it would. He is no novice in politics and, above all else, he is prudent. He speaks softly and steps lightly and his trail has never been easy to follow, and certainly never has been followed in the direction of the firing line. He has always sought political shelter and found it. Personally clean and reputable, he has kept his political reputation as clean and as reputable. James N. Gillett made a reputation as a "long hair" and, with that as political capital, became governor by the grace of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. Mr. Anderson has no such capitalization to go into the fight on. His attitude has been a statu quo, neither for nor against. His letter to the public is more interesting for what it does not contain than for what it does, and yet it is fairly typical of the man. We give it in full in the next paragraph that Mr. Anderson may speak for himself to the readers of The California Weekly.

Anderson's Letter To the Republicans

To the Republicans of the state of California—Gentlemen: I have received petitions, communications and personal requests urging me to become a candidate for the Republican nomination for Governor of California, and after giving the matter serious consideration I have determined to submit my name for such candidacy.

I am a loyal Californian and I know this state. I have and shall always stand for progress, improvement and development along proper lines. Compared with other states California is a new state. It must be apparent to everybody that we are entering upon an era of great development. The many great public undertakings along the lines of irrigation, reclamation, harbor improvement, navigation and good roads call for a business administration of the state government. An active life of twenty-five years, the labors of which have taken me to all parts of the state, and some experience in public affairs have given me opportunities for observation and an education that should be helpful in the executive office at this time. If nominated and elected I shall endeavor to the best of my powers to prove that I have not been neglectful of the opportunities I have had.

In submitting myself as a candidate I believe that I can do so as a representative Republican. I have heretofore been elected to office as a nominee of that party, and in addition thereto was twice unanimously elected as President of the State League of Republican Clubs at the time when they had the largest membership in their history, and as nothing has occurred to alter my fidelity to the principles and policies of the party, I believe, as I have said before, that I have the right to consider myself a fairly representative member of that party.

The selection of party candidates for Governor will be determined by the people at the direct primary election in August. I have always had faith in the judgment of a majority of the people if permitted to act directly on any matter of general public interest, and am entirely willing to leave my candidacy to such arbitrament. It is contrary to the spirit and intention of the primary law that a candidate spend money except for minor purposes, and I will be guided, and I ask my friends likewise to be guided, by such spirit in the conduct of the campaign.

I stand as an advocate of law and order, and of economy and honesty in the administration of public affairs, and for a "square deal to all." I shall go into and through the campaign without promise or pledge except these.

Hoping my candidacy will meet with general approval in the rank and file of the party, and asking that this letter be regarded as a reply to the numerous communications I have received on the subject, I am, very truly,

ALDEN ANDERSON,
San Francisco, Cal., Feb. 26, 1910.

The Anderson Ideal Is Clearly Outlined

Knowing Mr. Anderson well The Watchman wishes to say for him that his every utterance in the foregoing letter is to be accepted in good faith. He did not "dash it off." He wrote it with care and whatever was put into it was put in with deliberation, whatever was left out of it was left out advisedly, for, above all things else, Alden Anderson is prudent. His right hand knows what his left hand is up to all the time.

Mr. Anderson's voice is for a "booster" campaign, for "progress," "improvement" and "development," all three of them, including a "business man's" administration with the ($) as the bright particular star to light his path by day and by night. No merely moral issues cloud his horizon.

He will stand for economy and honesty in administering the state's business and for the square deal, provided the "square deal" does not imply changing conditions as they are, for Anderson is no reformer. With him whatever is best just as it is. "Progress" to his mind has an entirely material signification.

"He has given no form of pledge." That is a perfectly true statement. A pledge in the case of Alden Anderson would be superfluous. His whole political life has been a pledge. His type of mind is a pledge that he will, as governor, let things run as they have been running, in the direction of least resistance, except that he will be honest—money honest—in the routine administration of the state's business.

Things Anderson Has Not Heard Of

Alden Anderson has not heard of any uprising among the people of California against corporation domination or, if he has heard of it, it has appealed to him as being entirely unimportant, a mere troubling of the waters, a squall that will soon blow over. His letter is silent as to any such issue.

Confronted with the issue as to whether or not he thinks that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company should govern California he would say "No," with some emphasis, but the history of his political life will nowhere be found to have said "no" in any emphatic, out and out act that could put him in opposition to that bureau.

Mr. Anderson has seen justice crushed in San Francisco and the laws of his state ridden over and ridden down, but his letter contains no word of opinion that our criminal procedure needs to be reformed, that our bench needs to be non-partisanly nominated and elected.

He has seen the railroads of the state manage the legislatures of California in their interest, but it has not occurred to him to protest that it has not been a good thing, and any idea of putting the government back where it belongs, in the hands of the people, is far from him. He sees need for irrigation, reclamation and good roads, and there are such needs; but for a political regeneration of California, for any reform carrying a moral value,—there is not one word in his letter, or in his career, to signify that such consideration ever entered his mind, as they probably have not in more than the most casual and inconsequential way. Mr. Anderson's letter is typical of the man; what it does not contain he does not.

The Organization Against Judge Sloss

The new deputy of Supreme Court Clerk Caughey is doing the work of the organization for which he was put into office. As the political correspondent of the Sacramento Union he (D. E. Williamson) writes over his own name, and he says such things as this: "The judicial candidacies have cleared to a large extent. The indorsement of Sloss by the Lincoln-Roosevelt league, of course, ends his chances, as this is a case when the 125,000 votes will be for two. The south will be behind James for one thing, and will support Melvin for another. There have been persistent rumors that Sloss would not be a candidate, after all, but it has been impossible to trace these to their source or to get a definite statement from the judge. Those who have tried are said to have met with rebuffs."

There is more of the same in the letter, but this will answer as a sample. It is sufficient to show where the organization stands on the re-election of Judge Sloss, and likewise on that of Judge Melvin. A tavern signboard could not read plainer than this bulletin posted to show the route which the machine is traveling and in which it expects all good

"regular" Republicans to follow it. It is understood that George Hatton censors the political "dope" sent out to interior journals by the Caughey-office news bureau and, if so, the information is to be accepted as strictly inside.

Standpat Gage or Wobbly Flint?

The two most important items of news from the organization camp in Los Angeles and Southern California are that Stanton is very much in earnest in his campaign for Governor and that the effort to induce ex-Governor Gage to come out as a candidate for United States Senator is still on. So far as known Mr. Gage has not indicated whether he will or will not consent, and as he has recently met with a bereavement in the death of a son who had long been an invalid, he may withhold his answer for some time to come. Possibly, too, he is disposed to wait long enough to learn whether Senator Frank Flint decides to reconsider his declination to run. The California Weekly said recently that as Governor Gage represents so clearly the pro-railroad side of the pending issue in California there would be an especial fitness in the selection if the "organization" should make him its candidate, and this assertion we repeat. With Gage up as the machine representative, and some able and independent Southern California Republican to oppose him, we would have as direct a test as it would be possible to make of the respective merits of railroad Republicanism and independent Republicanism. Of course a great deal of dust would be thrown even then, and all manner of false issues would be introduced, but there would be less danger of misleading the voters than under most conditions. Governor Gage is able and he is personally a man of integrity; but he is an out-and-out railroad organization Republican, a fact of which he is proud. So, we say again, let the organization run him, and then let us see how square we can make the issue.

A Lightning Change Act In Herrinization Policy

A good commander is he who can turn the rear of his army into a front without delay when such a movement is necessary, and this maneuver is sometimes as convenient in politics as in war. An illustration is at hand in the reported determination of the "organization" not to call the Republican State Central Committee together to nominate or endorse a ticket, although that was the very thing which all of the "regular" newspapers and politicians have been counting on to give the stamp of authority to the machine candidates. The announcement at this writing is unofficial, and there may be another change of program; therefore we can't be certain about it, but all the indications are that the grand scheme to round up the candidates and put a Herrin brand upon them has been abandoned. Something is said to the effect that when noses were counted in the committee it was found that there were too many Lincoln-Roosevelt men among them to make the plan a promising one, and this has an element of truth in it, because a State Central Committee endorsement given by a majority vote in the teeth of a loudly protesting minority would be of doubtful value to a candidate; but the greatest objection to the proceeding was that the leaders finally came to see that such an endorsement would fasten on the candidate receiving it the charge which he would be most anxious to deny, viz: that he was the nominee of the political bureau of the S. P. Consequently there are to be no officially endorsed candidates—if the present plan is adhered to—despite the reiterated advice of the Chronicle and other organs to wait and see what "the Republicans" would do when they met. And now they are not going to meet at all, and the present scheme is to denounce the Lincoln-Roosevelt people for meeting and endorsing and thereby "violating the spirit of the primary law." This is the lightning change act of politics, and although it shows the resourcefulness of Mr. Herrin, it leaves the Chronicle and the other organs looking rather silly.

State Senator Birdsall The Lincoln-Roosevelt For Secretary of State

League is on the lookout for a big-enough man to make an acceptable candidate for Secretary of State, and the suggestion that Senator Birdsall of Placer county be that man meets with a good deal of favor, without knowing how the idea strikes him. He is a hold-over senator from the third district and there is a strong disinclination to lose him from a place where he has proven so true-blue on every test that has been applied to him, but a district that sent so good a man to the senate can send another as good, and certainly the counties of Plumas, Sierra, Nevada or Placer ought to be able to fill his place acceptably. For instance there is former Assemblyman J. W. Finney, of Downieville, who would make a very acceptable state senator, as he did assemblyman. Of the candidates so far suggested for Secretary of State not one is a big enough man to fill the place, and some of them are positively unfit for any form of public employment outside of an institution for the reformation of persons who need reformation. Birdsall is big enough and, when it comes to a question of fidelity to a public trust, he has proven a rock. If he were to resign from the senate to make the race the Governor would have to issue a writ ordering an election to fill the vacancy and, if a good man were elected in his stead, no serious harm would be done by his resigning. Of course this office is, or may well be, seeking this man. Birdsall himself is not after it.

Was It Madam Gillett Who Decided After All?

Around the corridors of the State Capitol there are mutterings of discontent because Governor Gillett "threw the organization down," at the last moment. The organization crowd likes Anderson well enough, and feels certain enough that Gillett will throw what strength he can to Anderson, but he can not throw as much strength to any other candidate as he could have utilized in advancing his own candidacy, and the only thing that the organization fellows care a fig for is winning out. The gossips say that, on the Thursday previous to announcing his determination not to make the race for re-election, at a conference held in San Francisco, Governor Gillett virtually promised the "bunch" to stand for reelection, but, on Saturday of that very same week, issued his announcement of retirement. The explanation is that when he got home and told the wife of his bosom what he had done she made him undo the mischief forthwith. No more Sacramento for her! While, as stated above, the "organization" crowd likes Anderson well enough they are a bit fearful that, not being a very positive character, he might, under great pressure, venture to do some really independent and highly creditable thing, a risk that has not been a source of worry to them during the Gillett administration.

Some Political Probabilities

The executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will hold another meeting at its rooms in this city on Saturday of this week. There is no certain fore-knowing what the results of the conference will be, but there are some probabilities that are fairly definite.

One of these is that Lee C. Gates will be offered to Republican voters as a suitable running mate for Hiram Johnson, as lieutenant governor. The amending of the state constitution made the lieutenant governor of the state much more than a figure head. He has now become a very important factor in state affairs. Mr. Gates is well equipped for fulfilling the duties of the office, and he is especially well equipped for making a telling campaign with Mr. Hiram Johnson, the League candidate for governor. In fact there are not two better speakers, clearer thinkers or more sincere men in California, and the only boss that either of them will acknowledge allegiance to is that "still small voice," that speaks to them out of the innermost recesses of their souls and commands them to do what is right and forbids their doing what is wrong. Together they will prove invincible.

Wallace or Works The Lincoln-Roosevelt For Flint's Place

league group of public men in Southern California constitute a particularly happy family. There is not a self-seeker among them and they are all heartily for the cause of emancipation of California from corporation control. Therefore the executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has carte blanche, or near it, to put almost any of them where it thinks they can do the cause the most good. There was talk of Stoddard Jess for the United States senate, but the latest development seems to have narrowed the choice to either A. J. Wallace or Judge John D. Works. Both are tried and true men and to take either of them as candidate for that high office would be no mistake. Of course, after the committee shall have threshed the whole subject over again, some other candidate may be decided on, but these two, not in any sense rivals for the honor, appear to be the most available. Judge Works is now president of the city council of Los Angeles and A. J. Wallace made a splendid reputation in the same body. Each of these men comes from a walk in life to which many belong who would think it beneath them to be a member of the governing body of a city, but they have taken their turns like good citizens and have not cast aside for "personal reasons" duties which their fellow citizens sought to impose upon them. They were recognized as big men in small places, a much greater honor, by the way, than to be a small man in a big place.

Either Wilbur or Works Judge Works is For Supreme Justice

Judge Works is also talked of as a possible candidate for supreme justice to succeed Judge Melvin, whom the "good of the service," as they say in corporations, requires to be succeeded by somebody. Now this is not saying that Judge Works is a candidate. He simply says to those who are trying to make up Southern California's share of the League state ticket, "Put me where you want me if you want me. I have enlisted for the war," not to quote him literally but only figuratively. Judge Works sat on the supreme bench for upwards of four years in the early nineties and made a good record. Judge Wilbur is now the presiding judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, a very popular judge. Both gentlemen are in the hands of—not their friends exactly, but of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. No mistake will be made in either case, no matter which of these is chosen for the place.

Webb and Kingsbury Are Animated by a Likely to Be Endorsed liberal rather than a narrow and partisan spirit, and wishing for good government as well as for free, it seems likely that the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League may endorse the candidacies of Attorney General U. S. Webb and Surveyor General W. S. Kingsbury on the ground that they have "stood up," and made good in their respective offices and are not likely to prove subservient to corporation control. Nor is this because there is no fit timber in the Lincoln-Roosevelt ranks out of which to make an attorney general or surveyor general. There is a wealth of it, but the League is putting the good of the service before partisanship and it feels that it is important to reward, with a continuance in office, every public official who stands up and stands out for what is right rather than for what is program. These cases will be well considered at the League conference to-morrow and, unless there be newly discovered evidence to warrant a change in plans, it seems likely that these two will be endorsed.

For Railroad Commissioners

There is gossip afloat that the "organization" is going to turn its back on Commissioner Irwin again this year, as it did four years ago, only more positively. It has nothing against Irwin this year, as it had nothing against him four years ago, but he has been serviceable to the railroad interests so long that he has ceased to be serviceable, that is, he has worn himself to a political frazzle. Four years ago Mr. Herrin permitted Irwin, and one Johnson, to fight the issue out, well knowing that he would win whichever won. Johnson hugged close to Sacramento where the railroad influence was very strong, while Irwin legged it for the back country, saw all the boys and, when the Santa Cruz convention convened, there wasn't much Johnson in that race. Irwin may try the same plan this time and may poll a good many votes at the primary. He is a good fellow, but, having been cradled, suckled and brought up in a railroad world he cannot, for the life of him, see why railroads should not have everything they want merely because they want it, and, no matter what Mr. Herrin does to him, Irwin will love him still.

WRIGHT LAW AND WEBB BILL COMPARED

THE STONE THE BUILDERS REJECTED SHOULD BECOME THE HEAD OF THE CORNER.

By ARTHUR J. PILLSBURY.

One of the inspiring causes of the new constitution was a desire on the part of the People of California to regulate the railroads. The railroads did not desire to be regulated and fought the new constitution tooth and claw. Nevertheless the new constitution was adopted and the contest was transferred from the state at large to the legislature. Here the railroads fared better. They fared so well, in fact, that they concluded to regulate the State of California and they have been doing it from that day to this.

The new constitution provided a state railroad commission, elected by the people, to which commission the people delegated much power for regulating the railroads, fixing rates, hearing complaints and adjusting differences between the railroads and shippers and passengers over such railroads or other means of public conveyance.

Through political manipulation the railroads speedily reduced this railroad commission to possession and for nearly thirty years it did not render the state a service the equivalent of the postage account or janitor's salary in maintaining the office of the commission. From 1880 to 1909 no remedial legislation in relation to the railroad was placed upon the statute books of California and no legislation of any kind was placed there of which the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company did not approve. It so held possession of access to and exit from the legislative halls of this state that no legislation restrictive of its authority could get in or out of a California legislature. To make assurance doubly sure this bureau so far possessed itself of our courts as to make them, if not subservient to, at least not as independent of, railroad political power as the requirements of justice demand.

And so the people of California slept on, bearing the burdens which the railroad autocrats felt minded to put upon them, until Theodore Roosevelt and his policies began to take hold upon the minds and hearts of the American people and the practice of rebating began to be interfered with by the Department of Justice of the United States government. Some reaction from this influence began to be felt throughout California and a dangerous political insurrection began to manifest itself against railroad domination in public affairs.

Railroad's Show of Regulating.

The railroad now began to feel that some show of regulating must be made, in order to appease the people. The railroad thought it better to do this regulating through its own friends rather than through the representatives of the people. Therefore the State Railroad Commission, at all times safe and sane and wedded to the railroad interest, began to do some investigating in 1908. Finding the constitutional provision relating to the commission too deep for them they sought the advice of the Attorney General of the State, U. S. Webb, who, like nearly all other state officers, was beholden to the Railroad Political Bureau for whatever political preferment he had enjoyed. It never occurred to the railroad mind that it could be indiscreet to consult General Webb. The consultation was had in fullest confidence that the Attorney General would advise the commission that it had no lawful power to do any good thing on behalf of the public. Much to the surprise and chagrin of the Railroad Commission, and the railroad's Political Bureau, the Attorney General advised that rebating was unlawful and that the commission was in law and honor bound to make investigation and apply remedies in the public interest.

While making this investigation into the laws as they stood Attorney General Webb became interested in the subject in hand and carried his investigations further. It had generally been assumed that no legislation of value looking toward regulation of the state's common carriers could be had without first amending the constitution of the state. General Webb concluded, after investigation, that this was not so and, after calling to his aid a number of gentlemen whose advice and counsel were deemed of value, he and his assistant, Mr. Benjamin, drafted a railroad regulation bill and placed it in the hands of Senator Stetson and Assemblyman Hewitt, good men, both of them, to be put through the legislature of 1909.

Before doing this the bill was submitted to Governor Gillett and by him approved as a reasonable, regulative measure and he promised his full co-operation and support in securing its enactment into law.

Wright Bill Mysteriously Substituted.

It looked for a time as though the bill might pass both houses and become a law, but suddenly, without a word of warning, Leroy Wright, state senator from San Diego, well known to be friendly to and conformable with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, came forward with a substitute for the Webb bill, now known as the "Stetson" bill for the reason that Senator Stetson had charge of it in the senate.

There was abroad no lisp to the effect that Leroy Wright was engaged in drafting such a measure and it is not regarded as likely that he had anything to do with drafting it. The bill is popularly believed to have been drawn in the Southern Pacific offices in San Francisco and handed to Leroy Wright, ready made, with the request that he father it and secure its adoption in place of the Stetson bill. His bill became a law.

In the coming campaign we shall hear a great deal of the value of the Wright Railroad Regulation law. Already newspapers that should have known better have affirmed it of equal value with the Stetson bill. Mr. Van Smith, in the Call, declared that it differed from the Stetson bill in only one particular. The issue between these two measures is an important one because railroad regulation is important to the people of California. Therefore we submit to the people of California the result of a careful analysis of the two measures. Those who read this article will know without being told which of the measures was truly regulative and which was, and is, very far short of regulating, in the public interest, a great and lawless instrument indispensable to modern society. It is a better law than no law, but not as good a law as California might easily have secured had enough legislators stood up.

There are many particulars in which the Wright law does not conform to the Webb bill, but space will permit reference to only a few of them, comparatively speaking, and those the more important. They are mainly as follows:

Comparison of the Bills.

1. The Wright law does not provide for a valuation of railroad properties as a basis for rate fixing. While it is true that a valuation of the properties can not in all cases be taken as a conclusive guide to rate fixing, yet it must ever be accepted as the basis of computation. A reasonable rate of income upon a reasonable valuation of the investment, after making adequate allowances for maintenance of the property and the final amortization of the investment, is all that any public service corporation has any moral right to lay claim to for serving the public, and no claim should be legalized that is not founded in justice and morality. The absence of a provision requiring a valuation of the railroad properties to be made is a serious defect in the Wright law.

2. The Webb bill gave the railroad commission power to employ trained experts to assist in the performance of its duties where needed. It would be futile to enter upon the valuation of railroad properties, for instance, without the aid of men acquainted with the value of railroad properties, and there are many other particulars in which the service of trained engineers, accountants and traffic managers will prove as important to the proper regulation of rates and the making of rules and regulations as lawyers are needful for conducting cases in court. It is improbable that California will ever have a commission competent within itself to perform all the functions required at the hands of an efficient railroad commission. In this particular the Wright law is almost fatally defective.

3. The main difference between the two measures is that the Webb bill provided for an absolute fixing of rates while the Wright law provides only for fixing maximum rates above which the railroads may not go in charging. There was a good deal of confusion of thought over this provision in the Webb bill and advantage was taken of it by the astute Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company to frighten some rather timid legislators, who meant thoroughly well, into abandoning their support of the Webb bill. While no one is warranted in saying in advance just what the supreme court of the state would hold in such a case yet there is no obvious reason why the court should not confirm the power of the commission to fix rates absolutely as well as maximum rates only. The advantages of absolute rates were sufficiently great to warrant the risk at any rate.

Differences in Theory of Rate Fixing.

The theory of the two measures as to rate fixing is not the same. The Wright law contemplates that the railroads shall fix their rates as they please and that they shall not be disturbed in applying them unless the commission, or some injured shipper, makes complaint. The Webb bill provides that the railroads must report all their rates to the commission forthwith and that the commission shall make a careful study of the rate sheets and correct and amend or make new as the well-being of the public and the railroads may require. This affords the railroads all the latitude they need but recognizes the railroad commission as the rightful rate-making power. As rate making involves the power of taxation no one not constituted a part of the power of government can have any logical right to fix rates. This is just as true of rate making on railroads as it is of making a tariff schedule or a schedule of internal imposts. "What the traffic will bear," must at all times enter into rate making, and whenever it does so one industry is taxed more or less for the benefit of another, as under a customs duty. It is only when "what the traffic will bear" is construed to justify "all that the traffic will bear," that shippers have any just grounds for complaint. In this particular, as in others, the Wright law proceeds on a false basis.

Differences in Punishments.

4. In providing punishments for infractions of the law, no matter how flagrant, the Wright law imposes no imprisonments. The Webb bill gives the court power in nearly every instance to choose between fine and imprisonment, or inflict both fine and imprisonment. In the efforts that have been made to bring lawless corporations to observe a wholesome respect for the law fines have been found of little value unless made confiscatory and when so made, as in the famous $29,000,000 case, the courts have not had the nerve to apply the remedy. In the case of hardened offenders, like the Standard Oil Company and many of the railroads, the alternative of confiscation of property or the obeying of the law must be presented to them unless imprisonment can be inflicted. Imprisonment is a real punishment in all cases, while fines easily degenerate, as in some prohibition states and communities, into a recognized system of licensing an evil. In no particular is the Wright law more defective than in this: that, no matter what the offense, it provides for no imprisonments.

5. The Wright law does not provide that the commission shall furnish the transportation companies properly designed blanks for eliciting such information, upon oath, as the commission must be in possession of if it is to discharge the duties of its office efficiently. The Webb bill covers this requirement fully and makes it easy for corporations to make just such reports as the commission requires and upon oath with heavy penalties for either failing to make such reports or for making them falsely. It is an open secret that reports heretofore have been "doctored" as needful to make a favorable showing.

6. The Webb bill empowers the commission to make temporary rates, rules and regulations with the view of preventing railroad wars within the state. To the superficial observer it appears that, where railroads get to fighting, the public seems to reap a material and unwanted advantage, but, as a matter of almost universal experience, it has been found that the advantage gained was short lived, resulted in the bankruptcy of one railroad or the other, with consolidation and a recouping from the public of all advantage gained, with interest. No, the general welfare demands reasonable rates and those made stable, so that in all dealings the element of cost expressed in freights may be as certain as possible. The Wright bill is defective here also.

Classification of Freight.

7. The Wright law does not provide for classification of freight. In no particular has rate making been made more confusing than in that of classification. By this means rate sheets have been made into enigmas that no one not a trained rate expert can pretend to understand. Courts have been fairly stumped by such rate sheets and juries confused beyond hope of redemption. Rates have been changed through changes of classification in open defiance of law when there had been pretense of making no change whatever in rates, but, all the same, the shipper found that he had to pay more for the same service. If any railroad commission is to do anything at all with reference to rates it should be particularly in the function of making simple, fair and intelligible classifications of freight to be shipped. The Wright law does not do it, while the Webb bill provided for it.

8. The Wright law does not make adequate provision for collecting fines imposed or for initiating prosecutions where offenses have been committed. The Wright law vests the entire power of bringing suits in the Attorney General of the state. If the railroad people can succeed in electing a friendly attorney general they will have little to fear from suits brought to punish for infractions of the railroad regulation law. The Webb bill confers equal authority to bring actions upon district attorneys throughout the state, so that if an offense be committed someone is pretty likely to begin proceedings for the enforcement of the law or the punishment of the delinquent corporation.

9. The Wright law forbids the giving of intrastate passes to none but public officers, permitting them to be given to all others upon whom a corporation is minded to bestow its favors. There are few greater evils than this. If all who travel had to pay fares at regular rates it would be possible for the railroads to make material reductions in the fares charged and it nearly always happens that those who ride free are the very ones who are best able to pay. In contrast to the Wright law, in this respect, the Webb bill specifically mentions twenty-two classes of persons to whom passes may properly be given, such as to officers and employees of the companies themselves, or the officers or employees of other companies, to indigent persons and persons engaged in professional charity work, etc. All others must pay their fares at regular rates, remain at home or walk. This is exactly as it should be. Free riding is akin to smuggling and is an injustice to every person who pays his fare.

10. The Wright law contains no provision against the giving of testimony working immunity to the road giving it against being prosecuted for offences committed. The Webb bill would have closed that avenue of escape.

11. Section 32 of the Webb bill gave the railroad commission power to make rules and regulations governing demurrage, loading and unloading instead of leaving the same to inflexible statutes. The Wright law fails to cover this important function.

12. The Wright law contains no provision against a railroad company advancing its rates or changing its classifications without first applying to the commission for permission, and requiring the commission also to notify interested parties and hold a hearing before allowing such an advance or change to be made. This is entirely safeguarded in the Webb bill.

13. In the event of a railroad disobeying a rate or rule of the commission the Wright law compels the commission or injured shipper to become the plaintiff and throws the burden of proof upon the commission or shipper. Per contra the Webb bill provided that the railroad company had to be the plaintiff if it felt aggrieved because of any rate or rule and the burden of proof was upon it to show why and how a wrong had been inflicted. As the evidence is in the keeping of the railroad this difference of position in a suit may become very important.

Wherein Wright Law Is Better.

There are many other, but less important particulars, in which the Wright law falls short of the Webb bill in comprehensiveness and vigor, but it is only fair to say that there are a few points in which the Wright law has the advantage over the Webb bill. These are in the main:

1. The Wright law requires the Railroad Commission to hold stated meetings in certain cities of the state to hear complaints if there are any, while the Webb bill does not.

2. The Wright law requires the commission to investigate all accidents attended with loss of life or destruction of public property, a very valuable service if rightly performed and publicity given to the findings.

3. The Wright law also requires the commission to file complaints with the interstate commerce commission whenever California shippers have just grounds for complaint, a very good provision if obeyed, as it has not been so far. The Webb bill does not contain this provision.

4. The Wright law requires the state commission to co-operate with the interstate commerce commission in all proper ways, a very good requirement save that a fit commission

SHE went home the next day and fortunately her parents returned a few hours later, and in the pleasure of their meeting she tried to be herself and make them happy in her come coming. Her mother was not deceived, however, but wisely waited for Sylvia to tell her trouble, which she did, tearless and restrained, showing a bitterness contrary to her usual nature.

Her mother said, "My dear, it is so easy to be mistaken."

"I saw him, myself," said Sylvia. "I am not mistaken in that."

"Then there must be some good reason for his conduct."

The girl shook her head. "If it were an innocent transaction he would have mentioned it to me, especially as he had been out before with the same lady. What business could he have which would exclude me so entirely! Besides Miss Gray noticed their devotion to each other and was amused by it."

"Miss Gray seems to have been very observing," said Mrs. Grant. "If you are sure it was your husband, why not write and ask him to explain?"

"I shall ask for no explanations," said the girl. "If I could bring him back to me tomorrow, I would not, knowing that like a wandering animal he must be watched and guarded, and kept in leash to secure his devotion. I want no such love as that."

"But, my dear," answered the older woman, "It is such rank injustice to condemn a man unheard. It is the undeniable right of every one to justify himself if it can be done. Write to him, tell him what you have seen, demand an explanation, and then act as seems best to you. Believe me, my dear, you are most unjust and sadly lacking in good faith yourself."

"I—why, Mother!"—

"Yes, you, Silvia. Your vows at the altar were just as binding as his. You also promised your love and devotion until death you should part, and now, at the first rough place in your pathway you stumble and halt and refuse to go on. My dear, my dear, you have so much to learn."

Sylvia turned abruptly from her mother and went swiftly out into the orchard to the rustic seat under the old apple tree where she had played and dreamed and planned when she was a girl. She did not move until the sun descended and the chill of the autumn evening forced her return to the house. Then she wrote to her husband as her mother had advised. In the meantime letters had been coming from him, but she would not open them, fearing perhaps that his expressions of love might dispel her just anger.

One day the answer came.

"My dear Sylvia," her husband wrote, "About six months or more after we were married I had expected, one day, to take luncheon with a friend at Bertrand's. You know the place on Grove street. I awaited him there, but for some reason which I now forget, he did not come. If you have ever been there you will remember that the lunch room is on the first floor above the street, and that large plate glass windows give a view of Grove street and the park opposite, and a very pretty view it is. I remember I thought so that day. I remember, too, that I was a very happy and satisfied man, thinking that there was not one cloud to darken either my domestic or financial life. We do mix up love and business sometimes, my dear, and I was thinking of both, when I happened to glance out of the window and saw a fine new auto car, one I did not know at all, but it seemed so perfect in all its appointments that I was interested immediately. While I was lost in admiration, it stopped (the best of them will do that you know) and no effort of the driver seemed to be able to move it. A gentleman and lady occupied the front seat, but I was not interested in them particularly. I said to some one near: 'Whose car is that?' He answered, 'Dicky Embery's; do you know him?' I answered, 'not personally.' for of course, I had heard of Dicky Embery, his unsavory reputation has spread to the far ends of the earth I am sure."

"Just then the man jumped to the ground and went around to the far side of the machine and I saw the lady who sat on the other side of him. To my great surprise, it was you. I knew your long brown coat, your brown veil. 'The set of your shoulders and the poise of your head,' to quote from your letter, my dear.

"I was so absolutely certain of your identity, I would have staked my life upon it. I was so stunned that for a moment I did not move, and the man to whom I had spoken said, 'I wonder who the lady is?' I simply shook my head and he continued, 'Well, whoever she is, it is safe to say she ought not to be there; that's Dicky, you know.'

"I could have throttled him where he stood, but I still had sense enough to control myself. I reached for my hat and hurriedly left the room. By this time I felt the blood surging into my head and ringing in my ears, I could hardly see and I could not speak. I was insane, absolutely crazed with jealous anger, I knew nothing, felt nothing, but the mad desire to kill Embery, to seize him by the throat and choke his worthless life out. My only fear was that the machine might go on before I could reach him. It was there when I gained the street, however, and I, only intent upon punishing the man, ran around the front of the car to reach him. In doing so I looked full into the woman's face. Thank God, Sylvia, it was not you. I must have carried the look of an avenger in my eyes, for she seemed frightened, as well as amazed at my rudeness. I had only just sense enough left to raise my hat and mutter an apology. I don't really know what I said, or did, for some minutes, but I reached the sidewalk and returned to the cafe where I paid for my lunch, then took a passing car for the office.

"Ever since that day, I have shuddered to think what would have happened had the car not remained where it was first stalled, for I should have followed the thing up and probably killed Embery on sight without asking or giving any explanation. I have read of homicidal mania, and now I know what it is, and I pray God I may never feel again the blind insanity for killing I felt that day."

"Do you remember once when I came home very early and we went out for a long drive on the lake road? I told you I was not well and could not remain at the office. Well, that was the day, dear. I shall never forget it and I would rather die than see another like it. This is the first part of my story, Sylvia; its meaning and moral are obvious."

"Now for the second part. I think you do not know Charley Englis, although I have often spoken of him to you. He is one of the best men I ever met, but shy and reserved as a girl. I never could coax him even to our house, he dislikes so much to meet strangers, you know. Well, Charley has been financially embarrassed of late. Luck has been against him and I am sure his business is in a bad way. He sold his car months ago, because he could not afford to keep it, so I have been lending him mine. (But I am getting along too fast). Englis is engaged to a charming girl who lives in the suburban part of our city called the Raymond addition. Owing to Charley's misfortunes, her people will not consent to their marriage, and he cannot even visit her, so they only meet when Miss Winters (Elise is her first name) comes to the city to shop."

"On several occasions Charley has had my car with all the rest of the outfit and taken the girl for a ride of an hour or so that they might be alone to talk over their plans for the future. I have not said much about Charley's affairs even to you just because I am sure he would not wish me to."

"On the morning of my departure for this city I met Charley who looked more cheerful than he has for a long time. He said that Miss Winters had decided to marry him immediately and the ceremony would take place that day as soon as she should arrive. He was on his way to meet her then. I congratulated him most heartily, and said, 'I'm going away for a month and Mrs. Remington will be away too. So you take my machine every day, if you have leisure, and enjoy yourselves all you can.' For you see, Sylvia, they had to cut out the big church wedding, the bridesmaids, the favors, the gifts and all the thousand and one things most girls desire."

"I still held my coat and as I handed it to him the spot of paint loomed up grandly, and Charley, full of remorse, said, 'By the way, Ward, I got that paint on your coat the last time I wore it and then I forgot all about it.'

"I was excited by that time and I said, 'Oh, damn the paint!' then I rushed off to catch my train."

"So, my dear, it was Charley Englis you saw with his poor little bride by his side, taking their forlorn little wedding trip in a borrowed car, cap, goggles, overcoat, paint and all. Charley and I are about the same size, but you'd best be thankful that I am not so handsome as he is, or there'd be no living with me and we've got to live together, little girl, for many and many a long year, please God."

"When I come back we'll buy them a good, sensible, wedding present. I think a patent porcelain-lined refrigerator would about fill the bill and be suitable to their circumstances, and about express the sympathy and consideration they will probably receive from everybody. Charley's outlook is cold and circumscribed, but he'll win out and the girl will help him, and if you'll forgive them the consternation they have caused you we'll say no more about it for 'Everything is lovely and the goose hangs high.'

"Ever yours most faithfully."

"WARD REMINGTON."

Sylvia sat very still for some minutes, after she had read her husband's letter. There was a flush on her cheeks, some bright tears in her eyes. Then she said, "I wish, for a time, we could go back to the good old days of wife beating."

The End.

would inevitably do exactly that thing without any such requirement as readily as with one.

However, these four provisions of the Wright law, approvingly commented upon above, were not in the bill as introduced by Senator Wright but were added by amendments by the friends of the Webb bill on the day when the Wright act was adopted after a running fight on the floor of the Senate. Whatever credit attaches to the Wright law on account of these provisions of right belongs to the proponents of the Webb bill.

While the Wright law is an advance upon anything California has had on its statute books in the way of a railroad regulation measure, and should be of service to the state, a careful comparison of the two measures will convince anyone of the splendid superiority of the Webb bill over the Wright law, and it should be easily seen from this comparison why it was that the railroad "push" at the last legislature worked so hard to have the Wright bill substituted for the one drawn in the office of Attorney General Webb.

There is no good reason why the railroads of California should be a law unto themselves, or why the laws which they are to obey should all be drafted in their own offices or put through the legislature by men notoriously subservient to them. There is no purpose to make war upon railroads in the mind of any reformer known to the present forward movement, but there is and should be a purpose to bring all transportation companies under just, exact and clearly defined and adequate regulation laws, and perhaps no better thing can be done by the next legislature than to amend the Webb bill in two or three particulars and then substitute it for the Wright measure as the Wright measure was substituted for it in the last time of 1909.

CHARACTERISTICS OF CONGRESSMEN.

Members of congress, while always well known "back home," are seldom known to any extent by the nation at large, says the New York Times. These little sketches are not intended to take on the character of biographies; they are merely designed to throw lights here and there among the members of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Neuralgia has made Senator Money of Mississippi one of the earliest risers in official life. For fourteen years he has been awakened at 5 a. m. daily by a sharp pain in his jaw, which continues, in spite of all remedies, for two or three hours. To forget the pain, the Senator has acquired the habit of going over his official correspondence before breakfast, and as a result the Senator's secretary has made his work hours coincide with Mr. Money's, and he is through his day's work at about the time most of the Washington stenographers are beginning theirs.

"The inventor of universal peace" is the way Representative Bartholdt of Missouri is referred to by his friends of the House. Mr. Bartholdt, who was editor of a German newspaper in St. Louis before he nailed down the southern end of the city and put upon it his tag, is the principal American mover in the Interparliamentary Union that has set about the task of ending the world's bloodshed.

Representative Kustermann of Wisconsin has the broadest German accent in the House. Mr. Goldfogle of New York is a good second, and when either arises to speak the official stenographer, who must take down the remarks, groans aloud. "When Kustermann talks I can shut my eyes and imagine that I am listening to Joe Weber," remarked Representative Longworth one day.

Representative Lafean of Pennsylvania is known as the "Caramel King." He has a string of candy factories extending from coast to coast.

The richest man in the House is said to be Mr. McKinley of Illinois. He owns several hundred miles of interurban street railways in the "Sucker State" and is just now building a bridge across the Mississippi at St. Louis. His wealth is estimated at $35,000,000, and among the humorists at the Capitol he is known as the "Human Christmas Tree," because of his generosity in financing rail and river junkets for his brother members. Representative Huff of Greensburg, Penn., who owns many hundreds of coal cars laden with black diamonds, is said to be "just about as rich as McKinley."

"I move that the House do now adjourn." It is dollars to small doughnuts that the remark comes from Representative Payne of New York, no matter when you hear it. As the Republican floor leader, he claims it as his rules-given privilege to adjourn the House every day, and when any mean-spirited member gets in the motion first he is miffled about it for two days.

Whenever you hear a member mention Magna Charta and the plain of Runnymede, especially if that member happens to wear a dress suit in the daytime, you may be sure that it is Representative (General) Keifer of Ohio.

Representative Alexander of New York, now chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, entered the army when he was fifteen years old and served throughout the civil war.

His short stature has been a life-long cross to Representative Boutelle of Illinois. He is one of the best orators on the Republican side, and the one chosen to make the heavy campaign speeches this session. His lack of inches detracts from his value on the stump.

Senator Smoot is a practical woolen mill manager. Before he became a Senator he conducted a mill and several banks in Utah.

Butler of Pennsylvania and Cocks of New York are the Quaker members of the House. Mr. Butler is something of a humorist in spite of his sedate religious training. A few days ago after he had tried ineffectually to bring up some bill, he exclaimed, "I apologize to the House for trying to get something done."

Macon of Arkansas, or "Point-of-Order Macon," as he is known for a heartless manner in which he pounds away at items in the appropriations bills, looks like Dr. Mary Walker.

Senator Stewart of Nevada, who died last April, and Senator Shoup of Idaho, who passed away several years ago, were the last Indian fighters in the Senate.

Senator Jones of Washington was a plough-boy.

Representative Kinkaid of Nebraska, who comes from a very arid region and is a tall, lean, lank gentleman of very sober mien, is known as the "Sand Hill Crane." The name was given him by President Taft when the latter visited Nebraska last fall.

Senator Gallinger of New Hampshire is the only doctor in the Senate.

If the Mississippi Senatorial deadlock is never broken Senator Gordon can bear up under it. He is holding down the seat made vacant by the late Senator McLaurin by virtue of an appointment by Governor Noel. General Gordon says he likes his job, and as he is a very popular addition to the elder coterie of statesmen, everybody would be satisfied if they never agreed on a candidate at the Mississippi capital.

Representative Tener of Pennsylvania was a professional baseball player from 1885 to 1890. Representative Fitzgerald of New York was a famous college pitcher. Representative McCredie of Washington is the owner of the Vancouver team in the Pacific Coast League, and is now negotiating to buy the Washington American franchise.

FROHMAN'S LONDON PLANS.

The opening of Mr. Frohman's repertory theatre season on February 20 at the Duke of York's Theatre is the talk of the London theatrical world, says the New York Sun. And small wonder, for never before has a manager put forth such a program, and never before, it has been said, has a commercial manager gathered around him enough artists and plays to run a repertory theater on a money making basis, if the public wants it.

Last year Herbert Trench started his tenancy of the Haymarket theater with the idea of running a repertory theater. His program was sufficiently varied and interesting, and one wealthy peer alone is said to have backed the idea with 30,000 pounds. After one artistic failure the second piece caught on, and when it had to make way for the production of Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird" it was only moved to another theater, and is still running today, while the "Blue Bird" shows no signs of weakening in its flight.

Frohman, however, is going to see if the public really wants repertory. His list contains a dozen new plays and fifteen revivals, all to be seen within the short period of five months, for the preliminary announcement speaks only of the period from February 21 till the end of the summer.

Of the fifteen revivals only three were originally presented by Mr. Frohman, namely, the plays by J. M. Barrie, "Quality Street," "What Every Woman Knows" and "The Admirable Crichton." With one exception the other plays are all modern English works, the exception being Dr. Gilbert Murray's translation of "Iphigenia in Aulis." Of Pinero there will be "The Amazons," "Trelawny of the Wells" and "Iris"; of Bernard Shaw, "Man and Superman," "Major Barbara" and "The Doctor's Dilemma"; of Granville Barker, "The Voysey Inheritance" and "Prunella"; of John Galsworthy, "The Silver Box" and "Strife"; one by Haddon Chambers, "The Tyranny of Tears," and one by John Masefield, "The Tragedy of Nan." These plays, it will be noticed, included the pick of the old Court Theater plays, with several of the best of the last ten years.

Of the new plays that which rouses most interest and curiosity is "The Sentimentalists," a comedy by George Meredith. The play is unfinished but will be played as the author left it in manuscript. The fragment, which was intended perhaps for the first act of the play, is in two scenes, and is so complete in itself as to justify its production as a one act play. Other new plays are "The Outcry," by Henry James; "Justice" and "The Eldest Son," by Galsworthy; "Misalliance," by Bernard Shaw; "The Madras House," by Granville Barker, and "Chains," by Elizabeth Baker. There will also be new plays by Somerset Maugham and two new one act plays by Barrie.

BOOKS USED BY SHAKESPEARE.

Two rare old English works, out of which Shakespeare got considerable material for some of his best-known plays, turned up at auction in Anderson's a few days ago. One of these rarities was a copy of the first edition of Thomas North's celebrated translation, entitled, "The Lives of the Noble Grecians and Romanes, compared together by that grave learned philosopher and historiographer Plutarke of Chaeronea," a thick, small folio, London, 1575. No less than six of Shakespeare's plays can be traced to this work, viz., "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Pericles," "Julius Caesar," "Coriolanus," "Timon of Athens," and "Antony and Cleopatra." Wharton, in his "History of English Poetry," calls North's translation "Shakespeare's storehouse of learning." It was translated from Greek into French by Bishop James Amyot of Auxerre, and from French into English by North. It is dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, and was one of the most popular works of her time. In Shakespeare's "Coriolanus" whole speeches have been transferred bodily from North's "Plutarch," and in "Antony and Cleopatra" North's diction, which is vivid and robust, has been closely followed. The copy sold for $150.

The other item was William Painter's "Palace of Pleasure," two small volumes, London, 1569-80. The title page of Volume I. reads: "The Palace of Pleasure Beautified, adorned and well furnished with Pleasant Histories, and excellent Nouvelles, selected out of divers good and commendable Authors. By William Painter, Clerke of the Ordinance and Armorie, 1569. Imprinted at London in Flete Strete, neare to S. Dunstons Church, by Thomas Marshe." Volume II. is entitled, "The Second Tome of the Palace of Pleasure, containing store of goodlye Histories, Tragical Matters & other morall arguments, very requisite for delight and profyte. Chose and selected out of divers good and commendable authors and now once agayne corrected and encreased. By William Painter," etc.

"The Palace of Pleasure" is the first translation into English of the novels of Boccaccio, Bandello, Queen Margaret of Navarre, and other French, Italian, and Spanish novelists, with other stories from Greek and Latin authors. Shakespeare, it is said, was indebted to it for Romeo and Juliet, and made use of it also in his "Timon of Athens," "Coriolanus," and "All's Well that Ends Well." The influence of Painter's book may also be traced in Webster's "Duchess of Malfi"; "The Widow," by Ben Jonson, and others. It sold for $360.

Geraldine Bonner, author of "Rich Men's Sons," etc., has written a novel called "The Emigrant Trail," which will be published this spring by Messrs. Duffield & Co. The book is a remarkable tour de force in that it relates entirely to the experiences of a small band of overland travelers in 1849 on their progress over "the emigrant trail," so called to distinguish it from the Santa Fe trail further to the south. Within this scope there is a remarkable variety of types and adventures.

THE GRAFT CASES.

The trial of Patrick Calhoun, in Judge Lawlor's court, which was set for the 25th instant, is not likely to begin on that date, as, in addition to the disappearance of former Supervisor Gallagher, Mr. Calhoun himself has taken a trip East, without the permission of the court, and it is understood that he will not return till some weeks later than the 25th.

In Judge Dunne's court, last Saturday, the case against T. V. Halsey, charged with bribery, was continued until March 5th. The cases against Luther Brown, J. W. Coffroth, E. Graney, and E. E. Schmitz, for bribery; Abraham Ruef and Jerry Dinan, for conspiracy; Luther G. Brown, for perjury, and M. W. Coffey, for receiving a bribe, have been continued until March 26th.

In Judge Lawlor's court, last Saturday, former Supervisor George D. Duffy pleaded not guilty to receiving bribes in behalf of the Home Telephone company, the United Railroads, and for his vote on the ordinance fixing light, heat and power rates. The cases against him were continued till March 29th, when a date for their trial will be set.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

The California Weekly.

Please find two ($2) dollars as subscription for your paper. I consider it by all odds the ablest and clearest cut in all its discussions and most loyal to the people's welfare of any paper in the state.

Yours truly,

Dr. CARL MURRAY.

Sacramento, Cal., February 28, 1910.

The foregoing is the kind of compliment that The California Weekly appreciates. As for its measure of ability, well, give God the glory, for we are as heaven has endowed us and not one among us all has much cause for self-gratulation on that score; but in real loyalty to the public welfare we do take a, perhaps, pardonable pride. Yet there are those who, because we decline to attempt to overturn all things, attempt to rub out the record the world has been many thousand years in making, think we are doing less than our duty to the public. Our aim is to fight the battles of the common man. He needs to have his cause championed. The uncommon man can take care of his interests uncommonly well wherever fortune may find him.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen: Enclosed find my check for one year's subscription to the Weekly. In these days of pernicious daily papers it is a decided relief to peruse the ably written pages of your truthful journal. It seems strange that a sane people should so popularize the lying, sensational papers. Wishing you much success,

Truly yours,

F. H. McNAIR.

Berkeley, Cal., Feb. 22, 1910.

A trouble with the daily press is that it is daily, that it is hastily written to be hastily read, but another trouble is that, since the publication of daily papers has come to be a species of manufacturing, journalism is looked upon as a gainful pursuit and not a profession to be practiced wholly in the public interest. Finally, many large dailies are practically retained, as attorneys are, by special interests opposed to public interests. The California Weekly was planned on entirely different lines and for it to be anything less than independent and truthful would forfeit its right to exist.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen—I enclose herewith check to your order for $2.00, in payment of my subscription for the current year.

Even the few days I have delayed in sending this to you makes me feel a little guilty because your paper certainly deserves every bit of support which it can secure. It is wishing a great deal for you, but I hope that in time you may be able to occupy the position which the Argonaut of old held for so many years.

Yours very truly,

CLINTON FOLGER.

San Francisco, February 23, 1910.

The Argonaut of old has come to be a tradition and, like wine, that tradition has improved with age. It is in this respect much in the position of the old Sacramento Union by which every old Forty-niner still swears as being the best paper that ever was printed on this coast; but take down from the shelf a volume of the Sacramento Union of old and compare it with present day papers and there are a hundred better ones in California. Nearly every county has one, and yet the old Union and the old Argonaut were powers in their days, the Union because of its sincerity and courage and the Argonaut because of the genius of Frank Pixley. His repertoire of subjects was narrow, lamentably narrow and prejudiced, but he could write like chain-lightning, and everybody read his paper every week, a thing that has not happened since he left that tripod. To become, in point of interest, what the Argonaut of old was to California is certainly setting a high enough standard for The California Weekly.

Walter Pulitzer, while in Vienna recently, with his wife, formerly Lilian Hearne of San Francisco, to assist in settling the estate of his father, Albert Pulitzer, told The New York Times correspondent that upon his return to America he would take up the memoirs of his father where he left off, and complete them with the aid of numerous papers, documents, and photographs left by him. The memoirs, when completed, will reveal a new and interesting phase of American journalism.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

It is not quite so with H. G. Loveland, Governor Gillett's "corking good" commissioner. He helped to frame the Webb Railroad Regulation bill and, unlike our "corking" governor, stuck to it and stayed with it until it went down to defeat. Furthermore, it is known that there has been feeling in the board between Loveland and the other two "stand pat" commissioners. They feel that it was his fault that they went to Attorney General Webb to find out that they could not do anything under the law to earn their salaries only to find out that they could, and they feel that he has sought to put them in an unfavorable light before the public as being dependent while he is independent. These whisperings raise the suspicion that, after all, Governor Gillett's "corking good" commissioner may have proven a better selection than the governor supposed or intended. It might be well for the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to look up this man's official record more thoroughly, the more especially as it is reported that Edward Aigeltinger is to be the "organization" candidate to succeed Loveland. He is already in the field with his petition.

("Homes for Children"—Concluded.)

sons and daughters grew up, drifted away, married and made homes of their own. The loneliness of the family fireside was too much for them; they appealed to the Native Daughters, who recommended them to the Children's Agency. The Agency's report was favorable, and a few days ago the representative of the Agency traveled a day and night by train and then sixty miles in a sleigh through the white fastnesses of the Sierra, back to this mining town, bearing a little infant in her arms who should make glad the hearts of two old people, and restore to them the love and sweetness of youth.

This and its kind are the glory and the recompense of the work of the Children's Agency. This child and hundreds of others are growing up, because of it, to have a name and a place in society who otherwise would grow up loveless and adrift, with only the cold cheer of institutional routine to stand between them and the worst evils of society.

NOTICE OF REFEREE'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

Under and by virtue of an interlocutory decree in partition and order of sale, duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 24th day of February, 1910, in the above entitled action, I, the undersigned duly appointed, qualified and acting referee in said action, am commanded to sell all those certain lands situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, described in the complaint herein, and described as follows, to-wit:

COMMENCING at a point on the easterly line of Polk Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet northerly from the northerly line of Ellis Street; running thence northerly along said line of Polk Street twenty (20) feet more or less to Olive Avenue; thence at right angles easterly along the southerly line of Olive Avenue parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet; thence at right angles southerly parallel with Polk Street twenty (20) feet, and thence at right angles westerly parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet to Polk Street, the point of commencement.

Said described premises being a part of 50 Vara lot Number Three (3) in Block Number Nine (9) of the Western Addition as laid down on the official map of said City and County of San Francisco.

And public notice is hereby given that on Saturday the 26th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of that day at the street entrance to the office of the sheriff of said City and County at No. 122 McAlister Street, in the said City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and interlocutory decree in partition, sell the above described property at public auction to the highest bidder for cash in United States Gold Coin, ten (10) per cent thereof to be paid as a deposit on the day of sale, the balance upon confirmation of the sale by the Court and the delivery of a conveyance. Ten (10) days allowed before confirmation for examination of title. Objection to title, if any, must be made before confirmation. If after the confirmation the purchaser neglects or refuses to immediately comply with the terms of the sale, a resale will be made of the premises purchased. If the amount realized on such resale does not amount to the former bid and the expenses of the previous sale, such purchaser shall be liable for the deficiency and the said referee will retain such deficiency from the deposit. All check presented by purchaser must be certified.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof. Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't. —.

The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.

[Seal of Superior Court] H. I. MULCREVY,

Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE,

Deputy Clerk

Memoranda.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:

The City and County of San Francisco whose address is at the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Procedure In Primary Elections.

We shall deal in this article with the steps to be taken for holding the state-wide primary which, as heretofore explained, is to be held on the third Tuesday in August every two years for the nomination of all candidates to be voted for at the November election following. Beginning with August, 1910, and every four years following, these primary elections will be held for the nomination of full sets of state and county officers. On the even numbered years midway between these four year terms, there will be nominated candidates for congress, for state senate and assembly.

The first official step taken must be by the Secretary of State who, at least sixty days prior to the third Tuesday in August, must prepare and transmit to the county clerk of each county, and the registrar of voters of each city and county (which now means San Francisco alone) a notice in writing designating the offices for which candidates are to be nominated at the primary election.

The next step is taken by the county clerk in each county, and also by the registrar of voters in San Francisco. Within ten days of the time of receiving the notice from the Secretary of State, referred to above, each such county clerk must cause to be published once each week for six successive weeks, in not more than two papers published in the county, so much of the notice received from the Secretary of State as applies to his county.

The next step is to prepare the nomination papers in order to get the names to be voted for on the ballot to be used at the primary election. This must be done, and all lists filed with the county clerks, at least thirty days prior to holding the primary election. As this nomination paper is a formidable affair, and the regulations concerning it are numerous, it will be made the subject of a special lesson.

Within ten days after the filing of nomination papers the county clerks must forward to the Secretary of State such of them as have to do with assemblymen, state senators and all other officers to be voted for in more than one county, if there are such positions to be filled, other than those explained in the next paragraph.

Candidates for state offices file their nominating petitions directly with the Secretary of State, as do candidates for all district offices, such as member of board of equalization, railroad commission, member of appellate court, etc. Also candidates for United States senate. All of them at least 30 days before the primary election is to be held.

Twenty-five days before the date for the August Primary the Secretary of State must have prepared a certified list of the candidates for state and district offices entitled to be voted for in each county and must forward that list to each of the county clerks in the state, and to the registrar of voters in San Francisco. The list must be certified to as correct and no name not so certified to can have a place on the printed ballot.

Immediately upon receipt of this certified list of candidates from the Secretary of State each county clerk in the state must publish, under the proper party designation, the title of each office, the names and addresses of all persons for whom nomination papers have been filed, the date of the primary election, the hours during which the polls will be open, and the polling places in each precinct. The publication must be for two successive weeks in not more than two papers published in the county and one of these must represent the political party that cast the highest number of votes at the last preceding general election. This list of candidates will include not merely those certified from the Secretary of State but also such as had filed nomination papers in the county clerk's office for county and district offices.

At least twenty days before the August primary each county clerk must prepare his official, primary, sample ballot and have it printed, but inasmuch as the regulations concerning the ballot are very elaborate a lesson will have to be devoted to the ballot alone.

Copies of these sample ballots must be mailed to all candidates whose names appear thereon and the clerk submits copies to the chairmen of each party county committee and posts a copy in his own office, but he is not required to mail copies to the voters. He must, however, publish the ballot twice in not more than two newspapers and at least 10 days before the primary election is to be held.

In the event that an error appears in the ballot as prepared the aggrieved person can bring an action forthwith in either a superior, appellate or supreme court and so secure a summary hearing and an order to correct any error that the court may determine to exist. Anyone failing to obey the court order will be liable to punishment for contempt of court.

Any neglect in filing any of the nomination papers entrusted to the charge of any public official is punishable with severity, but the pains and penalties attending the holding of a primary election deserve separate treatment.

The polling places must be open from six in the morning until six in the evening. If there are voters standing in line when six o'clock arrives they must be permitted to vote before closing the polls, but no voter arriving after six o'clock shall be permitted to vote.

At the polling places there will not be separate ballot boxes for each political party, but there will be separate tickets for each such party. The voter will ask for the ticket of his party, step into the booth and stamp it and deposit it in the general ballot box with the others, but in counting the ballots those of each party are required to be separated from the others and strung on a string before being counted, except to see that the whole number of ballots in the box equals the number recorded as having voted.

The qualifications for voters will require a separate lesson.

Sportsmanship

WHILE THE POLO PLAYERS of Blingum belong to the order of lepidoptera, and are of small consequence to persons whose lives are worth while, their squabbles may illustrate the difference between the American and the English spirit of sportsmanship. The Briton is brought up to love sport for its own sake, the American only for the winning of the game, by what means is of as little concern to him as with his father in making the money that spoiled the son. The brigandage by which the opulent inconsequentiality of the British sportsman's life is sustained occurred so long ago as to have lost its grosser characteristics, and the grandchildren of our newly rich may become either gentlemen or paupers.

To Make Enemies by Wholesale

THE PENNSYLVANIA FEDERATION OF LABOR, at Newcastle, virtually whereased that, inasmuch as the hand of every employer is not yet arrayed against union labor, therefore, Resolved, that it ought to be and that the best way to effect it will be to plunge all the industries of the country, innocent and guilty, friends and foes, into industrial chaos through a nationwide sympathetic strike. That convention acted with suicidal intent.

Hiram Johnson's Foreword

BELOW WILL BE FOUND Hiram Johnson's Foreword to Republicans of California. There is no dodging the issue he presents. Anderson cannot sidestep it, Curry cannot circumvent it, Stanton cannot ride it down. The issue is, Bond or Free, Government by the People or by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. Line up, Men of California! Under which banner?

"If Southern California Wants Me?"

IF SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA wants him Governor Gillett will be the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau's candidate for the nomination for United States Senator. How is he going to find out if Southern California wants him? At the August primary? Of forty senatorial districts Southern California has nine, and of eighty assembly districts sixteen. At the August primary they may everyone say, "Nay, nay, Governor, we don't want you," and yet get him. It will be as the rest of the state may say, for, this time, by "organization" manipulation, a majority of legislative districts has the say.

HIRAM W. JOHNSON'S FOREWORD TO REPUBLICANS

"This is a campaign of principle, with but one main issue. That issue is, Shall the People of California take to themselves the government of the state or shall the Southern Pacific Railroad be continued in sovereign power? We appeal to the Republicans of California to depose the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company from its usurped control of the party organization and the state government and to restore that control to the people. Until this is accomplished, no other important reform is possible. We propose to proclaim this issue until it can no longer be evaded. With the issue clear, we will wrest from Herrin and his machine California's government, which for forty years has been merely an asset of the Southern Pacific and its allied interests.

"Our Republicanism is that of Theodore Roosevelt; a Republi-

Miserable Women

DOMESTIC INFELICITY is not often of concern to The California Weekly, but recent events sanction the conviction that of all miserable beings born, miserable themselves and calculated to make others miserable, there is none who can excel the selfish, self-centered, morbid, sentimental, stage-struck wife and mother with time to kill and money to burn. She were better off at the wash tub and with the wolf at her door.

None Too Big for the Place

CALIFORNIA HAS NO MAN so great, so honored, so rich, so gifted, that it is going to be beneath him to represent his state in the next legislature, and no man fitted for the commission, sound in body and not pursued by poverty, has any right to reject an invitation to stand for election to the legislature if his fellow citizens think he ought. Let us have one legislature of which California may justly be proud, a legislature not made up of ingenuous but inexperienced youths, but of mature men, men of such character that never after will the title "Hon." be looked upon as an epithet.

Fight It Out On That Line

THE SUTTER STREET CARS should go down the inside Market street tracks to the ferry or stay where they are. Let the issue be fought out on that line. The outside tracks will be wanted for a municipal system to be developed with Geary street for a main stem. If the city's right to the outside tracks cannot be had otherwise then let it be had by condemnation and payment. If the laws need to be changed before that can be done fight to change them, if the constitution, then fight to change that. Let there be no compromise, no weakness. If any supervisor votes otherwise start petitions to recall him. He is an enemy to his city.

Michael Coffey

WHAT A TRAVESTY upon justice would it prove if Michael Coffey should be the only grafter of them all to serve a term in the penitentiary! To have that man in stripes, and all the other rascals free, the bribers and the bribed, would be a disgrace to the state. Almost may we wish that the supreme court may find a flaw upon which to set him at liberty also. If they look real sharp may they not? There runs a notion that they find what they look for. It need not be as deep as a well or wide as a barn door to serve.

canism that means equal opportunity for all, and demands common honesty in business and politics alike.

"This year the direct primary law gives the first opportunity to appeal directly to the voters, and Republicans are at last enabled to protest against party usurpation by a corrupt political machine. This movement is the appeal and the protest and it will continue until the fight is won. It is a fight in which persons are only important as they represent principles, and from the principle involved neither vituperation nor villification nor mendacity shall swerve us.

"On these lines, this fight will be made. It will be a long battle and a hard one, but it will be won. And then a free people again will have their own.

"HIRAM W. JOHNSON."

More Radical Than the President

Judging from press dispatches, the House of Representatives, at least, is more radical than the President in relation to railroad regulation, but it might be that and still fall short of taking drastic action. The President has been fearful lest he ask for too much and so has created a disagreeable situation between himself and the lower house of Congress.

If it is opposed to a sound public policy for railroads to own stock in other railroads a stop should be put to it, affording only a reasonable time for holders of such stocks to dispose of their holdings. In amending the pending measure in conformity with this view the House committee has improved on the preparatory work done by the administration.

If it is opposed to a sound public policy for a railroad company to own stock in a competing steam railroad, it is as certainly opposed to such policy to have a railroad own stock in a competing electric railroad, and the sooner a stop is put to that the better. Only a reasonable time in which to dispose of such stock should be allowed before making the prohibition effective. In this particular also the House committee has improved the administration measure.

Of course not too much can be predicated upon the action of the House committee. There yet remain the House itself and the Senate, but it is encouraging to note that the spirit of compromise does not pervade all parts of all departments of government, that there is at least now and again a committee that will stand for the unqualified good.

Panama and Its Responsibilities

Human history is a record of getting out of trouble, and seldom of steering clear of it, but it ought not to be so. So stupendous an event as the opening of the Panama canal should not escape prearrangement. There is more to be considered than the mere celebration of the event.

The opening of the canal will bring great opportunity to the Central American countries, and to those along the northern coasts of South America. They will be rediscovered by the commercial world. Shall they have a chance to profit by their opportunity or shall the selfish ambitions of their dictators stand between them and their common good? It will be for the United States to say. The rest of the world will not rest content to see misgovernment prevent their development and the Monroe doctrine will not permit us to allow European countries to do such spanking as may be found necessary to be done.

And what about the yellow fever? Shall vessels bound for the Orient be permitted, through lax sanitary methods peculiar to Spanish-American peoples, to carry germ-infected mosquitos to the densely peopled coasts of southern Asia to decimate their populations?

Finally, shall our trans-continental railroads, by dominating transportation by sea and land, be permitted to nullify the great good the Panama canal should do us all? These are all going to be live issues some day. Why not today, in order that some other and more troublous day may be forestalled and its hardships prevented? The event is only five years away. We should be preparing for it.

A Demise Long Delayed

If ever any man lagged superfluous upon the stage of action it was Thomas Collier Platt. He should have gone to his place, wherever it is, when Roscoe Conkling went to his, if not previously. In his private life he was licentious, but not more so than in his public, where he represented what was worst in American politics. He was cunning, unscrupulous, in his way masterful, and he made the standard of his political economy. Conkling was a spoilsman, but there was something robust and leonine in his stalwart disregard for the higher ideals of political life. Platt was a cringing, crawling "me, too," using cunning and duplicity, the weapons of weakness, for gaining his ends. What a wonder it is that he gained them! But he did and for a third of a century, held the Empire state in the hollow of his withered, trembling hand. He did it through wielding the power of patronage with the liberal aid of great corporations that desired to be protected in the enjoyment of special privileges they never should have possessed. It was an unenviable pre-eminence which he achieved and, outside of his immediate sphere of influence, there is little sorrow because of his taking-off.

Canada Not Worrying

For each dollar that Uncle Sam sends over his northern border for products our Lady of the Snows send two dollars back. This is why Canada is not worrying over whether or not, on the last day of the present month, our President, by proclamation, subjects her commodities to the maximum duty to be imposed under our new tariff law upon the productions of those countries that discriminate against the United States. Canada's only discrimination is in exportations of wood pulp from the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and it is some question whether these export taxes are real discriminations under the law. In our tariff policy we have never been more fatefully suicidal than in our treatment of Canada, where our watchword should have been "reciprocity" and our attitude one of conciliation. Our northern border should be the Arctic, and it is a misfortune to humanity that it is not. The concept of an "ocean-bound" republic should have been held ever before our faces in our cradles, but, as it was not, we should make amends for this defect in our education by drilling the idea into our children as though it were part of their catechism. But Canada is to be courted, not conquered. If our markets are not opened to her products those of Europe are where her competition with our commodities is as keen and as injurious as it could be in our country, even if her products were admitted duty free. It is to be hoped that the President will find a way of avoiding the infliction upon Canada of our maximum tariff rate. It would be a gross discourtesy.

All There Is in It

Those San Francisco lot owners who are striving to overthrow the beneficent building laws now on the ordinance books fancy that they merely want "all there is in" their landed investments, but they do not. There is a great deal in the issue that they do not want. There are sallow complexions and lack-lustre eyes, anemic bodies and dulled brains, hacking coughs and tuberculosis, impoverished lives and early deaths, for there is nothing truer in the world than that good health can not be maintained shut away from sunshine and air. What these protesting landlords want is all the money that can be wrung from their holdings, leaving whatever else is in it to their unfortunate tenants. God made this world, this peninsula, this environment, big enough to afford every household unlimited air space about its home and, now and again, a chance at the sunshine. Greed should not be permitted to take these things away. They should be an unalienable inheritance of every human being.

Where Do You Belong?

In San Francisco last summer thousands of Union Labor party voters registered as Republicans, that they might help the associated villainies beat Mauzy with Crocker, and then, in November, they voted their own party ticket, with the associated villainies helping them, to beat Crocker with McCarthy. In doing this these men were false to the "spirit of the primary," false to party integrity, false to their own manhood and were guilty of false swearing if not of perjury.

It is open and notorious that the compact entered into between the McCarthy party and the associated villainies for the election in San Francisco last fall ran to the state election of 1910. That is, the McCarthyites were to be registered as Republicans in order to vote for the "organization" candidates for Republican nominations in August and for the "organization" candidates, whether Republicans or Democrats, in the general election in November. What is to be done about it?

Family integrity is no more necessary to civilized life than party integrity is to government by party. Unless voters will stay on their own sides of party fences there will soon be no party fences and no political parties. They can not exist unless party preferences can be settled without the intervention of persons who do not belong within the respective parties.

This is the situation in several of the southern states of our Union. There there is but one party, the equivalent of no party, for everybody votes at the primary and the only real contest is at the primary election. The general election is only a formal and perfunctory ratification of the results of the primary election. How much does the situation differ from this in California this year? The great contest of the year is to be fought on the issue of the emancipation of the Republican party from corporation control with Hiram Johnson leading the cohorts of emancipators and, probably, at the final scratch, Charles F. Curry leading the "organization" crowd.

What are good Democrats to do in this case? Are they to stand to one side and see good Republicans fight an unaided battle with the hosts of the associated villainies, whether Republican, Democratic or McCarthyite, when they are as much interested in an emancipated commonwealth as any Republican can be?

It is a lamentable truth that, in political life, the voter with an easy civic conscience has the advantage, while the voter with no conscience at all has what, in the vernacular of politics, is called the "mortal cinch," on the poor fellow whose conscience shadows him all day and sleeps with him all night.

Unequivocally, no honorable man can register as a Republican when he fully intends to vote the Democratic ticket next fall, but suppose that he does not intend to do that? Suppose that he intends to vote for the best men nominated by whomever nominated, what then? What party issue is there that serves, at this time, to constitute a party fence? Are we anything more than traditional Republicans or traditional Democrats? Should tradition separate like minded men when nothing else does? The opportunity of the associated villainies is that they are able to divide, on some fake issue, the element that is characterized by civic conscience and then, by a mobilization of that element that is without civic conscience, or near it, hold the balance of power and the reins of government.

These reflections are brought forward to be thought on. Party affiliation, as provided for in the code, is for the next election, not for all time or for next year or the year after. The important thing is for those who believe in free government to vote together at the August primary. Those who do not are going to vote together to a man. The occasion does not call for finical distinctions in civic casuistry, but for getting into the fray and doing the thing that is bluntly, effectively right. What is that thing? Where, liberty-loving, clean and reputable Democratic voter, does your vote belong this time, at primary and final election? With which political party ought you to affiliate in this election? The California Weekly is not seeking to answer this question for you. It is merely putting it up to you in black and white.

The Case of Loveland

Last week this paper recommended to the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League the advisability of taking up the career of Railroad Commissioner H. D. Loveland and making a thorough search of it to see whether or not it would be a good thing to indorse his candidacy on the score of his having made good. We still think it advisable that this investigation be made. There is prima facie evidence that he took hold of his work sincerely and has done it effectively and that he is not so biased, schooled and nurtured on the railroad side of the railroad problem as to be incapable of doing good service to the state. We say that there is prima facie evidence to this effect, but the League can not act on prima facie evidence. It must satisfy itself beyond a reasonable doubt. It is not sufficient that the "organization" is seemingly not for Loveland and is for that glad hand artist, Edward Aigeltinger. The case of Loveland deserves to be sifted to the bottom.

A Need for Sound Advice

There is no knowing in what the great car strike at Philadelphia may culminate. To permit an organization of employers to crush unionism among laborers would be to crush humanity. To permit the mob spirit to be triumphant would mean anarchy as a result of every labor dispute of large proportions. Such things must not be and such things could not be if we had, in this country, more of statesmanship and less of politics. The kind of politics that has dominated Pennsylvania for three-fourths of a century is the kind of politics that has dominated California for half as long. There is no statesmanship in it. It is politics and only politics, politics on a low plane and for the basest of purposes, politics that makes leaders of Herrins and Penroses, Platts and Quays—politics abominable.

Realizing the need for sound advice at this time, The California Weekly invited Colonel Harris Weinstock to contribute such an article as would be germane to the issue raised in Philadelphia. He has done so and we recommend it to the thoughtful consideration of every citizen worthy of the title, "citizen." It bears the marks of statesmanship, not demagoguery. It offers a plan of campaign to make such occurrences as are now taking place in Philadelphia, such as took place in San Francisco a short time ago, if not impossible, at least improbable. California may well follow the advice Colonel Weinstock has given. It may well lead the states of the Union toward an intelligent and practical safeguarding of the rights and advantages of unionism, to be made available to both capital and labor, safeguarding also the right of the public to be protected against anarchy and against the losses inflicted upon the innocent through the waging of private wars.

We can not now determine which of the two contending parties at Philadelphia has the preponderance of right and of wrong upon its side. The refusal of the car company to arbitrate was a flagrant disregard of the popular welfare. The outrageous conduct of the strikers and their hoodlum sympathizers is deserving of severe punishment. Let those nearer at hand judge between them, but let us, here in California, strive to do some sane thing to prevent such disasters visiting our state and our principal cities. We can do it if we set our minds and hearts to the work. Harris Weinstock has finely outlined a plan of campaign.

The State's Wards

The daily papers lately told of a little colored boy, clad in burlap and sleeping with the chickens, found in the possession of a family that had taken him from an orphanage to be reared, not to be mistreated, but being mistreated and not reared. Human frailty is not above reducing helpless infancy to slavery. There are hundreds of homes that would treat a dog better than a dependent child and it is hardly to be doubted that there are many such children being now so treated.

And yet if home-finding be not developed and insisted upon a superfluity of orphanages, fattening upon what they feed on, are certain to arise to curse their charges with institutionalism. It is not an easy problem to deal with. California has taken the direction of least resistance in caring for its dependent children with results not creditable to the state or to its statesmanship.

Elsewhere in this paper will be found an interesting article on child placing from the pen of Mr. Herbert Lewis, not unknown to the charitably inclined of San Francisco and other portions of the state. The association which he superintends in this state has much to its credit, yet the field is not to be left to it alone. Even that organization had become a refuge for broken down clergymen, having the best intentions in the world, but neither the soundest judgment nor the most adequate knowledge of human nature. Mr. Lewis has put new life into the association and given it a new claim upon public confidence and public benevolence.

But, after all, the state is the ultimate guardian of every child in the state and, through its State Board of Charities and Corrections, it should exercise a supervisory relation over every child placed in a home not its own until that child has reached its majority. Again, more of statesmanship and less of politics would stand California in good stead. The problem of the dependent child will not down. It will come up for consideration until it is fully considered, considered in all its phases and provided for humanely and adequately. It is no subject for politicians to handle. Politicians will do politics with children as readily as with pigs, and to about the same effect. The problem is one for the manhood and womanhood of California to deal with and that it has not been so dealt with is one of the derelictions of our state.

Why These Old Personalities?

Nothing in recent years has more unprofitably occupied type and space than the wordy war between John P. Irish and John Daggett concerning the distribution of Democratic patronage in California, when there was Democratic patronage in California. President Cleveland is dead, John P. Irish is functus officio and John Daggett is but an unaided human recollection. It is not a public service to drag the late Stephen J. Field forth from oblivion, for never was there a more malevolent spirit in our public life than his. He had brain and spleen in surpassing quantities and was thereby doubly endowed, but it is debatable if he was more admired for the one than detested for the other attribute. Gentlemen, be at peace!

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

What preparation is the reader making for the evening of life? Or isn't it in sight yet? Every normal life should have its twilight and, in this latitude, that twilight should be prolonged. It should begin, for men, as early as sixty years and for women a year or two earlier, if possible, and it should last for a fourth of the span of life. A third of a century of hard tugging should be sufficient for pulling one's own weight all the way through, squaring the account for a normal childhood and preparatory work and leaving a good balance to ease one down to the night that cometh when no man can work.

But what preparation are you making for the enjoyment of this twilight zone? Do you expect to carry your load like a packhorse until you drop dead in the trail? Or do you expect to trudge on until you break down under the load of toil and care and then drag yourself on into the night in the pain of a hopeless invalidism? The writer of this has faith to believe that God meant his children to be happy in this life, to have a joyous, exuberant childhood and an old age serene, content and of itself worth while, a season of quiet, restful thankfulness to be alive and to have been permitted to live, but provision must be made for that season if the most is to be made of it. There are not two ways about that. What plans has the reader made?

The old work horse turned out to pasture is content with an abundance of green grass and a sunny place in which to lie down and stretch himself at full length, but even an old horse will neigh for company. Nothing can be more stupid for an old man or woman than just to eat and sleep and sit around. To depend wholly upon others to furnish diversion is to become a burden and to kill time is murder in the first degree, punishable with gall and wormwood if not with hemlock.

Therefore that age that would be serene must have resources within itself, and to have such resources it must lay by a plenteous store during the heyday of life. It must keep some green spots in its inner garden all through the dry season of struggle for existence and to get on, spots that a little cultivation will cause to spring up and yield a fall harvest.

A man may be a money-grubber and still have a little time for fostering a love for roses, for music, for poetry, for literature, history, art, some branch of science, for the cultivation of some oasis in the desert of being. A mother may, through all her years of bringing her family into being, rearing it, and marketing the product, take now and again an hour for broadening her interests beyond the family boundary, beyond criticism and curiosity in the lives of those who come within her horizon.

There are personalities that grow like the roots of a tree in a pot, around and around, intertwined and snarled. What hope is there of such a life if the pot be not broken and the interests be not given a chance to shoot down and spread out? A noted practitioner in mental disorders declared that he felt hopeless of any case brought to him in advanced years if no hobby had been cherished. To be a fancier of horses, dogs or poultry has proven a safe refuge to many a mind that, otherwise, had turned upon itself like an in-growing toenail, to fester, torment and pain.

All through life those of us who are prudent strive for a competency to tide over the evening of our days, and it is well that we do, but that only cares for our corporealities. It only makes such provision as a state hospital or a county poorhouse may make for us if we fail of making provision for ourselves. The well ordered life, the life that is worth the living, requires more than food and raiment and a place to sleep. It requires a chance to live, and live abundantly, even through the twilight zone. What provision is the reader making for that? If nothing else has been done for heaven's sake learn how to play croquet or dominoes.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

A Blow for Our Art Connoisseurs

Lord Clanricarde, who is recognized as high authority in matters of art, in a recently published interview asserts that two-thirds of the "genuine old masters" in America are fakes. This is a heavy blow for all of that considerable class of American connoisseurs who entertain no doubt that a picture or statue is the highest of high art if it was purchased for the highest of high prices. "It cost fifty thousand dollars!" these critics say, "ah, what a glory of art it certainly is!" A cruel blow, but Lord Clanricarde added to the crushing force of it by the following language concerning J. Pierpont Morgan, our own art-adorer: "Mr. Morgan had more fancy for art than taste when he began collecting. He was a babe lost in the woods. He has now a number of good things, but also a great many very bad ones." Our own J. Pierpont "a babe lost in the woods" of art! Perish the thought, and the hook for the traducer! Why, Mr. Morgan has the money to pay anything he pleases for a work of art, and if that does not prove that he is a connoisseur of rarest fineness of perception— But why suggest such a thing? There can be no doubt of it. Is it not generally conceded in America that the superiority of a work of art increases in exact proportion to its cost? And nothing should be permitted to interfere with this popular and sacred belief. Let the Clanricarde rage, we will not be discomfited. Mr. Morgan has the coin to buy any picture or statue he pleases; it follows that he is an art critic of rarest perception.

A Chinese Industrial Exposition

Charley Ah Sing still adorns his head with a cue deftly woven of human hair, horse hair and silk, and the cambric trousers and malformed feet of Mamie Ah Sing yet are displayed in public places, but, although these things belong to China's two thousand years of sleep, it must not be believed that the Flowery Kingdom is showing no indications of a disposition to rub its eyes open and "take notice." Many, indeed, are such indications, and some of them are most significant; but here is one which, perhaps, is as striking as any: At Nanking, on May 9, will be opened a national industrial exposition which will continue during six months. Does this not sound like the modern way of doing things in the modern world? Presumably this is the first time in all of China's drowsy aeons in which such an exposition has been held, but it is to be an event of twentieth century dimensions. It will cost $700,000, which is a good deal of money in China; the grounds will cover 150 acres, 22 Chinese provinces will be represented in the exhibition, and 5,000 square feet each have been allotted to American, British, German and Japanese exhibits. In short, China is to show what China does in an industrial way and to compare it with those things which other nations do, and the enterprise will be worth the seeing. The Mongolian kingdom really is waking from a slumber compared with which the hundred-years' sleep of the princess in the fairy tale was a mere nap, and when it once thoroughly is aroused, and standing side by side with Japan, then, perhaps, the problem of White versus Yellow will be on in deadly earnest.

Something About the "Hello Girl"

Not long ago the federal bureau of labor submitted to the United States senate a report dealing with its investigation of conditions prevailing in telephone exchanges throughout this country. The investigation was not absolutely complete, but as it related to 26 companies doing business in 27 states it may be considered fairly typical. These companies employed 17,210 girls at their switchboards, and their educational qualification in general was embodied in insistence that they must have passed the sixth or seventh grade in a grammar school. This should make it fairly clear why, in the good old days when the telephone girls answered back more than they now do, the grammar of the pleasing young person at the other end of the line so frequently contained such surprising expressions as "they was" and "I ain't saw." But if "Central" is not overeducated, neither is she overpaid. The report shows that her wage runs from its high tide of $36.96 a month in New York City to its low tide of $22.40 in Nashville, Tennessee, an average of about $30 a month or a dollar a day. So it is evident that if "Central" wears diamonds it must be on something other than her salary. In truth, it might be said that these telephone girls are victims of wage slavery were it not that there are many other instances of such slavery compared with which theirs seems trivial.

Why Not Import African Wild Animals?

Major Frederic R. Burnham, the well-known traveler, suggests the importation of African game animals to inhabit the desert or semi-desert parts of the United States and Mexico, and he makes the following claim for them in an article published in the Independent: "Most of the desirable African animals would multiply where our own domestic animals cannot live. Vast tracts of our lonely deserts could be teeming with life; interesting, harmless, useful for food and leather, displacing not a single head of our cattle, and offering a grand hunting ground." He mentions as comparatively peaceful animals which would thrive in our desert places, the bush-buck, a species of deer; the oribi, of the gazelle family; the gemsbok or oryx, a deer of considerable size; the sesipe, the swiftest of all antelope; the springbok, also of the antelope family; the giraffe, the eland, the zebra, and numbers of birds. All of these animals, Major Burnham asserts, would do well on our desert lands, and would be valuable not only as game but for leather and other purposes. His suggestion appears to be worthy of the consideration of sportsmen, if none other.

Some Suggestive Figures

Various eastern railroads recently united in issuing a pamphlet intended to show why these railroads could not afford to pay an increase of wages to their employees. Its argument is long and sometimes complicated, but, in an effort to demonstrate that railroad employees are particularly fortunate in the compensation they receive, the pamphlet presents some figures which are entitled to serious consideration. In the first place, it asserts that the average railway employee's salary is $641 a year. It may safely be taken for granted that these figures do not err on the side of underestimation, and it is not improbable that a considerable difference might be made in them by the subtraction of a few $10,000, $25,000 or $50,000 salaries; but, letting these suggestions pass, it should remain quite evident that, while present prices are maintained, men with families must know much of the "pinch of poverty" on salaries of $53.42 a month. The pamphlet then proceeds to show by comparison how fortunate are the railway employees, giving the yearly salaries paid other workmen as follows: On machines and machinery, $613.12; metals and metallic goods, $569.39; boots and shoes, $564.30; leather, $520.32; paper, $497.22; woolen goods, $463.95; carpeting, $457.69; cotton goods, $442.32; "seventy other industries," $378.83. Here, then, are ten classifications of pay, running from $53.42 a month for railroad men to $31.57 a month for seventy unnamed industries, the general average being $42.90 a month. Now, regardless of what the railroads may have proved in their own behalf, is anything more than the figures they present needed to demonstrate that the workmen whom they call as witnesses are underpaid? With edibles higher than they ever were before, and with clothing and other necessities of life running them an even race, what show has a man to live comfortably on either $53.42 or $31.57 a month, especially if he has a family on his hands, as a man should have? The eastern railroads' pamphlet "doth protest too much" and prove too much.

The Slaughter of the Animals.

An unreasoning blood-lust has been upon many Americans, and they have hunted and killed until many species of our wild animals either are extinct or are rapidly passing. Witness the following: Less than a hundred of the bison that once dotted our great central plains now remain, all but a mere handful of our elk have been shot out of existence, of the hundreds of thousands of antelope that were here but a few years ago it is estimated that scarcely 5,000 remain, the bighorn mountain-sheep is almost extinct, and the mountain goat is rapidly passing that way.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES.

OF AN AUTHOR TAKING SIDES.

M. Taine, the French critic, objects to a great deal of English literature—most of it since Shakespeare, in fact—because the authors were so much more intent upon pointing a moral than upon adorning a tale. He makes his point, for undoubtedly Milton and Pope and Addison and Carlyle and Dickens and Thackeray were all moralists who used literature as a sword for hewing at the unrighteousness of society. Equally beyond doubt is it that Shakespeare looked upon the world much more as a passing show, to be enjoyed or commiserated but not to be regenerated.

And the modern French ideal of fiction is that in which the author attempts consciously to assume that state of mind that Shakespeare involuntarily enjoyed, to be a spectator of the drama, selecting from it the significant characters and scenes and reproducing them because they are typical of current truth and not because they illustrate any moral principle. Balzac reached such an altitude. But he reached it solely with his head; his heart was never affected, as Shakespeare's was, so that it vibrated to every breath of emotion that blew across its strings. Balzac deliberately suppressed his emotion to give his intelligence greater sweep, and his novels show it by their sustained interest and power and by the absence of joy from them. No analyst knows the human soul better as a part of the mechanism of life; any school boy knows it better as a personal experience of life.

This, then, is the deficiency of the kind of literature for which M. Taine pleaded—pleaded in France, at least, for he found much to admire in English authors for their passionate intentness upon their subjects. He yielded, as the English races always have, to the emotional power of books that were designed to play upon the emotions rather than upon the intellect, that were written with an eye to moving masses of men in a certain direction rather than to delighting individual students in their libraries.

For this work of regenerating society the English authors have chosen characters that amount practically to personifications of the virtues and the vices. These personifications are placed in the stratum of society whose regeneration is desired, and their ups and downs illustrate the glory of the shining model and the fate of the horrible example.

And, for the purpose of driving deeper the moral lesson, the authors take sides with the good characters against the bad characters. They employ the resources of their literary skill to make admirable the shining model; they tax the limits of their vocabulary to make dark and abominable the horrible example. Considered calmly, it is sometimes unpleasant to see Dickens and Thackeray turn aside from the main stream of their narrative in order that they may chase some hapless villain of their own creation round and round an eddy of abuse, pricking him with opprobrious epithets and throwing black slime of words over him to make him more hideous and more inharmonious when he re-emerges into the pure company of the other characters in mid-stream. In all fairness it does seem only justice that they should let the poor devil's own words and actions damn him, without hurling billingsgate at him for good measure.

But, as Taine admits, what is lost to art and good humor is added to intensity and effect. Dickens invented Scrooge that we should hate his kind, and he succeeds in making us hate. Shakespeare depicted Shylock, as bad a man as Scrooge, but who hates Shylock? Do we not rather pity the man that he is so unfortunate as not to know the joys of a generous nature?

Thackeray invented Becky Sharp to make us hate feminine chicanery and faithlessness, and he nearly succeeds in making us hate her—not quite—for Rawdon's sake. Shakespeare depicted Cleopatra, as bad and as faithless as Becky, but who does not admire Cleopatra?

So the question of an author taking sides with his character comes back to an essential difference between two kinds of writing: Do you want art, and so much emotion as Nature gives to most of us, and life reflected in justness of relative values? Or do you want a sermon in the guise of fiction, so emotional as to drive you to a certain course of action, and life so much distorted as is necessary to develop that emotion?

If you wish for the former, Shakespeare is your man. He will show you all manners of men and women, all passions, all hopes, all conflicts of emotions. But he will not judge. He will not urge you to judge.

If you wish for the latter, any writer, almost, after Shakespeare, will do. These will show you mimic scenes, tremendous emotions out of focus, results of evil out of perspective with life, results of virtue too good to be true.

SOME MAGAZINE CHANGES

We learn from private sources that a noteworthy change in the relative prosperity of various New York magazines has taken place in the last two years. For instance, McClure's Magazine, since the departure of the staff members who now edit the American—Miss Tarbell, Lincoln Steffens, and Ray Stannard Baker—has declined gradually in circulation and advertising patronage. The American Magazine, on the contrary, under its present management, has leaped from 100,000 circulation to 325,000, and today carries more advertising than McClure's, which claims 400,000 circulation.

Everybody's Magazine has never regained the huge circulation it enjoyed during the run of Lawson's "Frenzied Finance" articles, when the copies issued ran as high as 700,000 a month. Everybody's now has about 500,000 circulation, which it holds.

Munsey's Magazine, though it improved the quality of the magazine article when it started, and quickly achieved 400,000 circulation, does not continue to grow, and remains about stationary at that figure. It, in turn, is being outgrown by others more in the spirit of the day.

The bulk of the great increases in circulation amongst periodicals has gone to the weeklies, notably The Saturday Evening Post and Collier's.

SUNRISE SKIES ABLAZE WITH GLORY

Wilson Ralph Ellis

Sunrise skies ablaze with glory!
Rosy dreams of valiant youth!
All thy phantom glories vanish,
While the Ages flame with Truth

Pearls that caves of ocean treasure!
Starry gems that deck the night!
Priceless jewels cluster only
In the royal crown of Right.

Softly, minstrel mountain breezes,
'Wake the pines upon the peaks!
Sweeter strains are floating starward
When approving Conscience speaks.

Sprite of beauty art thou, lily!
Breath of fragrance art thou, rose!
Yet the babe's untaught affection
Is the fairest bloom that blows.

Sleep, ye linnet's downy fledgling,
Cradled in thy leaf-hid nest.
Sweeter peace beyond thy sensing
Keeps the heart that trusts the best.

Tides and winds! Ye drifting vagrants!
Lightning's crash and lurid strife!
Nicer than the beams that weigh thee,
Law supernal weighs each life.

Vaunted greatness of the Empire!
Pomp of power and boast of blood!
Hark ye! There's no earthly greatness
Save in simply doing good.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF
"Baron Munchausen"

We have spoken before of the comic relief and the vagrant mood in one's choice of books. We interrupt our series again, here, with this idea in mind. If "a little nonsense now and then" hurts no one, where better shall we look for it?

And yet the Baron is immortal. He is the apotheosis of a type, with hardly more than one rival in literature though with—heaven only knows how many—myriads of them in real life. Tartarin of Tarascon is, beside him, a timid and overnice liar; he lacks the abandon and superb callousness to incredulity which make Munchausen so inspiring. We know that Tartarin, trapped, would shrivel into a pitiable wreck; Munchausen, questioned, being born of a hardier age, would crush our impudence with a more prodigious fabrication.

And, in a sense, the Baron is more than a braggart and a liar: he is something, too, of a man and a poet. He has seen the things that loom enormous to all of us at moments of distorted vision, and declared them real, and stuck his stories out for truth. He has taken the things that stir the imaginations of poets, and, where they refine and idealize, he grossly takes the symbol literally and sprawls it out on the page for fact.

But these considerations do not enter into our enjoyment of him. We enjoy him as children, grown but unforgetting. Also, we enjoy him as men grown, for the sheer audacity of his dazzling mendacity and for the grotesque topsy-turvydom he creates for us. And, after all, we feel that Munchausen really was a good fellow, who would grace a camp-fire circle now to our very great delight.

WILL IRWIN HOME

Will Irwin needs no introduction to Californians. Though he was born in Onondaga, New York, and graduated from High School in Denver, California is home to him. Ever since he left Stanford, eleven years ago, he has been intimately associated with the San Francisco literary atmosphere. He was assistant editor of the Wave under Jack O'Hara Cosgrave, who is now the editor of Everybody's Magazine. He then succeeded Cosgrave as editor of the Wave, and from that became a reporter and special writer for the San Francisco papers. On the Wave he received the literary impulse from the same source that inspired Frank Norris, Gelett Burgess and many other well-known western writers.

For two years Irwin was Sunday editor of the San Francisco Chronicle. From this he jumped to New York, where he won instant recognition as a reporter and became the star man on the Sun. The "story" of San Francisco which he wrote for the Sun after the earthquake, under the title of "The City That Was," is a classic in the craft. In 1906-7 Irwin was the managing editor of McClure's. For the last three years he has been staff writer for Collier's Weekly.

He is West now, home again in San Francisco, home even though his stay is but for a few weeks. He is preparing a series of articles for Collier's on "The American Newspaper." It is not a muck-raking story, but an attempt to analyze the actual moral and intellectual status of the newspapers of America, the reasons for the changes in newspaper style that are now obviously taking place, and the relation of the business office and the advertisers to the editorial policy of newspapers.

Personally, Irwin has more to commend him to the public than his keen intelligence and his reportorial skill: he is wholly unspoiled by success, a frank overgrown-boy type of man, who is full of the vitality of youth and the joy of living. The spectacles and the quizzical, humorous wrinkles at the corner of the eyes, that show in his photographs, are present in the flesh, and, what the photographs do not show, a broad smile of good humor usually lightens his face. He is a pleasant man to meet.

HOMES FOR HOMELESS CHILDREN

Second Article: THE CHILDREN'S HOME SOCIETY OF CALIFORNIA

By H. W. LEWIS, State Superintendent

I have sought permission to present to the readers of The California Weekly some account of the work of the Children's Home Society of California, for the reason that the particular thing which that society is prepared to do and has been doing for the past eighteen years is one of the most encouraging, the most helpful, the most economical undertakings in the whole great round of charity and reform.

To rescue little children from poverty, exposure, abuse and immoral surroundings and place them in asylums, is itself a great work; but to add to their rescue the blessings of home, of father and mother, to secure their legal adoption into families where there is peace and plenty, and orderly and righteous living, to settle all their relations to the home, the school, the church, the village or the neighborhood in natural and harmonious lines, is the greatest social work yet undertaken. It is, moreover, a work which has received too little attention. The need for care of homeless children is apparently very great in California, and it has been met by a great system of orphan asylums supported in part by the State and often richly endowed by private benevolence.

Too Many Orphan Asylums

It has long been believed by students of the subject that there is an enormous overgrowth of asylum care of children in this State, and it has been freely asserted that the asylum system, as it operates here, tends to foster and increase the very thing it is supposed to relieve. Certainly the assumption that this is true furnishes the only reasonable explanation of the fact that California has a proportion of dependent children ten times as great as has Illinois and thirty-three times as great as has Michigan. There are no climatic or industrial or sociological or political conditions other than those which are related to the asylum system which can account for the enormous disproportion of homeless children in this State.

It is therefore peculiarly appropriate that a society which stands primarily for home life for dependent children, and which devotes all its energies and resources to the work of securing approved family homes for them, should be given widespread public approval and support; for every homeless child provided with the right kind of foster parents at once ceases to be dependent and is absorbed into the general body of the population. But of greater consequence than this economic gain is the good effect of those comforting and uplifting relations, found only in the family, which are the natural right of every child; and without which all attempted preparations for the duties and responsibilities of home makers must be futile.

Home Training Essential

We believe that domestic and civic virtues decay in proportion to the decadence of the right kind of home and family life; and that a system of charity which deprives thousands of children of their right to a father's protection and teaching and a mother's loving and compelling influence is a mistaken and injurious system.

There are about seven thousand children in orphan asylums in this state. Not one in fifteen of them is a full orphan.

Their care costs the people of the State in public and private charity not much short of a million dollars per year.

It is a perfectly safe guess that one-half of this goes for the support of those whose parents might care for and support their own, and should be compelled to do so.

Beginning eighteen years ago, the Children's Home Society has ever since been at work demonstrating its theory that acceptable homes and foster parents can be found for children.

Large Number of Children Placed

Up to February 25, 1910, one thousand three hundred and thirty-one children have been received by this society and slightly more than eleven hundred of them have been successfully located in family homes.

The work of the society has gradually grown, and during the twelve months ending December 31, 1909, two hundred and six children were received and one hundred and ninety-three were successfully placed. This is exclusive of all returns and replacements.

During the same period, four hundred and six formal applications for children were filed with the society, and some hundreds of other inquiries were received which did not develop into formal applications, for the reason that there was no prospect of securing children of the age and description wanted.

Eagerness to Adopt Children

The demand for both boys and girls from one to seven years of age has been far greater than the supply, and one of the saddest necessities pertaining to the whole work has been the turning away unsupplied of the hundreds of splendid men and women who have come longing to take children into their homes as objects of affection. One can well understand their refusal to take those over seven or eight years of age, for it is altogether reasonable that those who wish to take children as their own sons and daughters should be reluctant to begin the training of a child in the middle of the habit-forming period, and when the tendency toward fixedness of character is already far advanced.

No home is approved until after it has been thoroughly investigated, and the abundance of homes offered has enabled the society to demand a high standard of excellence in those which it has accepted.

State Districts of the Work

For the purposes of the society, the State is divided into seven districts, each under care of a district superintendent whose sole time is devoted to the work of the reception, placing and supervision of children and the collection of money for the support of the society. They co-operate with the juvenile courts, the churches and the local charities everywhere, but the two things which make up the burden of their responsibilities are the investigation of the homes offered for children in their districts and the proper supervision of the children whom they have placed out.

This society entertains no delusions about this home finding method for the cure of child dependency. It knows full well that to sit still and accept only such homes as want children as servants would be to violate every precept of scientific charity and sell children into slavery. But it knows equally well that by the exercise of care, skill and industry, it can provide more than two hundred children per year with permanent family homes, can give proper supervision of all children which it has placed out, can correct its own mistakes before they have grown great, and can fill many a lonely home with the joy and new interest in life which come with the advent of a child.

Economy of Plan

If the society had now on hand the two hundred and six children which it received during the year 1909, and proposed to treat them according to the asylum system, it would need for their support during the ensuing year an investment of not less than one hundred thousand dollars in lands and buildings and a current income of not less than thirty-seven thousand dollars.

Its actual investment at its office and receiving and distributing center is twelve thousand dollars, and its current expenses during the time it was occupied in removing these two hundred and six children from the ranks of the dependent were almost exactly half what it would have cost to have maintained them in an asylum for one year.

Tested by Results

But there is one question which in importance overshadows all others. It is this:

What is the result of this system of child care?

It would be easy to prove it good by the citation of instances in which it has attained notable successes in the lives of young men and women brought up under it. There are not wanting those who would condemn it by similar evidence of its failures. What we need is a larger body of evidence, a broader outlook, authentic history, and the judgment of experience in other states.

The New York Children's Aid Society follows this plan: Its income, mainly given spontaneously by the people of New York, is from year to year about three-quarters of a million dollars. It has recently received notice of a single anonymous gift of four hundred and twenty-two thousand dollars. That shows what the people of New York think of the placing-out system. It has been the official system of the State of Michigan for thirty-five years; and Michigan, with a population about the same as that of California, spends about one-tenth as much for the support of delinquent children. Six thousand five hundred children have been placed out under the supervision of that State, and ninety-two per cent of them have done well.

Home Societies Growing in Favor

Children's Home Societies are organized in twenty-eight states. They have placed over thirty thousand children. They have been given endowments running far up among the hundreds of thousands. They are everywhere growing and increasing in usefulness and public favor.

The California Society has completed an inquiry by mail as to the present condition and progress of all the children placed out under its supervision prior to the year 1900. The replies present an absolutely unbroken record of success.

Its agents visited last year all those residing with foster parents and not yet adopted. Of over four hundred visited, one-fourth of one per cent were withdrawn from the homes selected for them for some dissatisfaction with the home.

Children Well Treated

The state and district superintendents of the society are unanimous in the belief that no other group of children of like numbers and ages could be selected at random from among the school children of the state whose average home life would be better, or whose prospects for honor and usefulness would be brighter than those of these once homeless boys and girls.

This society has tendered to the State Board of Charities the fullest access to all its records and a list of the names and addresses of all the persons in the State in whose homes its children are residing. It is confident of the high quality of its work and it believes in the good sense, ability and fairness of the State Board of Charities, and that that Board is the proper medium through which the people of the State might learn more than they now know about this great question of the best method of care of our dependent children.

The officers of the society are: Julius A. Brown, President; Col. J. W. Eddy, Dr. F. B. Kellogg, Vice-Presidents; T. M. Stewart, Attorney; G. F. Whitty, Secretary; James H. Woods, Treasurer.

The State Board of Directors consists of the following: Julius A. Brown, Chairman; J. W. Eddy, F. B. Kellogg, James H. Woods, T. M. Stewart, Z. L. Parmelee, Executive Committee; and Rev. I. N. McCash, Hon. Albert E. Merrill, Fairfax H. Wheelan.

The Superintendents are: Herbert W. Lewis, State Superintendent; Rev. A. H. Gunnnett, Santa Barbara district; J. Waldo Ellis, Riverside district; J. M. Tension, Northern district; Rev. N. F. Hoffpauir, Fresno district.

The general office and receiving home of the society is 2414 Griffith Avenue, Los Angeles.

John Luther Long, who wrote the novel from which Puccini's beautiful opera, "Madam Butterfly," was adapted, is a Philadelphia lawyer. He has an unusual gift for choosing alluring book titles, his other novels being "Miss Cherry Blossom of Tokyo," "The Fox Woman," "The Prince of Illusion," "Naughty Nan," "Heinrich," "Billy Boy," and "The Way of the Gods."

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE.

The One Great Creed

When all of our man-made creeds are past,
As shadows that dance and flee;
When, into the gulf of oblivion cast,
Man is of their chains set free;
When dogma and doctrine and ism and cult
Are myths of a long-dead day,
What matter though faith in such wreckage result,
Since liveth, and liveth always,

The one great creed,
And the one white creed,
The creed of the hosts above;
Though the worlds decay,
It shall live for aye,
And 'tis writ in the one word, "Love."

We stand in the darkness and stoutly cry,
"With me in the mists is God,
And I know His thought, and His seer am I,
And thus is His pathway trod."
Then our brother cries, "Not so, not so!
For mine is the God of might."
O, foolish ones who do little know!
O, folk of the purblind sight!

But the one great creed,
And the one white creed,
It liveth for great and small;
Though our dogmas pass
Like the mist on glass,
Its "Love" is the all in all.

More Infernal Cryptograms

(Prefatory Note—The following first appeared in the want-ad. columns of the Daily Extinguisher. Mr. Solon Lycurgus Doolittle, the eminent criminologist of Squaw Flat, at once detected their felonious and incendiary nature. Bringing his gigantic intellect fully to bear upon them, and reading only the first letters of the words, their damnable meaning at once was revealed to him. At present he refuses to disclose what he discovered in all its foul atrocity, but there is no knowing what he will do later. When will these malicious conspirators cease to conspire? When will these cryptogramic attacks on society terminate? When will the moral felon no longer leave his slimy trail in the want-ad. columns at twenty cents a line? When—I find that we have run out of "whens," and so the Extinguisher's cryptograms are submitted without further comment. They follow.)

Nov. 31—Firm in conviction known enemies rather tired—every legal effort crushed through enough dollars—zealous interests protected by our own money, all happy—People. Cattle.

February 29—Ride enemy laws yeomanly—omit nothing—Find I can knock every reform technically—here ends sorrow—prison escaped and calaboose humiliated—Straps and franchise ever!—Have everybody now enduring yoke—graft our noblest endeavor—Pious Capitalist.

February 30—Splendid lawyers, and nothing doing except rubbish—loot and wealth luminate our record.—Tell our orphans:—honesty only never earns striking treasure—Haven in technicality—treat Hiram as traitor—kindly indorse nothing decent—am safe—under surveillance, usually almighty loose.—Paid. Cash.

It is hoped and believed that Mr. Doolittle eventually will give to an anxious public his secret relating to reading only the first letters of the words, but at present he refuses to do so. Enough is enough, however, and sometimes it is too much. Let the public, then, the citizenry of this cryptogramic era, arrive at its own conclusions, merely rising with deep anxiety to inquire, When—but I forgot that we had run out of "whens."

Boost, but boost the thing that's right;
Knock, but knock the thing that's wrong.

The Opinions of Rufus

One difference 'tween human bein's an' hogs is that the porkers never unite in honorin' the one that butts in an' gits 'bout all there is in the trough.

It's true, Hiram, that this is a age of wonderful achievements, es you remarked, an' we consekently have a right to swell 'round an' brag 'bout it. By the way, which one of the achievements did you give to the world?

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast." Did you ever know a afflicted grass widow that wan't willin' to take another chance?

Here's a painful difference I've noticed: The good book says, "Knock, and it shall be opened unto you," but generly you don't have to knock to git into the devil's places of entertainment.

Zabe Boggs says he's heered that John D. Rockefeller's biography 'll be published in a book called, It Can Be Did, or, A Camel Easy Can Go Through the Eye of a Needle if It's Well Oiled. (See S. O. Agents.)

The motto, "God Bless Our Home," looks nice in some houses, but I've seen it where it seemed like askin' too much of the Almighty.

Keep speakin' kind words; one or two ain't enough. Would a feather or two make a comfortable feather-bed?

It's said that right wrongs no man, but it's understood that the political "organization" in this state don't want to take any chances on it.

I hope the news that Charles F. Curry is runnin' fer governor 'll be broke to the "machine" gently. It ought to be spared es much of the pain an' shock es possible.

Don't kick the yellow dog too hard. Sometimes it turns out that he's the one that saves the sheep.

I don't b'lieve any girl can play a pianner sweet 'nough to offset a tune played by her mother on a washboard in the kitchen.

When Uncle Ezry Was Immersed

When Uncle Ezry was immersed, he'd shockin' wicked been,
An' the preacher says, "A river won't no more than cleanse his sin,"

An' the month it was October, in Wisconsin, if you please,

When the little strayin' zephyrs softly whisper, "Dern you, freeze!"

Then the preacher led my uncle in the water to his neck,

Softly chatterin', "Bub-bub-brother, do you heh-heh-hell reject?"

But my uncle hesitated; shiverin', he says, "Great Scott!"

Ain't I he-he-heered that sheol is a pup-pup-place that's hot?"

"Bub-bub-brother," says the preacher, "ragin' fuf-fuf-flames are there,

And the heat vi-bub-bub-brations pup-pup-permeate the air,"

And the heated fuf-fuf-furnace—" Says my uncle, "Let me go!"

Ruther chance a ro-ro-roastin' than fuf-freezin' here below.

Git the ice-tongs. I'm cuh-comin'." "Hold him!" yells the preacher then,

"Ho-ho-hold him! He's sus-slidin' to his sih-sih-sins again."

"No, I ain't," my uncle shouted as he landed on the shore.

"But I'm seekin' a cuk-country that is he-he-heated more."

I have told this simple story with a pain I can't conceal.

For the family's saddened by it an' they've been disgraced they feel,

An' the moral is misleadin', for the fact it can't be hid

That the preacher got pneumony, but my uncle never did;

And the people of the Corners, bein' shocked by uncle's deed,

Held a public mass convention, an' they then an' there agreed,

For the safety of the public, which the Corners always seek,

That they'd disinfect the river—an' they did the same that week.

What the Little Row Doesn't Prove

You are sound in what you say, Elnathan: It is regrettable that the women of the Bay Federation of Mothers' Clubs differed in opinion and expressed that difference with noticeable volubility; finally, indeed, agreeing to disagree, or disagreeing to agree, or something of the sort. As you also remarked, this is proof irrefutable that women never, never, never should be permitted to vote. Far better to tax them without representation, for they are physically weak and can do nothing about it. We men look with scorn on such conduct, we cannot approve of it, we consider it undignified and unworthy, we would not be thus guilty, we—

Hold on, Elnathan! Do you remember a certain convention in Stockton years ago? It was a convention of men, and compared with it, the women's recent powwow was a love feast, a festival of peace, a paradise of tranquil delight. Do you remember, and can you still smell, the Santa Cruz convention of 1906? Men composed the membership of that convention—not a woman in it—and compared with that convention, hades would—no, I will not say that, but I don't know which would smell the stronger of brimstone. And these were men! That is, they looked like men, but they acted like the—we do not speak the word now in polite society.

Come to think about it, Elnathan, let's back down. Let's do it as gracefully as possible, but let's do it, anyway. Women may become over-excited at times, but never yet did they make of any convention so much of Beelzebub's own as men too frequently have done. No, a deplorable convention row does not prove that women are unfit to vote; not unless we also admit that men largely should be disfranchised, and in a government of, by and for the people somebody must vote, you know.

Roosevelt's Unfumigated Admirers

"I am sorry," said the Thoughtful Man, "that Curry and Anderson got the start of us." "Got the start of you in what respect?" I asked.

"The start of us in tossing a beautiful verbal bouquet at Theodore Roosevelt, announcing their admiration of his character and their determination to out-Roosevelt himself if given a half of a chance. Sir, the time has arrived when there are none so poor, and few so rich, that they do not do Mr. Roosevelt reverence. 'Here's to Theodore Roosevelt, damn him!' is a popular toast in the Highest Circles."

"Recognizing this fact, a limited but select number of us have organized the Unfumigated Association of Roosevelt-Admirers. Of course, Curry and Anderson are charter members, but other great and good men who cannot restrain their enthusiastic regard for Teddy also belong. A few names will convince you: Patrick Calhoun, W. F. Herrin, P. H. McCarthy (he joined on condition that the association should be Parisian in its style), Abraham Ruef, Eugene E. Schmitz—oh, they all are good men, and the public safely may leave the continuance of the Roosevelt policies to them. Is it not wonderful to realize that such men are Theodore's earnest supporters? Where is such another instance recorded in history?"

"I don't know," said I, "but don't you remember that Judas Iscariot was one of the twelve disciples?"

"Go Up Higher"

It is not too late, I trust, for congratulations to Adna A. Denison, who has been elected secretary of the Oakland Chamber of Commerce. For more than a quarter of a century he has been in the editorial harness, plodding with the rest of us on the newspaper treadmill, and if that does not entitle a man to a change, and a promotion as well, I know of nothing that would, unless it were more years on that treadmill, and from that may a pitying heaven preserve most men. Denison will have a change, the Oakland Chamber of Commerce will have a capable and faithful secretary, and so all is as it should be.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor California Weekly:

Dear Sir: You will find inclosed 10 cents in stamps, due you from me for copy of graft report. You can also send me Hichborn's Story in book form.

Well, sir, your report of committee on municipal graft is all O. K., but I don't see in your report that it has done any good, as far as I can read. Had any one of the grafters been sent "over the road?" I did read where one man killed himself in jail, but outside of that I failed to read where any of the others have been found guilty and sent to the penitentiary. But I did read about the voters of San Francisco beating Mr. Heney at the polls. Well, that is the way of the world. A man tries to be square to the people, by acting square, and walking on the square, but they throw him down just the same.

Heney, in my estimation, is a grand man, and the people of Frisco are an ungrateful set. Still, I am glad to note from the tone of your letter that there are a few left in Frisco who have not sold out body and soul to the greedy grafters.

Well, sir, as long as you and I vote for men on the judges' benches who do not hesitate in sending a man or woman to the penitentiary for stealing a loaf of bread or a sack of coal, and holding up their hands in horror whenever a rich grafter comes before them and the people ask for his conviction, or a man who has looted a bank, robbing all the poor depositors out of their hard-earned savings, of years of toil (all I can say is damn such courts). No wonder there are so many anarchists in this land of the free.

I was born in the City of Brotherly Love, and when I read the doings going on in that city (read The Man of the Hour), I feel like taking the Liberty bell and throwing it in the Delaware river. This city just passed through a traction fight of which I can not say too much on paper, for the people won out. Now there is another one coming up, another franchise being asked.

Well, sir, I presume you are heartily sick of this kind of a letter, but these are my sentiments to a T.

Remaining yours,

C. O'BRIEN,

Chief of Fire Department.

Shreveport, La., March 2, 1910.

We beg to assure our interested Louisiana friend that, so far as the trial court is concerned, the spirit of justice had no cause of complaint in the graft trials of San Francisco. The appellate courts were, however, more questionable in their attitude. And there is no gainsaying that the results of the effort made to bring rich malefactors to justice are at least partially disappointing. The opposition proved its ability to crush justice where it can command money enough to do it, and, worse than this, to confuse if not corrupt the minds and hearts of the people themselves. But let not our friend fancy that because none of the great malefactors are behind prison bars therefore none of them have been punished. On the contrary, all of them would give half they are worth for their reinstatement in the good opinions of men whose good opinion is worth possessing; but, no matter how long they may live, that will never come to one of them, no, not one. As they go along the street people will nudge their companions and say, "That's one of 'em," and that undeniable notoriety will follow them until the earth closes over them, and they will know that it is following them, and it will be a burden almost too heavy to be borne. No, the effort to vindicate the law has not failed. For long years it will make men who have reputations to lose cautious about dealing corruptly with misrepresentatives of the people.

Editors California Weekly:

Gentlemen: We are to have a Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League meeting next week and I want to call the attention of our people to The California Weekly. It is meeting a long-felt want and deserves to be boosted by all the friends of good government. Send me a lot of sample copies for distribution.

Very truly yours,

W. A. SLOANE.

This is the sort of work that the California Weekly wants done everywhere, for the good of the cause as well as for the good of the paper itself. While The California Weekly is not an "organ" of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, or any other organization, it is doing the work that the League, and many another organization making for better conditions, is doing, and wants a chance to help. It can help just in proportion to the number of readers it can reach. Our thanks to Judge Sloane for the interest he has taken, and we commend his example to others who feel like lending a hand but do not know exactly how. It is simple enough. Just hammer The California Weekly into people's minds until they know all about it.

Editor California Weekly:

I have just read the editorial in Weekly on "Good Impulses," and here are $2 for another year's subscription. My daily is costing me only $3, but guess I will "cut it out" and give more time to your paper. I believe The California Weekly is as clean a paper—perhaps the cleanest—printed in California.

Your friend,

W. C. HOWARD,
Pastor M. E. Church.

Brentwood, Cal., March 5, 1910.

We are not purists in any finical sense, but we do not intend to have anything appear in the columns of The California Weekly that a thirteen year old school girl may not read without harm. It is a paper for the home, a paper to stimulate thought, to inspire action in the hope of making things better than they are, and yet it is not without ambition merely to entertain, and to entertain is not so very "mere" after all. It has been found worthy of the highest praise and the most painstaking art. Nevertheless, Making Things Better Than They Are must rank first. The Staff of this paper is not ready to concede that no paper can be made to succeed that does not make entertainment its primary purpose, resting content if, as an incident to amusing, a good thought or a sound fact may be surreptitiously introduced into the minds of readers "unbeknownst." If we are to have robust thinking and acting we must have a robust journalism, a journalism that no more mistakes sensation for strength in expression than rant is to be mistaken for power on the stage. Nor is Mr. Howard the only person who turns from his daily to The California Weekly with a grateful sense of relief.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN.

Impossible For A Convention

How completely the direct primary law has revolutionized political procedures will not be realized until the morning after the August primary election has been held. As all who have attended conventions know, a convention affords no opportunity for an office to hunt a man. It is a place to which men come who are hunting offices. Now the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has been devoting weeks to hunting the right men for public offices and will probably expend other weeks in the same endeavor before a complete ticket will be offered to Republican voters. It is not that men can not be had in abundance, or that there are not men anxious for the League's endorsement, for there are, but it is to find the right man for the place, and the right man must come from the right place, too. It will not do to have a ticket made up wholly of men from about the bay district, or preponderingly from Southern California. The ticket must not only be composed of the right men, but it must be a balanced ticket, a ticket representative of the Republicanism of the state. Heretofore the political bureau of the Southern Pacific Company has done all this preparatory work through the machinery of the party control and, when the convention came to be held, it made very few changes in the slate that was made up. Its business was mainly to ratify what the executive committee of the Republican state committee had done. It will be a good deal so now with every ticket submitted to the party voters except that, so far as the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League candidate is concerned, the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau will have no hand in making that up. And there is another important difference between the convention and the primary plan. Instead of putting any slate through under the party whip, and under the stress and enthusiasm of an audience of several hundred men, all more or less under excitement, every slate made will have to be handed out to the voters to look over for months, to talk over with their friends, to think over in their quiet hours, to pray over in their closets, beyond the crack of any whip or power to prod with any picked stick. The work that the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League is doing is indispensable within itself and impossible in a convention.

Florence J. O'Brien, Secretary of State

Take the case of Florence J. O'Brien, endorsed by the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League for Secretary of State. A week before he received that endorsement he had no more idea of being a candidate for a state office than of being minister plenipotentiary to the court of Bangkok, but to make the state ticket well balanced it was needful to have a candidate from north central California, and so the straight-up and straight-out men of that valley were looked over, unknown to themselves, for the right kind of man, and Mr. O'Brien was selected. Could any convention have performed such a service? Mr. O'Brien is a blue-bellied Irish Yankee, with all the good qualities of a Celtic ancestry and a New England education and early environment. Among his strong points he has a sound understanding, a robust will and a New England conscience. He is well educated, clean, home-loving and liberty-loving. This candidacy strikes him at a bad time for himself. He knows that. He has been an advertising man, for two terms president of the Pacific Coast League of Advertising Men, and he has made publicity a study. With economy he saved money and a year or two ago went to Chico and bought a principal interest in the Chico Enterprise, to the building up of which he has given his best efforts. If he considered his personal welfare alone he would stay with that task, but he believes that California should be a self-governing commonwealth and is willing to do his full share in helping to make it so. He is thoroughly competent to undertake the duties of that most important office and is perhaps the only candidate whose name has so far been suggested who is so. All the others, a half dozen of them anyhow, are out hustling for this office. In the case of Florence J. O'Brien the office had to hustle for the man and it found one, or will find one if Republican voters approve the League's choice. They ought to.

Endorsement Of Kingsbury

The liberal character of the purposes and policies of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League can not be better exemplified than in the case of Surveyor General W. S. Kingsbury. If we are correctly informed he never even asked for the endorsement of the League or its executive committee, but he had made good in office. It has not been possible during his incumbency of that important office for any favorite to get inside information that other people could not obtain, and it has not been possible for any speculator to get advance information as to any tract that was being applied for by an actual purchaser in time to slip in an application dated a day or two ahead of him and so force the bona fide applicant to buy at an advanced price for the benefit of the speculator rather than of the state. Under Kingsbury's management of the office the first who applied has been the first served and land has brought into the treasury of the state its full purchase price and not a minimum. It will be expected of Mr. Kingsbury that, inasmuch as he has not used his office for the advantage of speculators, so he will not use his political power and influence for the perpetuation of control of the Republican party and the state by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. It will suffice, no doubt, if he keeps his office out of politics and attends to the state's land business. Having proven himself a free man it is assumed that he will stand for free government. No pledges have, as we understand it, been exacted from him.

Endorsement of Atty. Gen. Webb

General U. S. Webb went before the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League on Saturday last and had a frank interchange of sentiments. He was invited to do so. The Watchman was not present and can only tell from hearsay what took place, but the conference was satisfactory. General Webb expressed regret that, under the regime that has obtained in past years, it has been impossible to obtain political advancement without "organization" recognition and he admitted that it was by that route that his political advancement came about; but he declared that he had not made his office subservient to corporation interests and, as all readers of The California Weekly know, when the hour of trial came, when it became necessary to "stand in" or "stand out," General Webb stood out. It was because he had done so that he received the endorsement of the League's executive committee. His actions, within the past three years, anyhow, have spoken louder than many words and leave no room for doubt. He spent some 18 years in the free state of Kansas and is in favor of making California a Free State. That is the task in hand.

Friend Richardson For State Printer

This is another case where the nomination for the office hunted the man and not the man the office. Mr. Richardson is editor and owner of the Berkeley Gazette, an original Lincoln-Roosevelter, a practical printer and a good business man and no paper house had anything to do with his selection. He was talked of by the interior press for candidate for governor, but the League had other ideas in that respect and he was never, himself, a candidate for that office. If nominated and elected we can safely count on more efficient service in the state printing shop than we have had in past years and somewhat less of the partisan politics that have cursed it. It is not real certain who Mr. Richardson's opponent for State Printer will be before the primaries. W. W. Shannon, the present incumbent, has sort of gotten wonted to the office, and the salary, and will be a candidate, probably of the paper trust. He expects considerable backing, too, from the labor union influence in his light for the job, and salary. Then there is Secretary Thorpe, of the State Board of Harbor Commissioners. He spent several years in the state printing office in a subordinate capacity, not entirely unconnected with the political end of it, and afterward held the office of county statistician of Sacramento county while chairman of the Republican county committee. He has served the "organization" with great fidelity and may be backed by it for the office of state printer, as he desires to be. Mr. Richardson is better known throughout the state than either of these men and should be able to beat the two of them.

Waiting on the Southern End

If the reader will bear in mind that the Direct Primary is nothing more nor less than the "Crawford County Plan," enlarged in its scope and regulated in detail, he will be able to understand the necessity for making up a well-balanced ticket. Ten years or so ago, perhaps it was longer, the Democrats of Stanislaus county adopted the Crawford plan of nomination. There wasn't any committee to frame up a ticket to offer the people and so all the court house fellows got out and hustled votes with the result that, when the votes were counted, every nominee on the ticket lived in Modesto. The Republicans got together and made up a ticket that gave every portion of the county a fair representation and, despite the fact that the county was normally Democratic by a majority of 600 or more, the Republicans made a clean sweep of the court house when the November election was held. A state ticket, not well represented as to locality, might easily suffer a similar fate, and so discredit the direct primary plan of nomination. Hence it behooves all those who make up tickets to offer the voters at the primary to balance their tickets well and give a due and proper regard to the element of local representation. Now a certain number of nominations are properly assignable to Southern California, and Southern California has not agreed in its own mind as to which man it wants in which place. There is no such need for haste as there is for doing the right thing when it is done, and that is why a candidate for Lieutenant Governor was not selected on Saturday last.

Too Good To Be True

Those who cherish the hope that Hiram Johnson will be confronted at the August primaries by three "organization" candidates will be awakened some fine morning betwixt now and the ides of August to find their hope shattered, that is, unless the right hand of Mr. Herrin has lost its cunning and his left hand has lost its ambidexterity. Neither of these deprivations is probable. Mr. Curry is in the fight to stay—unless a secure federal position such, for instance, as fell to Marion de Vries, opens out before him on a silver tray, or enough hard cash is stacked up on his counter to make him independent of politics; but the chances are that he will remain in the fight for the reason that he is, and from the first has been, the "organization" candidate and has only been making an anti-organization reputation for the occasion. He has committed his friends too far. Mr. Anderson is being backed by what may be styled the plunger bankers. The conservative bankers will not be with him and Mr. Anderson will prove too worldly wise to go to the primary as the leader of any forlorn hope. Once satisfied that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau is not for him, and that the fate of Crocker will be his fate, he will probably retire from the contest as modestly as he entered it, not unconscious of having been an easy mark.

Phil Stanton may stay in the fight to the finish. He is bull headed and the expectation of Mr. Herrin may be that if Stanton can hold Southern Californians pretty generally in line for a southern man, making the most of local pride, he may be able to keep enough votes away from Johnson to land Curry with the aid of the saloon, redlight and McCarthy party votes from North and South. The "organization" is neither without money nor generalship, and it is reasonably safe to conclude that whatever it may appear to be doing it is not doing. Another pointer: Grove L. Johnson has been reported as declaring that Charley Curry is not the "organization" candidate. That raises a reasonable presumption that he is.

Be Careful Not to Awaken That Baby The soft pedal is to be on all that the "organization" does betwixt now and the August primaries, that is, unless there happens another change of attitude in the meantime. The stentorian tones of Tom Dozier are not to reverberate from Siskiyou nor yet from San Diego, from neither Sierras nor sea, and the eloquence of John McNab shall not ring by day or night. Hands are to be upheld and eyebrows elevated whenever Hiram Johnson goes before the people with the cause he advocates. The Spirit of the Primary is to be hushed with lullabies, not aroused with orations, and conservative statesmanship will piously deprecate all interruptions of voters in their cogitations over making up their free, own, and untrammelled tickets to be nominated. But all this time the stealthy, still-hunt of the "organization" will be gumshoeing it over the state. There will be no speeches, no assemblages, just heart to heart and hand to hand talks with the people, aided, it may be, by little gatherings in the dark of the moon in back rooms of saloons to which admission will be by grips, signs and passwords. A proper proceeding! And yet the people will do well to beware of the still-hunt. Whatsoever shuns publicity loves Herrinism rather than light.

Southern Democrats Are Cleaning House Albert M. Norton, chairman of the Los Angeles County Democratic Central committee, predicts that the Democratic state convention which will meet in Los Angeles April 13th will declare practically unanimously for Theodore Bell for Governor. Others high in the councils of the Southern Democracy freely express themselves as of the same mind. To one who closely observes the progress of the pre-primary campaign it seems to be all Bell, so far as the Southern California Democrats are concerned. The Los Angeles County committee has been very active lately. It has held several meetings, the primary object of which has been to weed out those Democrats who in past years have been recognized as Southern Pacific henchmen, and put in their places simon-pure anti-organization men. The task has not been one of the easiest in the world, but it has been accomplished. The Los Angeles County Democratic Central committee as it stands today is made up of very creditable material, its membership having been drawn from the leading citizens of Democratic affiliations, almost without exception. It is doubtful if any other county in the state can point to a cleaner and more vigilant set of party officials and workers. That they are united for Bell is apparent to everybody.

The Los Angeles Democrats are in a very hopeful frame of mind. They are going to aid Bell materially in the county by offering to the voters a high-grade set of candidates for the various offices. They hope to receive the indorsement of the Los Angeles County Good Government organization for a number of their candidates.

A Los Angeles Storm Center Our advices from the south are that one of the most interesting contests in Los Angeles county this year will be over the office of District Attorney—a very important office, by the way. The incumbent, John D. Fredericks, is regarded as a machine politician whose office is filled with Southern Pacific time servers, and he made himself unpopular by his conduct of the municipal graft charges prior to the recall of Mayor Harper last year. Among all the present county officials, he is deemed by the good government forces to be the most objectionable. The feeling against him is so intense, throughout the country districts, as well as in the city, that should he secure the Republican nomination at the primaries thousands of Republicans undoubtedly would support his opponent, should the latter be a man of reasonably high qualifications and standing. Fredericks doubtless will have the active support of the organization forces in his efforts to be re-nominated. Opposed to him, and supported by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, is likely to be E. J. Fleming, who is recognized as an able and conscientious prosecutor, formerly connected with the district attorney's office. More recently he has been a member of the prominent law firm of Hunsaker, Britt & Fleming. The Democratic nominee will be Thomas Lee Woolwine, the young man who dared to defy the authority of his superior, Fredericks, when, as a deputy district attorney, he began an inquiry into the conditions which led up to the recall of Mayor Harper and the downfall of a number of his political associates in public office. Woolwine is a "man who dares." He fears nobody, and during the recent city campaign developed great strength among the masses of voters by his exposure of the methods employed by the machine. He will have no opposition in the Democratic party and whatever campaigning he does will still further strengthen him in the post-primary fight.

Friend W. Richardson Strikes Them Favorably Southern California appears to be greatly pleased with the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League's indorsement of Friend W. Richardson for state printer. Richardson resided in the southern part of the state for more than twenty years and is looked upon as a Southern California product. He has edited newspapers in various cities and towns of the south, including the San Bernardino Index, and has an army of friends there who are anxious to take off their jackets and boost him into the state printing office. South of Tehachapi he is distinctly in the hands of his friends.

Southern Candidates Not Taken Seriously Southern Californians generally are much dissatisfied with all the Southern California aspirants for nomination as Secretary of State, and are far from pleased or flattered over the character of the men posing as southern candidates for that nomination. Wagner of San Bernardino, at present secretary of the do-nothing railroad commission, is recognized as a machine politician, ready to do the wishes of the organization bosses in matters political. He has few, if any, qualities to commend him to the voters in the south end of the state. The candidacy of Mouser, who claims to hail from several centers of population—and votes—south of the Tehachapi, never has been taken seriously. Florence J. O'Brien is well and favorably known among the country newspaper editors, and they are already taking steps to make their readers familiar with the qualifications of so clean and strong a candidate.

Sloss and Wilbur Will Aid Each Other The friends of Judge Curtis D. Wilbur of Los Angeles are engaged in a vigorous campaign to elevate him to the supreme bench. So far as the South is concerned, the line-up for Supreme Court Judge is clear and distinct. Go among the organization crowd and the talk is for Judge James. Go among the anti-organization crowd, and the talk is for Judge Sloss and Judge Wilbur. Judge Wilbur is one of the most popular men on the superior bench in Los Angeles county, and his campaign will greatly strengthen Judge Sloss' candidacy in the South. The latter himself has never been much of a "mixer," and is not very well known in Southern California; consequently Wilbur's personal popularity can not fail to strengthen him in the lower part of the state. On the other hand the name of Judge Sloss will naturally add to Wilbur's strength in the North, where Judge Wilbur is better known by reputation than personally.

Controller Nye's Position Strong Great interest is being taken in the fight over the State Controllorship by the voters of the South. Down there both Democrats and Republicans regard State Controller Nye with the highest favor. The Democrats are even seriously considering writing his name on their primary ballot to insure his selection without opposition. It is figured that if Frank Mattison, whom Mr. Herrin apparently has selected to oppose Nye, is to get any votes for the nomination, they will have to come from north of the Tehachapi, excepting a few sporadic ballots. In the south end of the state Mr. Nye is looked upon as an exceptionally able, fearless and conscientious official, and he has won and holds the confidence and respect of all, regardless of political affiliation. His eminently fair treatment of Southern California in the matter of the equalization of taxes about a year ago has tended to strengthen his position greatly in the Southland.

The South Will Stand For Wm. R. Williams Another state official who will poll a heavy vote in the South is State Treasurer Williams. His indorsement by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League was received with high favor in practically every quarter of the region south of the line. While Mr. Williams is not personally so well known

THE SYMPATHETIC STRIKE

ITS JUSTIFICATION AND ABUSE, AND A REMEDY

By HARRIS WEINSTOCK

Someone asked Prince Bismarck, the great German Chancellor, how soon in his opinion labor was likely to be satisfied with the demands it was constantly making upon capital. He answered in his characteristic way that when capital would be satisfied with its thousands a year, then, and not before then, could it be expected that labor would be satisfied with its hundreds a year.

Capital and Labor Must Be Organized

Capital justifies itself for organizing and combining for its common profit and common protection. It can therefore find no fault with labor for simply bettering its example and likewise combining for its common betterment. Nor can capital find fault with labor for exercising its legal right to strike sympathetically for its common protection, so long as capital reserves the right to make use of the collective lockout.

So long as trade unions organized merely according to crafts they found their organizations more or less feeble. It was only when they followed the example of capital and federated, and pledged themselves to stand by each other and to make sacrifices for each other, that their organization became effective.

A Just Industrial Peace

It is in the interest of society that there shall be industrial peace. Not the industrial peace that one finds in Russia or in Turkey or in India, where the worker is ground to the earth and permitted to earn barely enough to exist and to reproduce himself, but an industrial peace where the worker shall be enabled to earn by his labor "enough money necessary to satisfy the normal needs of an average worker regarded as a human being in a civilized community."

To insure this enlightened industrial peace it is essential that labor shall be strongly and effectively organized and that capital shall likewise be so organized. It is essential that both shall be organized, but organized for peace rather than for war. It is essential that these two camps shall be friendly and not hostile in spirit toward each other.

Organization on both sides makes for collective bargaining and for long contracts, all of which is conducive to the highest industrial peace. Collective bargaining is better for the worker because as a body he can secure better terms and working conditions than he can as an individual at the mercy often of an exploiting employer. Collective bargaining is also better for the fair employer, because it enables him to compete successfully with his unfair neighbor, who under individual bargaining would squeeze labor and thus be enabled to underbid the fair wage payer.

Strikes Just Under Certain Conditions

The worker realizes his helplessness under a system of individual bargaining. His fight, therefore, is for the recognition of his organization so as to make collective bargaining possible. When he fights for the recognition of his organization he is, therefore, fighting for what, to him, is a vital principle. His readiness to make sacrifices for this principle by the direct strike, and his readiness to make still greater sacrifices by declaring a sympathetic strike, when not directly interested in the labor dispute at issue, especially when such sympathetic strike often means not only suffering and hunger for himself, but also for his nearest and dearest, must command for him the respect and admiration of his fellows.

This respect and admiration, as a rule, are his, so long as he does not forfeit them by striking sympathetically in the face of a contract previously entered into in good faith between him and his employer.

The world has no respect for contract breakers, and when organized labor breaks its contracts by going on a direct or sympathetic strike it gives itself a deadly blow and proves its own worst enemy, by destroying in it confidence on the part of the public and by making it possible for hostile employers to point out the uselessness of collective bargaining and contract making with labor organizations who do not respect their own word.

The labor unionist further loses public respect and admiration for his self-sacrificing spirit in going out on a direct or sympathetic strike for what he believes to be a vital principle, when, to enforce his demands, he resorts to force and to the violation of the law.

In resorting to these unfortunate methods he places himself at once in the category of the capitalist who to gain his ends becomes a law breaker by corrupting public officials.

Where Capital and Labor Err

The use of the brickbat and the cobblestone in a strike is incipient civil war, which only needs to be taken up on a large enough scale to become actual civil war. On the other hand, the persistent use of the capitalistic corruption fund is surely and steadily making for the destruction of good government. Both, therefore, are destructive of civil liberty and both should be treated with an iron hand. Of the two the corrupting capitalist has the weaker defense to offer because, as a rule, his aim is simply to pile wealth upon wealth, whereas with the worker it is, as a rule, a bread and butter fight.

As already stated, it is in the interest of capital and labor that both should be strongly organized, but organized for peace and not for war. It is in the interest of both capital and labor that a feeling of mutual friendliness and cordiality should exist between them, such as may be found in many parts of England, where organized capital and organized labor recognize and respect each other, where they get together for collective bargaining and where long contracts are entered into that are mutually respected and carried out in good faith.

It must be evident to the student of the labor question that in this country we are about where England was twenty years ago. Labor in our midst often looks with fear on the organization of capital—and not unfrequently with good cause—and capital, as a rule, refuses to recognize organized labor.

So long as organized capital refuses to recognize organized labor the latter is justified, as a matter of self protection, in resorting to the strike and if need be to the sympathetic strike to secure what it regards as a fair reward for its labor. How else can labor command a hearing?

The Interest of the Public

Meanwhile, especially when strikes take place in public service undertakings, the general public is made the greatest sufferer and in the end must foot the greater part of the loss sustained, by these seemingly unavoidable destructive industrial wars. There was a time when these losses were comparatively small because of the comparative smallness of the contending camps. But as organized labor and organized capital continue to grow these labor conflicts are getting to be colossal in their proportions. If another civil war should overtake this nation it is destined to be a war between capital and labor, that for bitterness and desperation will surpass any in modern history.

As a student of the labor question who has enjoyed exceptional opportunities in a world tour and world investigations of this most vexed labor problem, I have found that where, through an unwillingness on the part of capital to recognize organized labor, so often the case in this country and which makes voluntary arbitration impossible, the public has but one remedy and that is state intervention.

State Intervention the Only Remedy

In the interest of industrial peace and for the general welfare, the state can intervene, at least in labor disputes arising in public service undertakings, and the state should intervene.

There are two different kinds of state intervention. There is the state intervention as practiced in New Zealand, where a strike or a lockout is illegal and punishable by fine, and where the parties to a labor dispute must submit their difference to an industrial court, which by life tenure is made independent and whose decisions are enforced by the state.

Then there is state intervention as practiced in Canada where a strike or a lockout in public service undertakings is illegal until there has been a public enquiry and an award made by the Board of Enquiry, which award, however, the parties to the dispute need not accept and which cannot be enforced.

New Zealand Method Inapplicable

To my mind, the New Zealand method of compulsory arbitration is the preferred method in the interest of the employer, the worker and the public; but under our system of elective judges it is not practicable, for an elected judge in our country to render labor decisions in favor of employers is to lay himself open to the charge on the part of labor that he has been bought by the power of capital, and to render decisions in favor of the workers is to lay the court open to the charge that it is toadying to labor and seeking votes for the next election, thus destroying that mutual confidence in the Industrial Court imperative to the success of compulsory arbitration.

There remains, however, the plan of public enquiry as practiced in Canada. This system does not absolutely prevent strikes or lockouts, but minimizes them so that they become an insignificant factor.

During the two years in which a public enquiry act has been in force in Canada, ninety-seven per cent of the industrial disputes in public service undertakings, submitted to a public enquiry, have been peacefully settled, without an hour's loss of work to labor, or one dollar's loss to capital, or a moment's inconvenience to the public.

Canadian Method the Solution

Had such a public enquiry act been in force at this time in the State of Pennsylvania the great sympathetic street car strike now disturbing that great city would in all likelihood have been obviated, millions of dollars would have been saved, much injury to limb and loss of human life averted, and the great consequence suffering to countless numbers of innocent women and children stayed.

In my recent report to Gov. James N. Gillett as Special Labor Commissioner appointed to investigate the labor laws and labor conditions of foreign countries, I recommended the following as a basis for a public enquiry act to lessen strikes and lockouts.

"A Basis for a Proposed Legislative Act

"Whereas labor can be divided into two distinct classes—

"(a) That employed in private enterprise.

"(b) That employed in public utilities — a public utility being understood to be any undertaking patronized by the general public, for which a public franchise has been granted by the state or by the municipality;

"And whereas, the general public is much concerned in the continuous and uninterrupted service of said public utilities, and in the event of a strike or lockout, is collectively a greater sufferer than the employees of such public utility and their employers combined;

"the following legislation is therefore recommended to the law-making power for enactment, with the view of bringing about peaceful settlements of labor disputes arising between employers and employees engaged in said public utilities, in order to prevent strikes and lockouts:

"1. It is hereby enacted that any public utility corporation or any corporation or contractors doing contract work for any city, county, or for the State, which shall have had a dispute with their employees which can not be settled may, or that shall have decided to lockout its or their employees, must before declaring such lockout, furnish the state labor commissioner with a written statement to the effect that it has or they have found it impossible to have a conference with its or their employees or their representatives, or, having had a conference with said employees or their representatives, an agreement has been found impossible. Said statement must also set forth the points of existing differences to be settled and agreed upon. Any body of workmen employed by a public utility corporation, or by any company or contractors doing contract work for any city or county, or for the State, which shall have a dispute with their employers which can not be settled, may, or having voted to go on a strike, shall, before declaring such strike, furnish the state labor commissioner with a written statement to the effect that they have been unable to hold a conference with their employers, or, having had a conference, it has been found impossible to agree. Said statement shall also set forth the points of existing differences to be settled and agreed upon.

"2. Immediately on receipt of such notice, the said labor commissioner shall interview the parties to the dispute, separately, or in his discretion, collectively, as mediator and conciliator, with the view of bringing about an agreement between them. Failing in this, within three days he shall notify both sides to the dispute each to submit to him in writing, within three days, the name of a representative who is or has been engaged in the industry, and who is willing and ready to act on a board of inquiry. These names are to be placed forthwith by the said labor commissioner in the hands of the governor, who shall appoint said nominees.

"3. In the event of a failure on the part of either or both parties to the dispute to conform to the above provision within the specified time, the labor commissioner shall notify the governor of such failure, whereupon the governor shall appoint within three days a representative or representatives of his own choice, for said party or parties, who has or have been engaged in the industry.

"4. These two representatives of the parties to the dispute shall meet immediately after their appointment, and shall proceed to elect a third party as chairman of said board of inquiry. Having chosen a chairman, such party shall be appointed chairman of the board of inquiry by the governor. In the event of the two representatives being unable to agree upon a third party as chairman within three days, they shall notify the governor to that effect, who shall within three days after such notification himself select and appoint a chairman.

"5. Said board of inquiry shall have power to summon the parties to the dispute to appear before it, and in its discretion may talk with each of the parties separately and privately in the hope of finding common ground for agreement, and shall have such other powers in the summoning and examining of witnesses, books, and documents as are vested in the superior courts of the state in the trial of civil cases. The members of the board must, before proceeding to the examination of said books or documents, make oath that any information gained from said books or documents shall be confidential and shall not be used for any purpose other than the inquiry. The board shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the differences between the parties, and if successful, shall in writing report the terms of such settlement to the labor commissioner. Failing to effect such settlement, the board shall draw up a findings or report setting forth what, in the light of the evidence adduced, would in its opinion be a fair and equitable basis of settlement of all the matters in dispute.

"6. A certified copy of the findings of the majority of the board, together with a certified copy of the minority report, should there be one, provided that the minority report is signed within forty-eight hours after the majority report is signed, shall be delivered to the state labor commissioner, who in turn shall immediately deliver copies thereof to each of the parties to the dispute.

"7. Such findings shall not be binding on either party unless signed by both parties or by their representatives, or the award may be used as a basis for an agreement and may contain such penalties for violation by either party as may be mutually agreed upon. In the event of a settlement being reached between the parties the terms thereof shall not be made public if either party objects to such publication.

"8. In the event of the employers declaring a lockout before complying with the foregoing provisions, or prior to the receipt of the findings of the board of inquiry transmitted by the labor commissioner, said employers shall be liable to a fine of $25 for each employee locked out for each day during which said lockout continues, said fine in no event to be less than $1,000. Said fine shall become a lien against the property of said employers and shall be collectible as are other court judgments.

"9. In the event of workmen employed by public utility corporations, or by corporations or others doing public or contract work for cities, or counties, or for the State, going out on strike without complying with the foregoing provisions or prior to the receipt of the findings of the board of inquiry transmitted to the labor commissioner, said workmen shall be liable to a fine of $1,000. In the event of said workmen having no common funds, then, and in that event, in lieu of the foregoing penalty, every workman going out on strike shall be liable to a penalty of $25, said fine to be a lien against the property or the wages of said workman anywhere within the State at any time within twelve months and shall be collectible as are other court judgments. Violations of the foregoing provisions to be dealt with summarily by the superior court.

"10. Attorneys or any other counsel or advocates are to be barred from taking part in the proceedings before the board of inquiry.

"11. The inquiry, may, in the discretion of the board, be held in public.

"12. At the request of either party to the dispute, the board may be reconvened at any time during the life of the agreement to which there has been mutual assent, to interpret the

IF a man doesn't work, why we drills 'im an' teachers 'im 'ow to behave;
If a beggar can't march, why, we kills 'im an' rattles 'im off to 'is grave."
—Barrack-Room Ballad.

It was a heart-breaking, soul-trying day that lay before them—one of those days that old topographers look back upon and curse, when, in later years, disease or premature old age jeopardizes their efficiency.

A painful arising from clammy, fog-saturated blankets, a cheerless breakfast, eight miles through the sticky California mud, then—that pestilential, partially reclaimed island; there would be dredger cuts to wade through, "badger" holes to fall into and ten-foot tules to flounder among. Incidentally, so far as the boss was concerned, there were the elusive meanderings of a minus contour to be followed and an impossible piece of shore line to be mapped.

This was but a repetition of the twenty days preceding. For three solid weeks the party had toiled without a break in an endeavor to finish mapping the island before the winter rains would finally drive them out.

From the springless tail of the buckboard, a man wearing a Greek-letter fraternity pin, complained to his companion: "Why don't they put extra seats in these buckboards? It jolts the life out of one sitting and a man can't stand up all the time—there's too much hiking at the other end." But the red-haired rodman was unsympathetic. "Perhaps it's to stimulate the ambition," he replied, grinning. "Those who have the buying of extra seats don't have to sit behind any more, so they let us fellows sit here to get even for the time when they did. Thank the Lord," he added, "I've only got a month more of it. I'm going to record when Harvey is transferred."

That was poor consolation, and the Greek-letter man relapsed into moody silence. Frankly, the United States Geological Survey had been a disappointment to him, and as the buckboard lurched on through the abominable mud, his mind reverted bitterly to the time when fate had first thrown him into contact with that highly efficient but little known branch of the Department of the Interior.

It was at a mountain resort that he had chanced upon a party of them, who, while the necessary "office" work was being done, rested physically after a strenuous three months in the high Sierras. They were young, their spirits buoyant, their complexions were fine; and how immaculate they had looked in their blue flannel shirts and their freshly ironed khaki trousers. Good fellows they had proved indeed. They were fertile with reminiscence, and their careless mention of geographical localities had at once appealed to the Greek-letter man's susceptibilities. "When we were in Alaska," one would say. "Yes, but it was a thundering sight worse on the Canadian boundary," another would chime in, and so it went. Their experiences ranged from Mexico to the Arctic circle, and there were even those present who could put in a word for such far-distant lands as China, or the Philippines.

That was life. On the spot the Greek-letter man resolved to suspend his studies for a year and, since the visiting geographer ate at the same table on terms of social equality with the teamster, apply for a subordinate position in one of the camps.

It is not specially difficult to get a job on the Geological Survey. Almost any young man, if he be of average intelligence, active, and persistent in effort, will, within a reasonable length of time, be taken on and given his chance. Promotion is less easy, for there are two rodmen and a recorder to one instrument man, and many instrument men to one geographer—but that is another matter. The Greek-letter man possessed the necessary intelligence, and, since he was very persistent in the effort, it was not an unnatural consequence that autumn found him installed as rodman in one of the Sacramento valley camps, where most of the "rookies" were tried out.

But somehow the living of romance proved less attractive than the idea of romance. The tents might blow down, bedding and clothes might be soaked by a driving rain, and sleep lost, but the work went on. The government had an insatiable appetite for square miles of topography, but, as the red-haired rodman put it, excuses sat uncertainly on its stomach.

The party had worked Thanksgiving, because the Powers that Ruled, or at least one of them with whiskers, strongly approved of working holidays to make up in a measure for days lost on account of bad weather. Sundays were optional with the boss, and because this was Sunday, the third Sunday, in fact, the Greek-letter man felt a bitter resentment toward the stocky, square-jawed man, who, with his recorder, sat on the comfortable seat in front.

A spatter of rain roused him from his reverie and caused him to glance toward the thickening sky with sudden hope. If it would only rain before they reached the ferry, there might be no work after all. Beyond that, however, there would be no turning back, even though they spent the day huddled miserably under some deserted sheep shed. As the drops came faster, the Greek-letter man's soul was warmed by the prospect of a blessed day's rest and a perusal of the unread magazine his folks had sent him. At the ferry it was pouring. The boss noted the studied unconcern of his helpers, pushed the precious "sheet" more securely under the canvas and spat out unexpurgated opinions of the country. Then he thought of a dark-eyed girl whose future happiness depended upon his ability to turn in square miles, looked hopefully at a light spot in the east and signalled the ferryman.

The older hands, being disciplined, accepted the inevitable, with a shrug and a sheepish grin, but the Greek-letter man had not yet learned to renounce so easily. As the journey was resumed he sat bolt upright, taking the ruts with tense, defiant muscles. Tears of disappointment peeped from his eyes. He no longer shivered. He was both warmed and stimulated by a blind, unreasoning anger toward the boss—a boss who worked his men like dogs, worked them Sundays and holidays, that he might turn in a few more square miles and thereby gain credit for himself—the swine! The Greek-letter man would show him. The limit was reached and the dog would have his day.

When they reached the place where they had left off work the day before, the shower had passed. A leaden mist still hung over them, but a light spot in the heavens told that the sun was boring through on the other side.

Without a word the Greek-letter man threw off his coat, seized his stadia rod and made for his "turn." The boss, setting up his plane table, noted out of the tail of his eye that there was something threatening and purposeful in his rodman's manner.

Throughout the remainder of the forenoon they worked with feverish energy. With curses and blood-sweating the shoreline was "put in," and the tule area was nearly finished. After that, two hours of clean running would see them past the danger line, provided, of course, that the line "checked." In other words, the elevation must not vary over one-tenth of a foot when they "tied onto" the known starting point.

Shortly before noon the Greek-letter man's opportunity came. The red-haired rodman had been sent back after the team and the boss signalled that he would "swing his position" on the one rod. It was for this opportunity that the Greek-letter man had bided his time. Selecting a place where the grass would hide his action, he placed his rod upon a stump some nine-tenths of a foot above the ground. His elevation was carefully taken and the position pricked in on the map. Then the instrument was picked up and carried some nine hundred feet beyond for the new station. While the line was still "in the air", the rodman slipped his rod to the ground and held it there till the new height of instrument was taken, thus causing an error of nine-tenths in the recorded elevation.

It was the unpardonable sin. A survey man may steal, he may slander a woman, he may make a serious blunder and be discharged; but to deliberately throw the line out—that is to be excommunicated, to die accursed and unforgiven. It is a sin that cannot be lived down as other sins are lived down; its ghost remains always, to be dragged forth from its skeleton closet that it may hear the story of its shame retold wherever khaki men gather round the evening campfire.

Scarcely was the deed done when the Greek-letter man suddenly discovered that the anger had gone out of him, and in its place there came, presently, the first vague stirrings of uneasiness. The sun was shining warmly now and a launch coughed its way gaily over the glistening surface of the bay. Over on the mud line, the red-haired rodman sang happily:

"Oh, I eat when I'm hungry
An' I drink when I'm dry.
An' if whisky don't kill me
I'll live till I die."

But neither the sunshine nor the song brought its accustomed cheer.

At lunch the Greek-letter man ate less than usual. The red-haired rodman and the recorder, however, seemed in unnecessarily high spirits. The recorder was telling his hobo story:

"An' the feller he falls out of an orange tree forty feet high, an' he breaks both arms, one leg an' two ribs. By an' by, long comes the Englishman to where the poor feller lay groanin' an' he looks at the feller an' he looks at the tree, an' he says: 'Too bahd, too bahd, you've broken a brawnch.'"

The boss did not join in the complimentary laugh which followed, but lay on his back, eyes half closed, one leg thrown over the other. The boss, however, is supposed to have a great many things on his mind, and only the Greek-letter man noticed. His uneasiness was growing in spite of himself, and he found himself strangely alert to the boss's slightest gesture or expression.

The work was resumed, and, as the afternoon wore on, the Greek-letter man knew what it was to slowly shrivel before a consuming fire of suspense.

When, finally, the known starting point was reached, there was the usual hushed expectancy as the last reading was taken. The Greek-letter man was powerless to stop the trembling of his knees and he could hear his heart beat as the recorder, instead of calling out the closing error, scratched his head, bit his pencil and began to go over his figures.

But the boss cut in. "How much is it off?" he demanded.

"Foot," answered the assistant, ruefully.

"We'll run back to the turn that—" here he indicated the Greek-letter man with a jerk of his thumb—"made just before lunch."

A slow pallor overspread the rodman's face as he felt but could not meet, the boss's gaze.

All the backward march was a torment. The world had suddenly divided itself into two classes, the guilty and the guiltless. He thought of his home folks as do those who have sinned and feel the clutch tightening about them. He thought of his fraternity. What if the matter came to It's notice? There were civil engineers among its graduate members, who, should their advice be sought, would appreciate his offense in its entire ugliness. The verdict was too painfully obvious. The Greek-letter man looked wistfully at the red-haired rodman, who, a hundred feet to his right, chewed tobacco and cursed the evil luck with an untroubled conscience.

The last set-up came. The Greek-letter man dodged as from a blow, when, in passing the instrument, the boss held up his hand

"You held on a stump or something over there, didn't you?"

"Y-yes, sir."

"Then hold on the stump again," said the boss with the faintest emphasis on the "on."

With shaking knees and a prickling skin, the Greek-letter man obeyed. He caught his breath as in sudden pain when the last reading was taken and a howl from the red-haired rodman and the recorder told that the error was discovered.

The day's work was finished and the ordinary procedure would have been for him to join the others; but the boss, using only the slightest gesture, gave him the "sit down" signal. The boss's manner had all the cold-blooded deliberation of an execution. He motioned the recorder to pack the instrument and the red-haired rodman to go after the team; then, wheeling about and looking neither to the right nor to the left, he bore down on the Greek-letter man. He impaled the luckless rodman with a glance and for ten interminable seconds the culprit's immortal soul seared and withered under the merciless gaze.

Then spoke the driver of men, and his voice was gentle as a woman's: "You're only a green boy, and I fancy you're unaccustomed to this sort of thing—" here he indicated with a sweep of his hand the island, where, for so many days they had worked under impossible difficulties and unbearable discomfort. "I don't believe you ever earned a dollar before in your life, did you?—I thought not. Well, I'm not going to let you queer yourself on your first break. I'm going to let you off—but don't you ever do it again as long as you live, or—or by God, if you do, I'll come across the continent to bear witness against you."

meaning of any disputed point in said agreement.

"13. It shall be unlawful to strike or to lockout until seven days after the board of award and the objections thereto of either party have been filed with the labor commissioner. In the event of a strike or a lockout taking place after said seven days the labor commissioner shall on demand furnish to the press and to others copies of the said findings."

"I herewith give a statement of reasons which should appeal to capital, to labor, and to the general public, for supporting the creation of the proposed board of public inquiry."

"Reasons Why Employers Should Favor Act"

"1. It will restrain the unfair among labor men from making unfair demands.

"2. It will tend to prevent labor from resorting to force to secure unreasonable demands, where labor is unwisely led.

"3. It will ward off the tendency to establish compulsory arbitration, which is likely to follow if no other means of relief are afforded the public to protect itself against the loss caused it by what are often reckless and needless strikes and lockouts in connection with public utilities. Compulsory arbitration would mean that a court would fix for the employer wages and conditions of labor.

"4. It will tend to ensure continuous service with all that this means in respect to contracts.

"5. It will tend to reveal to the owners the efficiency or inefficiency of company officials.

"6. It will tend to avert all the evils of a strike.

"Reasons Why Labor Should Favor Act"

"1. By diminishing strikes and lockouts it will prevent needless waste of the workers' time, money and energy, and tend to obtain justice for labor without loss of income.

"2. It will gain for labor intelligent public sympathy, by affording it an opportunity to present its grievances before a public tribunal whose object is to get at the facts.

"3. It will afford labor the opportunity to make good its oft repeated claim that because of the uniform reasonableness and justice of its demands it courts public investigation.

"4. It will tend to prevent prejudgment of the merits of labor disputes on the part of an interested and possibly hostile press.

"5. It will compel unfair or unwilling employers who usually take the position that they have nothing to arbitrate, to get together with and to meet their men, and will force them to talk about the merits of the dispute and to listen to the claims of the other side.

"6. It will tend to prevent unfair or unreasonable employers from acting in a way which must of necessity mean suffering and loss to other people who are not to blame.

"7. When an investigation is made, it will not be possible to keep back anything that is likely to prove helpful to the cause of labor.

"8. The many little things that sometimes crop up and cause serious trouble, by an impartial investigation, are likely to be adjusted and settled.

"9. Organized labor stands committed to the doctrine that it does not want to strike in order to enforce its demands, if the consideration of them can be attained without recourse to that drastic remedy. A board of inquiry will afford the remedy.

"10. Organized labor is not blind to the fact that in every great industrial struggle, in connection especially with public utilities, the public has a large interest as well in the result as in the means adopted to reach that result. The board of inquiry would assure a hearing under the fairest possible conditions and bring out the facts.

"11. The creation of a public board of inquiry is calculated to postpone hasty action in the direction of strikes and lockouts and will tend to the settlement of disputes as the result of reason rather than as the result of passion or feeling.

"12. It will not take away the final right to strike.

"Why the General Public Should Favor Act"

"1. In all great strikes, especially in connection with public utilities, the public has more at stake than both the disputants combined.

The board of inquiry will represent the public equally with the other parties in interest, which will thus be given the voice in the matter to which it is entitled.

"2. It will make for reason and equity, for law and order taking the place of heat and passion, disorder and violence in the settlement of labor disputes.

"3. It will make for labor disputes being peacefully settled before a tribunal without interruption to public service.

"4. In the event of either party to a labor dispute refusing to abide by the findings of the board of inquiry, the publication of such findings will present the facts and enable the public intelligently to give its support to the party having the right on its side.

"5. It will tend to reduce to a minimum strikes and lockouts with their consequent tremendous loss and injury to the public."

It is to be regretted that in the opinion of many legal authorities whom I have consulted such an act under our constitution cannot be made to apply legally to any but public service undertakings. If such legislation is enacted it will, however, make most improbable within our commonwealth such unfortunate and demoralizing strikes as in recent years occurred in San Francisco in connection with the street car service and such a street railway strike as is at this writing paralyzing the great metropolis of Philadelphia. It would thus make for a higher degree of industrial peace than hitherto enjoyed and would pave the way for still further legislation and constitutional amendments which would make it possible to apply state intervention to all important private as well as public labor disputes.

in the South as is Mr. Nye, voters have kept an eye on him and are familiar with his work in the service of the state. They like him and will work for him next August.

Eshleman Hustling, Summerland Serene

The candidacy of John M. Eshleman of Imperial county for the office of Railroad Commissioner from the third district is being vigorously forwarded by his friends. He has developed surprising strength. People have not forgotten the Eshleman anti-racetrack gambling bill. He is an aggressive campaigner and is as well known by reputation in one corner of his district as in the other. There seems to be little room for doubt that he will win out at the primaries, although Theodore Summerland, the present railroad commissioner from the third district, is busy laying his wires, and confidently asserts that he will beat Eshleman to the tape in the race for the nomination. But voters are remembering Summerland's record as they are remembering Eshleman's, and there is too much contrast between the two to encourage Summerland's apparently oversanguine hope.

Cogswell Is Talked of For Speaker of Assembly

Southern California may have a candidate for Speaker of the next State Assembly in the person of Prescott F. Cogswell of El Monte, who has represented the sixty-eighth district in the lower house of the state legislature for two terms. He is a man of exceptionally high character and standing, and his ability has been proven. During his two terms of service in the assembly he has made a splendid record. According to Hichborn's Story of the Legislature of 1909, he voted right on every issue upon which action was taken when he was present in the assembly chamber—and his absence on one important occasion was due to an important committee meeting. Hichborn places him among the eminently desirable men in the last body. As speaker he would be an immeasurable improvement over most of his predecessors. Milton Schmitt of San Francisco is seeking reelection from his district and is hoping to be the organization candidate for speaker. Assemblyman A. H. Hewitt of Yuba City is also talked of in connection with this office. He is a fine legislator, and his record in the last two sessions has been among the best.

League Campaign Will Be Pushed

Hiram Johnson is opening the campaign for the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League in Southern California this week and Max Kuhl, State Organizer, has entered upon his work. He expects to reach Red Bluff on Thursday, March 17th, to be in Redding on Friday and at Kennet on Saturday. He will spend Sunday at Dunsuir and will reach Sisson on Monday, but will leave there at 3 p. m. and go to Yreka and stay there Tuesday, reaching Hornbrook Tuesday evening and expects to get back to San Francisco by the 24th. These dates may have to be changed some to meet unforeseen contingencies. His expectation is to get the ball to rolling, more help to be sent later. The likelihood is that every voter in California will know what it is all about long before August 16th.

Some Indications As to the Wind

As often explained, no "straight tips" are given out by the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau to the public and very little is passed "down the line" until the night before election. This makes it necessary to "put this and that together," in order to divine what that bureau is up to. We give a couple of pointers which indicate the direction the Southern Pacific's political breeze, now freshening up, is taking. County Clerk Cook, of Alameda, is "organization," through and through. He is abroad in the county registering voters. It comes to us that he leaves his office late in the day by automobile and makes shift to reach interior points after the farmers have gone home, but in season to round up the men about town, the loafers and such others as constitute the "push" contingent. These he registers and these an associate who habitually goes with him, induces to sign Charles F. Curry's nomination papers. The county clerk of San Francisco county was a "doodle-dee" and Union Labor candidate and was elected. He is registering voters with rapidity, and especially Union Labor party voters as Republicans. We have it on the authority of one who says he saw, that County Clerk Mulcrey also has Charley Curry's nomination papers very handy right under the counter ready to receive the names of the right men as soon as they have registered. Union Labor and Republican "organization" officials both working for Curry! If that does not mean that Curry is the "organization" candidate, away down deep, what does it mean? Of course this means, too, that Anderson is to be "Crocker."

SHEAR WIT

"You say you are calling on Miss Femme this evening?" "Yes, she joined a secret society last night and I want to go around and give her a chance to tell me its secrets."—Houston Post.

Ascum—I see there's some talk upon the question of abolishing capital punishment. Would you vote to abolish it? Logie—No, sir; capital punishment was good enough for my ancestors and it's good enough for me.—Presbyterian Standard.

Lawyer—So you want a divorce from your wife because she throws things at you, eh? Client—Nothing of the kind. She's too smart to throw things at me. Lawyer—But I thought— Client (interrupting)—She invariably throws things at the dog, but she always manages to hit me.—Chicago Daily News.

"I want you," said Mr. Dustin Stax, "to show that this law is unconstitutional. Do you think you can manage it?" Easily," answered the attorney. "Well, go ahead and get familiar with the case." "I'm already at home in it. I know my ground perfectly. It's the same law you had me prove was constitutional two years ago."—Washington Star.

The men in the Pullman smoker were arguing as to who was the greatest inventor. One said Stephenson, who invented the locomotive and made fast travel possible. Another declared it was the man who invented the compass, which enabled men to navigate the seas. Another contended for Edison. Still another for the Wrights.

Finally one of them turned to a little man who had remained silent:

"Whom do you think?" "Vell," he said, with a hopeful smile, "the man who invented interest was no slouch."—Lippincott's.

Here is a story that is being enjoyed around the Wyandotte county courthouse, says the Kansas City Star.

A county assessor was making a canvass for personal tax assessments. He called at the home of the widow in the second ward, and in a polite way said:

"Madam, I am the personal tax assessor. What have you got?"

"I've got two children and the rheumatism," said the widow, and she slammed the door in his face.

"Waiter, ask the orchestra to play something different."

"Any particular selection, sir?" "Something slower. I can't chew my food properly in waltz time."—Washington Herald.

The story is told by Allen Aynesworth, the British dramatist, of how a well-known peer who was the prey of match-making mammas for a long time and who was imprudent enough to show more than ordinary attention escaped responsibility, says O'Connor's Weekly. One day the mother of the young lady in question, thinking she had a trump to play, met his lordship and observed:

"People are talking a good deal about your attentions to my daughter, and are asking when your engagement is to be announced. What can I say?"

"I authorize you to say, madam," replied his lordship, "that I asked you for your daughter's hand and that you refused it!"

The conversation had languished for a moment or two.

"Have you heard of the Civil Service examination for Ambassadors?" inquired the man with the fur on his overcoat collar.

"No," replied the man next the car window. "I haven't heard of it. Are they examining 'em now?"

"Yes. They ask 'em just one question."

"Only one question? What's that?" "Are you a multimillionaire and a free spender?"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

THE ANSWER

By Joseph K. Hutchinson
(For The California Weekly)

Listless leaves that sunless
Hours yield,
Flit with the tragic autumn
Across the field.

Wind in the tattered branches,
Wistful, slow,
Calls to the last faint scarlet
To fade and go.

What ho! Why weep at winter?
Have blazing cheer!
Greet in the deepened embers
The new-come year!

Sadness? Ah yes, we crave it,
Fitful we;
But think of the leaping anthem
Of spring to be!

ABOUT SOME MAGAZINES

Of the regular monthly magazines, Every-body's, McClure's, the American, and Munsey's head the list. After these come the Review of Reviews and the World's Work, probably in the 150,000 circulation class. Harper's and the Century are stationary at about 175,000, but showing signs of slow decay. Scribner's has probably a little less circulation and is very conservative of change in its familiar characteristics. These three last-named retain the character impressed upon them by their common type of origin, namely, to be "feeders" of fiction to a regular book-publishing business and to be mediums of announcing to the public the publications of those houses. The more rapidly growing magazines and weeklies have no relation to book publishing and exist solely for their own merit and chances of success. This is a significant difference, and its significance is further illustrated by the fact that S. S. McClure found it impossible to direct a great magazine and a great book-publishing house at the same time, and so, when John S. Phillips, who had managed the book end of the business, left him to direct the American Magazine, McClure was compelled to sell his book business to Doubleday, Page & Co.

A pupil in one of the grades at Brownell school startled his teacher the other morning by inquiring: "What is a feebly?"

"A feebly!" repeated the teacher. "Feebly is an adverb, not a noun. Where did you ever see that?"

"Right here in this book," replied the pupil. "It tells here about a guy that had one of them growin' on his chin." He pointed to a passage describing the appearance of a young man in the story.

The sentence read: "He had a feebly growing down on his chin."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

NOTICE OF GUARDIAN'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE. In the Superior Court of Yolo County, State of California:

In the Matter of the Estate and Guardianship of Henry Gross, Herbert Gross and Melvin Gross, minors. Notice is hereby given that in pursuance of an order of the Superior Court above named, dated January 24th, A. D. 1910, and made in the above entitled matter, the undersigned guardian of Melvin Gross, minor (said Henry Gross and Herbert Gross having attained their majority, respectively, before the date of the said order), will sell, on or after Monday, the 28th day of March, A. D. 1910, at private sale, to the highest and best bidder for cash, gold coin of the United States, and subject to confirmation of said sale by the said Superior Court, all the right, title, interest and estate of the said minor, Melvin Gross, to-wit: an undivided 1.36 interest in all those tracts of land situate in Colusa county, state of California, and described as Sections numbered respectively 22, 23, 26, 27, 28 and 32, and fractional Sections numbered, respectively, 19, 30 and 31, and the N. 1/2 of the SW. 1/4 of Section 33, and the S. 1/2 of Section 29, and the E. 1/2 of the E. 1/2 of the NE. 1/4 of Section 29—all situated in township 13, N., range 2, W., Mt. D. B. & M., and aggregating about 6,173 acres.

Also a like undivided one thirty-sixth (1-36) interest in that lot of land situate in the City and County of San Francisco, state of California, described as Lot 35 in Block 12 of the "Flint Tract Homestead Association."

No. 27636.

ELIZABETH WATTS LLOYD, Plaintiff,

vs.
ALBAN W. LLOYD; ENID LLOYD and ALL PERSONS unknown who have or claim any interest in, or lien upon, the whole, or any part, of the real property described in the complaint herein. Defendants.

NOTICE OF REFEREE'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

Under and by virtue of an interlocutory decree in partition and order of sale, duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 24th day of February, 1910, in the above entitled action, I, the undersigned duly appointed, qualified and acting referee in said action, am commanded to sell all those certain lands situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, described in the complaint herein, and described as follows, to-wit:

COMMENCING at a point on the easterly line of Polk Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet northerly from the northerly line of Ellis Street; running thence northerly along said line of Polk Street twenty (20) feet more or less to Olive Avenue; thence at right angles easterly along the southerly line of Olive Avenue parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet; thence at right angles southerly parallel with Polk Street twenty (20) feet, and thence at right angles westerly parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet to Polk Street, the point of commencement.

Said described premises being a part of 50 Vara lot Number Three (3) in Block Number Nine (9) of the Western Addition as laid down on the official map of said City and County of San Francisco.

And public notice is hereby given that on Saturday the 26th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of that day at the street entrance to the office of the sheriff of said City and County at No. 122 McAllister Street, in the said City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and interlocutory decree in partition, sell the above described property at public auction to the highest bidder for cash in United States Gold Coin, ten (10) per cent thereof to be paid as a deposit on the day of sale, the balance upon confirmation of the sale by the Court and the delivery of a conveyance. Ten (10) days allowed before confirmation for examination of title. Objection to title, if any, must be made before confirmation. If after the confirmation the purchaser neglects or refuses to immediately comply with the terms of the sale, a re-sale will be made of the property purchased. If the amount realized on such re-sale does not amount to the former bid and the expenses of the previous sale, such purchaser shall be liable for the deficiency and the said referee will retain such deficiency from the deposit. All checks presented by purchasers must be certified.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't. —
The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit: Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

What the Candidate Must Do

Few changes in government have taken place more profound than that of passing from the convention system to the direct primary plan and, in relation to what a candidate must do in order to be nominated for an office outside his own residential sphere of influence, it is revolutionary. For local offices in small communities the difference will not prove so important, but for offices representative of a state or a district constituency, it is decided. In this lesson we shall have to do mainly with candidates for state or district offices and what they must do.

The first thing a candidate for a state or district office must do is to get a reputation, and a good one at that. In a city with a tendency to wide-openness a bad reputation may prove as effective, but probably not in the state at large, although it has not yet been demonstrated what an organized and federated "push," including all the cities, may be able to do. If the manhood of a state will vote as generally at a primary as at a general election nothing is to be feared from the organized "push" vote, but inasmuch as that is the vote that always votes at a primary election, and amounts to about 25 per cent. of the total vote, it will be seen that it may become formidable if concentrated on bad candidates at a time when the manhood vote is much split up or stays at home on primary election day. However this unknown factor may turn out it remains practically true that the first thing a candidate for a state office must do is to get a state reputation. The direct primary affords little opportunity for "dark horses" or for going to a boss, paying him a lot of money or promising him a lot of patronage, and so fixing it up with him. Nor can nominations by bargain-counter methods be effected. Most every tub will have to stand on its own bottom.

After having gotten a reputation, and decided to enter the field for nomination to a state or district office, the candidate must first get up and file his "nomination paper," or petition to have his name appear on the primary ballot of his party, if he have a party. If he have not then he has nothing to do with the primary election and must get on the general election ticket by petition, the method of which is to be explained at another time. This nomination paper will also be the subject of a special lesson.

It is provided also in the Direct Primary Act that no one can be a candidate of a political party upon his own initiative unless he affiliated with that party at the preceding election. That is, a candidate can not get out nomination papers petitioning to have his name go on the ballot of any party unless he acted with that party at the last election; but this does not, as the courts have held, prevent a party, of its own volition, endorsing such a candidacy and putting such candidate's name on the ballot to be used at the general election by petition. If the name of a candidate who had not affiliated with a political party at the last election should get on a general election ballot otherwise than by petition the election boards would be estopped from counting votes for him or his election could be successfully contested if he were declared elected.

Having gotten his nomination papers ready, as in the act provided, the candidate must file them and pay a fee for so doing. If the candidate be for the senate of the United States, or any state office, or for any district embracing more than one county, the nomination papers must be filed with, and fee paid to, the Secretary of State. In the case of a candidate for the United States senate or a state office the fee is $50. For a representative in congress or district office, other than state senate or assembly, the fee is $25. Candidates for senate or assembly must pay a fee of $10.

These fees are all paid into the state treasury in the first instance, but the Secretary of State must apportion to the different counties in the state equally all fees received from candidates for state offices, and between the counties comprising the several districts within the state, equally, all fees received from candidates for district offices, and the State Controller must draw his warrant in favor of each county for its allotted portion.

But the filing fee is a small part of the expense to which the Direct Primary law subjects a candidate for nomination, although the law seeks strictly to limit that expenditure. It allows him to spend money only for these purposes: Filing fee, circulating nomination papers, personal traveling expenses, rent for headquarters, and halls for meetings, payment of speakers and musicians and their traveling expenses, printing, challengers at the polls, making canvasses of voters, clerk hire, conveying infirm or disabled voters to and from the polls. Of course these expenditures might run up very high in a state campaign and so give the rich man a great advantage over a poor one, were it not that the law steps in and strictly limits the amount which each candidate may lawfully expend for any or all of these purposes.

Section 30 limits the total expenditure as follows: Where the total vote in the last preceding general election in the district in which the candidate is making his canvass did not exceed 5,000, such candidate may expend $250 in securing his nomination. To this he may add two dollars for each 100 voters in the district over 5,000 and under 25,000; for each hundred voters over 25,000 and under 50,000 he may add another dollar to his expenditures, and for each hundred voters over 50,000 he may add another fifty cents. It has been figured out that, this year, in California, under this law, a candidate may expend $2,580 to make the race for nomination for a state office or for United States senator, and he can not, under the law, expend a dollar more either directly or indirectly. Each candidate must file with the officer whose duty it is to issue a certificate of nomination a certified and itemized statement of all moneys expended by him, or by any person or association of persons in his behalf, and must do it within 28 days after the primary election has been held. No certificate of nomination is to be issued until such statement has been filed.

Will Try Not To Make More

IT WAS CONSIDERATE of Mr. Andrew Carnegie to declare that he will try not to make any more money while he lives. Having gotten together some hundreds of millions that he does not know how to get rid of without doing more harm than good he will graciously leave something to be made by others. It is nice of him, but, do his best, he cannot prevent his money making more money while he isn't looking and, if it could keep at it, it would in time take to itself all that the Rockefellers and Morgans do not get. His situation is bad at its best. His forbearance is too late by two decades.

Johnson and Wallace

THESE NAMES ARE HONORABLE. They stand for that which means something to humanity. They are not bond-servants to any corporation, clique or combination. They do not face an issue bulking huge as Shasta to blinkingly declare that it is not there. An inspiration to ingenuous youth and an example to virile manhood, they constitute the best that California has to offer California for the service of California, and if California be not wedded to its Southern Pacific idols it will accept the offer.

The Modern Missionary

THE MODERN MISSIONARY is not a lank and hungry man who carries a hymnal habitually under his arm and is solely intent on souls. Wherever he goes he carries with him all that is best in our civilization, as well as his religion. He is an advance agent of prosperity, industrial, commercial and sanitary as well as ethical. It is a person of little faith who cares not to share it with someone who has it not.

Smiles Ironed Out

THE NEW YORK TIMES, in a recent Sunday supplement, told a pathetic story in reproducing pictures of the President. One was taken when he was about to receive the formal notification of his nomination, and the second just before the inauguration. Contrasted with these, which are all smiles, are three others of recent date. In these the smiles have been ironed out and in their place has come a look of seriousness, such a look as one might wear who was knowingly confronting the first serious failure of an eventful life. The California Weekly hopes to see that look of melancholy give place to one of triumph and victory, but that will be when he has shaken the fist of defiance at the Aldriches, Hales, Cannons, and all that they represent and, backed by a public sentiment that is impatiently waiting, has made the insurgent cause his own. He has gone at Right Things in the wrong way. He has placed his trust in the wrong people.

Let the Act Speak

MR. TIREY L. FORD denies that the appointment by Mayor McCarthy of the Trevor-Sloan company to collect the city's rents was done either to please him or, through him, to please the United Railroads. Very likely, but whether the perquisite was passed out through Mr. Ford, or however it arrived, it is unlikely to have displeased Mr. Calhoun or to have branded Mayor McCarthy as an ingrate in his estimation. Let the act speak for itself. Therefore, be it remembered that Mayor McCarthy gave the city's rent collecting perquisite to a real estate firm 66 per cent. of whose capitalization is owned by the president of the Sutter Street Railroad company, a corporation subordinate to and owned by the United Railroads.

Why Delay His Passports?

IF THE EVIDENCE of Chief Engineer Davis, of the Reclamation Service, is to be believed, Mr. Ballinger's passports should be handed him without delay. If he told the President that he restored lands to entry because of the recommendation of the Reclamation Service, when it was he, himself, who commanded that recommendation to be made, he has been guilty of double-dealing with President and people and is no longer fit to sit in the company of such gentlemen as should make up the cabinet of a president.

The Rueful Ripley

EVERY TIME THE PRIVATE CAR of President Ripley of the Santa Fe is sidetracked at Santa Barbara a wail goes out over the state that should bring tears to the eyes of darning needles. This time it is because railroads, alone of all gainful enterprises, are not permitted to increase their charges in order to cover increases in wages or cost of maintenance-of-way. However, when it comes to maintenance of dividends the case is different, as President Ripley cannot deny. In view of the recent mulct to the tune of $10,000,000 a year the commercial interests of California will bear eager testimony to this truth at any time and place.

Somewhat Serious

ATTORNEYS FOR STANDARD OIL, in the great case just heard in the Supreme Court of the United States, contended that if their client was at fault it was merely in the incident of combining affiliated corporations into one corporation and, at the worst, that was only a mistake. A mistake that brought great railroads to their knees before it, that killed off 90 per cent. of competition with it and, in twenty-four years, paid a thousand million dollars in dividends on a capitalization of sixty-nine millions, was a mistake of so serious a nature as to suggest culpable carelessness.

Big Men of the West

IT WAS A SPLENDID TRIBUTE which Jim Hill's son paid to the Big Men of the West when he expressed his preference for putting the conservation of all our western resources into their hands for untrammelled exploitation rather than into the hands of visionary New Englanders with their heads full of the common welfare. Opportunity for enterprise there will be, Mr. Hill, for bigger men than the biggest the West has yet produced, but the hope is coming to be cherished that enterprise will no longer be confounded with spoliation or developing the country with stripping a continent naked to the bone.

Wanted

INFORMATION AS TO the whereabouts of the late beef boycott. When last heard from it was taking the country by storm, but the storm appears to have abated. Nevertheless, it is a substantial grievance which the consuming public has against the great packers, just as the people of San Francisco have a grievance against the fish combination that starves a market in the midst of abundance, and commits culpable waste, that this may be done. What is true of the fish dealers is true of dealers in fruits and vegetables. They stand between hungry mouths and a bounteous supply. Four-fifths of the complained of excess in prices is artificial and lawless and should be punishable with imprisonment, the only kind of punishment that really punishes. Are we become a nation of extortioners rather than business men?

A Task for Stanford University

Scientific research and experimentation are among the functions of great universities, and there are circumstances under which they become duties. There was a strong suggestion of this a few years ago when the milk supply of Palo Alto became contaminated and many Stanford students were taken ill with typhoid fever. People said then that under the walls of a great university was the last place in which an incident of this kind should have occurred.

An occasional contributor to The California Weekly calls attention to what he thinks is another instance of university duty not yet performed. Up in Butte county there is a ranch known as the Stanford ranch, owned by the university of that name, which consists of about 17,000 acres of adobe land, on which once grew plentiful crops of wheat, but which is now condemned to use for pasturage, because wheat can no longer be grown profitably. The university receives little revenue from this large property, and the county assessor has reduced the assessment from thirty dollars per acre to seventeen, even the latter being high in proportion to income.

In the best of times this land was never first class for wheat growing, because adobe land, as every farmer knows, will drown out in years of heavy rainfall; and yet it is a body of land which is naturally fertile and ought to be producing heavy crops of some kind. It is like a great deal of other land which is found in the Sacramento valley; it now represents a vast waste of natural resources, because science has not come to the aid of practical agriculture to show how the problem in the case can be solved. Most persons who have thought about it seriously believe that a properly constructed system of drainage would go far toward solving the adobe land question. If this is so there could not be a better field anywhere for experiment on a large scale than on the Stanford ranch, and seemingly there could be no owner better qualified than the university, with its large resources of money and its staff of scientific men, to undertake it. If drainage alone will not cure the evil, then so much the more reason for study and research to find out what will.

Of course the solution of this question for the Stanford ranch would be its solution for the whole Sacramento valley, a half of which, probably, consists of adobe land. So long as the question how to bring this land up to its greatest usefulness goes unsolved the prosperity of the valley will be retarded. By solving it the university could double, treble or quadruple the value of this part of its property, and exert the same effect on the property of hundreds of owners. This seems to be a case where, if our correspondent is right in his facts, the duty of the property-owner goes hand in hand with the duty of science.

On the Right Line at Last

The McCarthy party members of the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco should not allow themselves to be over sensitive if, when called upon to take action in relation to anything in which the interests of the United Railroads conflict with the public interests, press and public view their acts with suspicion. It is notoriously true that the influence of the United Railroads was thrown into the scale for the election of McCarthy and his associates and, since the election, when the Mayor had a nice little perquisite to give, in the shape of rent-collecting for the city, he gave it to a real estate firm sixty-six per cent of whose capitalization is owned by the president of the Sutter Street railroad, a property that belongs to the United Railroads.

Nevertheless, the press and public will do the Board of Supervisors justice when commendation is deserved. It was a good day's work that it did on Monday when it resolved to ask permission of the Attorney General of the state to test, in the courts, the legality of the Sutter street franchise in lower Market street, as well as to adhere to all claims to rights in Geary street. The next step should be the enactment of the Baneroff ordinance requiring the United Railroads to operate its cars down the inside tracks to the ferry. Let us find just what the rights and powers of the city are in the premises.

Enough is known of the United Railroads and its methods to make it certain that decent treatment of the public can not be had except by the compelling power of municipal opposition, either actual or imminent, and, for this reason if for no other, the cars of the city system must go unvexed down Market street to the ferry.

The supervisors have done well thus far, but they may as well understand now as later that their every movement will be watched with keenest interest, and the most exacting standards will be held up for them to follow. They will have to prove their right to be trusted before being trusted out of the light.

A Fetish of Party

The direct primary has come to stay. The voting public will never consent to return to the convention system, as we have known it, although it is likely that a regular system of pre-primary conventions may grow out of the direct plan and come to have recognition under the law.

But the direct primary is going to play havoc with political parties as we, of this generation, have known them. All signs point to this truth. Party voters can not be kept on their own sides of party fences and this alone will break party fences down. The rivalries generated in the pre-primary campaigns will be carried into the elections through independent voting upon a scale never known before. Good men will vote for good candidates in whatever political party they find them and bad men will vote for bad candidates in whatever party they find them.

What of it? Where will be the harm if the direct primary results in making party allegiance somewhat less obligatory than allegiance to state and country? What if men shall hereafter be moved to ally with party because of choice rather than because of inherited association? What if political parties shall be reformed from campaign to campaign, as new issues arise, instead of perpetuating themselves, as they have been doing, right across the paths of great issues almost without breaking the party alignment? Will not government be the gainer thereby? Today, progressive Republicans and progressive Democrats are much nearer together than progressive Republicans and the "organization" members of that party. The same is true with regard to progressive Democrats and the conservative wing of that party, allied as the latter is at a hundred points with those "interests" that now hold the machinery of the Republican party in their grasp. Why should good men make a fetish of party when bad men do not? The "interests" are neither cramped, cribbed nor confined by party lines. Why should the hands of free men be bound while the hands of scoundrels are left free?

We are on the eve of profound changes in the main currents of political life. Our cities are becoming non-partisan and our states and our nation will follow in their train. Issues will divide men so that they will stay divided, and respect each other's party lines, and nothing else will. In the pending contest all who believe in free government should, at the August primary, vote for Hiram Johnson and a government of, by and for the people. All those who distrust the ability of the people to govern, and who prefer to trust their personal rights, the establishment of justice and the safety of their property to government by the associated corporations of this commonwealth, should vote for Charles F. Curry as the best representative of "organization" methods as applied to our political life. Unfortunately, for this practice of voting the honest sentiments of all the people, party as a political institution, party as a fetish, bars the way to a free expression of principle and preference. It will not always do so, and the sooner that barrier is broken down the better. Party is for the use of men, not men for the use of party.

Amend the Charter

It is not perfectly certain that the Galveston plan would best suit the governmental requirements of San Francisco, but there can not be two honest opinions in relation to the advantages of the non-party system of holding city elections. The last election furnished convincing proof of the folly of allowing partyism to split the reputable vote into two nearly equal parts while that vote which plays most easily into the hands of grafters and grabbers is plumped. The initiative, referendum and recall also should have their uses so facilitated that the people may use them whenever they wish to for whatever purpose they wish to. If, then, with home rule, and a direct participation of the people in their government, San Francisco can not keep its devoted nose above the waves let her sink, but this paper is of opinion that the woes of San Francisco have not been due to popular government, rather, to the want of it. Therefore amend the charter in the interests of a freer and more direct participation in government by the citizen, and do it now.

The Men at the Head

Mr. Carnegie was probably right in stating that the great executive managers of our big financial and industrial enterprises are less concerned for becoming multi-millionaires than for efficiently safeguarding the interests of the stockholders of their respective corporations, but are there not obligations which these men owe to the common welfare which transcend their obligations to their shareholders, and of which they are frequently oblivious? We think there are.

It may have been to the financial interests of the stockholders in our great railroads to practice rebating, but the men who were guilty of it should have been clapped into jail for excess of zeal.

It probably has been to the financial interests of the shareholders in the Southern Pacific company to have certain officers of that company conduct the government of California in the interests of such shareholders instead of in the public interest, but those men have had to prove themselves traitors to California, and enemies to human society, in order to serve their employers. No honorable man can be hired to oppose, or even to be blinded to, the common welfare in the interests of any combination of shareholders, even though they be "widows and orphans."

It ill befits Mr. Carnegie to say aught which tends to obscure the public vision or make it difficult for the public to judge betwixt good and evil at a glance. Whoever serves king or company to the detriment of state or country is a criminal.

Should Give Their Time to It

In looking for candidates for the State Board of Railroad Commissioners the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will do well to find men who will give their whole time to the duties of that commission. The proper safeguarding of the public interests in relation to transportation may well occupy the undivided attention of three able men, and a salary of $6,000 per year, and expenses, is not wholly inadequate for that service, although the right men for the places might easily be worth more. Heretofore our railroad commissioners have not felt it inconsistent with their duties to the state to busy themselves with other gainful occupations while drawing the salaries of commissioners, but they were waiting for something to turn up, not turning up something that needed to be inquired into. The new law gives the commissioners a considerable initiative. It is likely that the next legislature will give them more. He who is to double-business bound will neglect the state's end of it, if not both.

What Else Can the Poor Man Do?

John Temple Graves, and the Hearst newspapers, are concerned lest the public cold shoulder turned to John D. Rockefeller induce him to take his wealth with him when he leaves the world or else so entail his estate as to sequester and augment his huge fortune until, in the hands of his heirs, it becomes so colossal as to devour the earth. The danger is not great. John D. Rockefeller has a just God to face ere long. Let him look to that. Besides, neither philanthropy nor statesmanship can so clearly foresee the relation between events and their causes as to venture to tie up vast estates, even in the name of charity, for any great lapse of time. What may now be looked upon as a wise charity time may prove a curse to posterity. Let not the scrawny hand of a Rockefeller reach up out of his grave to direct the destiny of his many millions long after his death. Two lives in being and twenty-one years is quite long enough for any benevolence to be unchangeably directed by any man's foresight. Let those who live in each generation be trusted to deal with benevolences for each generation. His wealth Rockefeller can not take with him. If he leaves it to his descendants he will ruin the last one of them. Therefore let him unload as best he may, but in such a way that when he is dead he will have done with it.

It Won't Do This Time

The Kern Echo, Hon. S. C. Smith's paper, will support the candidacy of Hiram Johnson. So far so good. But it is not doing it for the right reason. Therefore we pick a quarrel with it, if we can, here and now. It is supporting Hiram Johnson because it believes him the best man for the place. Ordinarily that reason would be superb, but it does not suffice this time. Hiram W. Johnson is the best man suggested for governor of California, but there is another reason for nominating and electing him for governor that transcends his superior fitness as Mount Shasta looms above Marysville Buttes. That issue is the emancipation of California, and the Republican party in California, from corporation domination. If a good governor were all that need be looked for Alden Anderson would make one, so would Phil Stanton, as good as Gillett has made, anyway, and there is not a man in the state who understands the state's business better than Charley Curry, although his political ideals are so objectionable that it would not be safe to elect him. The California Weekly is glad to have the Kern Echo support Johnson, but it wants the Echo to do it for the right reason. Johnson has a finer mentality than any of his competitors, and his enthusiasms are finer, but he stands for a cause transcendent in its importance, and it is exasperating to find the Echo professing an inability to see in the sunlight what should be obvious at noonday to owl or bat. The issue is greater than any man.

A Doomed Administration Measure

Our "backbone" article for this week, on the Federal Corporation Tax Law, will be read with interest and approval by holders of shares in corporations. We look for the higher courts to follow the line of reasoning in this paper laid down and that expectation is grounded not on the irrefragable character of the reasoning so much as upon the manifest truth that the financial interests are all against it. Whatever the financial interests of this country unitedly oppose will be beaten. These interests are not opposed to the tax because of the arguments urged against it, but the arguments are urged against the tax because they are opposed to it. This without reflecting upon the single mindedness of the author of our very instructive leading article.

Nevertheless, the artificial person, with neither body to be kicked nor soul to be damned, never should have been sought to be given all the rights and immunities which attach to a person having both body and soul. Practically every corporation does an interstate business and every act of chartering a corporation by a state is a practical invasion of what should be a Federal authority. Every tax imposed works some injustice, and the Federal corporation tax affords no exception to that limitation, but under a system of taxation that throws the whole burden of supporting government upon the consuming power of individuals, without regard to their ability to pay, we need not strain at a few gnats while swallowing camels by the herd.

The Federal Corporation Tax was imposed, confessedly, to prevent the imposition of an income tax, a form of taxation less objectionable and more just. Now the very powers that gave us the corporation tax, lest a better thing come upon us, are striving to ward that off, too, and they will succeed. Only a great war or the overthrow of the "interests" in congress and courts will restore the national income tax to its rightful place in our polity.

The principal argument in favor of, and reason for opposing, the Federal Corporation tax is found in that, at present ineffectual, provision providing for publicity in the transaction of the business of corporations. The greater part of the business of this country, and of the civilized world, is and must be done through corporations, and corporations should not be needlessly harrassed or hindered, but, inasmuch as flesh can not be made of one corporation and fowl of another, the conduct of all corporations must be an open book. Not a financial evil of which there is now public complaint but owes its being to the star-chamber methods of great corporations. That the innocent may suffer through publicity is to be regretted, but there can not be effective corporate regulation without full cognizance, on the part of officers of the law, of what corporations are doing and how they are doing it. The evil that an individual may do in his sole capacity is limitable. That which a Harriman, a Rockefeller, or a Morgan may do, under cover of half a hundred affiliated corporations, oversteps the farthest bounds which the imagination may set. The Federal Corporation tax ought not to be nullified, but it will be. The President has been entrenched.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

She was what everyone would call a dear, sweet woman and she had lost her only child, a baby boy, and was bereft indeed. She wanted so much to do some great thing in honor of his memory. She wished that she had the wealth of a Stanford that she might found a great university and name it after him. Anyhow, she did wish that her husband were financially able to build a sweet little cottage for the foundling asylum half a dozen blocks away that it might bear the lost baby's name over the door where everyone going by on the street could read the sign and reflect upon the beauty of the benefaction.

But when it was modestly suggested that, if she could not do that, perhaps she might take her empty perambulator out to the asylum on pleasant days and take the foundling babies out into the air and sunshine, that she might take them into her motherly arms, rock them and sing to them as she had done to her own, that she might afford them the natural right of every baby born into the world to be caressed and talked to, taught to "patty-cake" and made to laugh, the suggestion met with small favor and nothing was done except to go about sad-eyed all day and at night get out the little garments her baby had worn and weep over them.

How very natural this all was, and yet how self-indulgent, if not selfish, and how inconsequential as a dedication to the love for the lost baby! There are moments which come to most of us when we positively long to make the great renunciation, but have no stomach for the thousand little ones we might make day by day, but do not, and yet the thousand little renunciations and not the one great one, that would set the world to talking, would have many times the greater influence in forming our characters and making us what we ought to become. The Venus de Milo was not made with an ax or at a single stroke. It was chiseled, carved, polished by many million separate operations of the sculptor's hand.

Back of the yearning for the great renunciation is a vaulting and a morbid ambition to be talked of, to be put in the papers, to have people come to weep at our graves or adorn them with flowers or, if our renunciation does not prove mortal, then to have people say: "That's the one. You heard about that! Wasn't it perfectly splendid?" Exactly the sentiment, the desire for notoriety, that nerves the arms of assassins, that inspires those awful atrocities that redden the pages of history! We should be ashamed to entertain such a thought for a moment.

But the little renunciations! The cups of cold water that might be handed out, but are not! The blind and aged that need to be read to; the waifs at all the foundling institutions in San Francisco and Oakland that have rolled around on the floor on a blanket, staring up at the ceilings, until the hair was all worn off the backs of their heads, waifs that might be taken into the open air, tossed up and down, played with and talked to; the ill who might be taken auto-riding, the growing boy that needs a friendly hand laid upon his shoulder and a few sane words whispered into the ear from someone beside a nagging mother and a berating father! What a lot of time these would all take! What renunciations on our part would they involve! And no one might ever hear of it or say a word about it and, worst of all, the beneficiaries themselves might forget to be grateful! No, those things are not for us. Give us one big renunciation or give us none, give us one worth while or trouble us not. We do not say these things in so many words. We only act them year in and year out without words and almost without thoughts.

We have no right to live heedlessly, to go unthinkingly through the world, to overlook the little things that beset us at every turn because our eyes are set upon the few Shasta peaks that stand out where all can see them. What were our minds given us for if not to order our steps sanely?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Why Not Learn to Spell?

Back in York county, Pennsylvania, a superintendent of schools, who is wise in his day and generation, has prepared a list of words in common use and proposes to conduct a series of old-fashioned spelling bees throughout the schools of the county—this in order that the pupils, with all their other getting, may get orthography. It is an excellent superintendent who has done this thing, for the pupils of today need such training. They are educated somewhat in certain sciences which were not included in their fathers' curriculum, but very frequently the old gentlemen could spell "all around them." The same remark might apply, too, to other basic studies, for pa's arithmetic is not unlikely to beat Percy's, and the chances are fair that he is the better reader of the two. Occasionally indeed, one almost might be forced to the reasonable conclusion that our schools of today sometimes regard very excellent frills to the neglect of essentials which are no less essential because they are old-fashioned. However, to return to our knit—that is, to our spelling, perhaps the hard times upon which it has fallen may best be indicated by a report, prepared by Professor Bailey, concerning the spelling of the students of Yale university, and certainly Yale students may be considered the very cream which rises to the top of the milk of our educational system. According to this report, then, one student in seven is an accurate speller; the other six make more or less of a failure of guessing. Is it not evident that there is something wrong with the educational system of gardening which produces that variety of blossom at Yale? The frills are all right; indeed, they are not frills, but real learning; but they should not be heeded to the neglect of "the three R's," or of spelling, either.

An Ancient Garden Again to Bloom

Time was when the valley of the Tigris and the Euphrates "blossomed as the rose," but that was long centuries ago, and since then ancient man's irrigation systems have disappeared, the desert has crept in upon the wide-reaching garden, and a dreary, gray wilderness has painted its mirages where millions of men once dwelt. Now the process of decay is to be reversed, a navigable canal is to be built from Bagdad—scene of Scheherazade's tales of an impossible, but hardly less real, dreamland—to Caliphate, a distance of 75 miles, and through these regions, too, the Bagdad railroad is to pass. It is a most torrid land, the summer heat running from 115 to 122 above zero, but the soil is fertile, the mineral wealth considerable, and, with the introduction of water, much of the olden bloom and prosperity undoubtedly will return to it. So the thousand and one nights of Arabian enchantment are drawing unto the dawn of modern progress, and the day of development is advancing. This is an era when the New succeeds the Old most rapidly, but in all its myriad changes there perhaps will be none which will appeal more to the imagination than does this rebirth of the Bagdad of most puissant Haroun-al-Raschid.

Comparative Cost of a Battleship

Whether this nation builds one, two, or more mighty battleships in the immediate future, the cost of one, as indicated by comparisons made by the national peace society, should be of interest to everybody who helps to pay the price, whether in coin or something that is redder and dearer. Following are comparisons of cost made by the society: The cost of a battleship would build a first-class macadam road between New York and Chicago; it would build fifty large manual training schools and equip them with all essential tools and appliances; it would construct two such buildings as the Congressional Library in Washington, and it is the finest library building in the world; it would pay nearly half of the cost of making the proposed six-foot canal in the Mississippi river from St. Paul to the mouth of the Missouri river; three-fourths of the cost would pay for the construction of the Salt river valley (Arizona) irrigation system, which will open 240,000 acres of rich land to settlement; it would build and equip forty Young Men's Christian Association buildings of eight stories apiece. So run a few comparative costs. They make it fairly evident, do they not, that a battleship is a very costly piece of furniture in Uncle Sam's household equipment?

Condiments in the Menu All Right

The London Lancet, a medical journal of much repute, comes to the rescue of some of us who, after reading diatribes in certain "health journals," had begun to fear that salt, pepper, mustard, vinegar, olive oil, etc., were to be banished from our bills of fare. Let us read the Lancet's own words in relation to the matter, and rejoice in them: "Mustard, pepper and salt, used of course in sensible amounts, assist the appetite, give a zest for food, and partly by reflex action as well as local action stimulate the flow of digestive juices and insure healthy assimilation. Even vinegar is known to have a softening effect on tough fibres, and hence its use is justified in so many instances. Lastly, the use of oil in a salad is a sound physiological procedure, for it supplies an aliment which is deficient in the salad vegetable, while as a vehicle for the uniform distribution of food materials in the body it does excellent service." If it chances that the reader likes a "sensible amount" of seasoning in his edibles, and at the same time is thrown much in contact with "food cranks," it may be well for him to cut this paragraph out and keep it somewhere where it will be convenient for reference.

The "Aerofahrplan" Is the Latest.

The "Aerofahrplan" is its name, and it is the first airship guide ever published. The place of its publication is Munich, Bavaria, and it gives the dates, hours and fares of an airship service which is to begin May 15, of this year, and terminate for the season on September 30. A brief glance at the fares will convince anybody that the service will not be generally patronized by all classes of people. For example, the ticket for a ride of three hours' duration costs $55, while the price of an all-day ride is $137.50. If one desires to be really exclusive and select, a special car may be hired for $1,375 a day, which ought to beat "joy riding" as a demonstration that one belongs to the higher circles. An airship station, which now is being constructed, will be 250 feet long, 130 feet wide and 83 feet high, and as this is but one item, it will be realized that there must be some income to match the expenditures.

RESIDENCE DISTRICT OPTION FOR SAN FRANCISCO

Beginning next Sunday (March 20th) with a women's mass meeting at Calvary Presbyterian church, there will be launched a four-weeks' campaign for "residence district option" in San Francisco. This is a movement to apply the local option principle to the cities, so that the saloons may be driven from the home sections and congregated in the business districts, where they can be watched.

Every Sunday, until and including April 17th, a mass-meeting will be held. Every weekday, except Saturdays, district meetings will be held. The first week will be devoted to Sunset and Richmond, the second week to South San Francisco and North Beach, the third week to the Mission, and the last week to the Western Addition.

The meetings will all be held by Miss Marie C. Brehm, of Chicago. Miss Brehm has been a traveling temperance lecturer for twelve years, and is an authority on the liquor question. She was one of the seven delegates sent by the United States Government to the International Congress on Alcoholism in London last July. She is now lecturer for the temperance committee of the general assembly of the Presbyterian church of America.

Residence district option is right, and should be allowed by law. Every good citizen who wants the saloon kept away from his children's constant notice should attend these meetings when they are held in his district and join actively in the work of promoting the legislation sought by Miss Brehm. Her local work is under the auspices of a joint committee representing the churches, the Anti-Saloon League, the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the Volunteers of America.

The first Edison medal, which is intended to rank in electrical science with the Nobel prizes, has been awarded to Prof. Elihu Thomson.

GOSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

OF ILLUSTRATIONS

The fine old art of illustration has fallen on evil days with the rise of the cheap novel with the saccharine heroine and the "happy" ending. The idea of an illustration in these days is a picture of a football hero in advertised "spring suitings" with the shoulders over-padded and the trousers peg-topped, gazing admiringly into the eyes of a Harrison Fisher girl clad in stunning raiment and a picture hat. As Kipling says, "It's pretty, but is it art?" Or, we would say, "It may be art, but does it illustrate?"

To be brutally frank, it does not. Transpose the illustrations of "The Fashionable Adventures of Joshua Craig" into a copy of "The White House," and the average reader would never know the difference. Joshua Craig, as the artist depicts him, has already done service as the hero of a dozen equally sloppy novels, and the tall heroine has merely changed her dress and bought a new hat since she moved in from the last best seller.

But recall Sir John Tenniel's illustrations of "Alice in Wonderland" and note the difference. Character is drawn into line of every personage of the book, from Alice to the Mad Hatter and from the Turtle to the Cheshire Cat. Here is a wealth of imagination and power applied by the artist to an interpretation of the book, and so subtly has he entered into Carroll's whimsicalities that the drawings are instantly accepted by the reader as being delightful and adequate visualizations of the text. And for Peter Newell to venture, as he did a few years ago, to attempt to replace Tenniel's classic drawings with his grotesque idiots was the last word in impertinence and folly.

Another wholly successful example of illustrating is the work of "Phiz" (Browne) on Dicken's "Pickwick Papers." How admirably he caught the spirit of the book and how graphically he presented, each in unmistakable character, the humorous Sam Weller, the beaming Mr. Pickwick, the widow Bardell, Stiggins, and the rest. No need here, as in modern illustrations, to wonder who is who in the pictures. These illustrations really illustrate; they enforce and make vivid the printed description of the author.

Perhaps one other point of difference between the older and the modern book drawings, may help explain the greater effectiveness in the past. The older artists almost invariably chose for the subjects of their illustrations those moments in which the action of the plot is most intense, when the physical bodies of the characters are grouped in their most striking relations and when their facial expressions are most affected by their situation in the story. By this choice their pictures always convey the impression of liveliness, of movement, of activity.

On the other hand, modern illustrators choose moments of quiescence, group their characters sitting or in a reverie, and draw portraits of thoughtful youths and maidens, very pretty as portraits, but suggesting no action, no living movement. And the drawings themselves seem like photographs of a stage group when the actors "stand on the picture," as the old stage managers used to say—in other words, pause for a moment, as in a tableau, in a striking attitude, which is well enough as an attitude, but which, in a picture, suggests a state of suddenly arrested animation.

Then, too, the older artist had no fears about depicting violent gestures, extreme expressions of joy or sorrow, slightly exaggerated effects of emotion. Quite otherwise his modern successor. His characters must be "correct"—heavens, yes! perfectly "correct"—they must have "poise" and "dignity," forsooth. Well, the result is a "correctness" after the style of the Kuppenheimer clothing ads, and "poise" after the character of Ladies' Home Journal fashion models, and "dignity" of the type of the corset "demonstrators" in a department store.

Another point (as long as we are after the scalp of the modern illustrator we had as well get it whole) is this: the older illustrators drew pictures, complete groups with their background of scenery or rooms. The modern illustrators draw "heads," with the body "suggested," as they say, and the background—well, we presume that is taken for granted. A smudge of black at the feet of the figures indicates a sustaining relation between earth and mortals which is some comfort, for the worst of them do not establish even this frail connection with mundane things.

Here we cease. Since Kemble ended his career as an illustrator we have seen but one genuine illustrator, Maxfield Parrish. Even he prefers the decorative and the ideal to a just, human interpretation of characters. But he at least preserves some of the good old traditions.

GOETHE MANUSCRIPTS FOUND

German literary circles are bubbling with joy over the discovery in Zurich of the original manuscripts of the first four volumes of Goethe's novel "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre," well known to English and American readers in Carlyle's translation called "Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship," says the Times, of New York.

Goethe wrote six of the eight books of the work between 1777 and 1785, before his departure for Italy, and sent them on one occasion to his friend Barbara Schulthess at Zurich. Although the manuscripts just come to light have for a century been considered irrevocably lost, and are not in Goethe's own handwriting, their authenticity has been recognized by two eminent German historians, Profs. Richard Meyer and Erich Schmidt. They number 600 sheets, and will probably be acquired by the Goethe Museum archives at Weimar.

Californian Poets' Corner

DUM VIVIMUS VIGILAMUS

By C. H. Webb

Charles Henry Webb was the author of the Californian, the first literary weekly established in San Francisco. After some years Webb went to New York, where as a humorous writer he was a favorite contributor to some of the leading magazines. His death took place about two years since.

Turn out more ale, turn up the light;
I will not go to bed to-night.
Of all the foes that man should dread
The first and worst one is a bed.
Friends I have had both old and young,
And ale we drank and songs we sung:
Enough you know when this is said,
That, one and all,—they died in bed.
In bed they died, and I'll not go
Where all my friends have perished so.
Go you who glad would buried be,
But not to-night a bed for me.

For me to-night no bed prepare,
But set me out my oaken chair,
And bid no other guests beside
The ghosts that shall around me glide;
In curling smoke-wreaths I shall see
A fair and gentle company,
Though silent all, rare revellers they,
Who leave you not till break of day.
Go you who would not daylight see,
But not to-night a bed for me:
For I've been born and I've been wed—
All of man's peril comes from bed.

And I'll not seek—what'er befall—
Him who unbidden comes to all.
A greswome guest, a lean-jawed wight—
God send he do not come to-night!
But if he do, to claim his own,
He shall not find me lying prone;
But blithely, bravely, sitting up,
And raising high the stirrup-cup.
And if you find a pipe unfilled,
An empty chair, the brown ale spilled;
Well may you know, though nought be said,
That I've been borne away to bed.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF

Miss Alcott's Books

All the sweet memories of childhood float back to us at the sound of the name of Louisa May Alcott. To how many millions is she the literary mother, who had no children of her own. We once knew a man who had grown gruff and austere through long years at business who astonished us one day, when her name was mentioned, by bursting out into one of the most feeling and eloquent tributes of affection for her books that we ever heard.

Miss Alcott had the almost unique—perhaps it is more just simply to say unique—gift of remembering at maturity the exact emotional and mental capacities of early childhood, and of writing books which at once record those capacities for the elders and appeal to those capacities in the children. Such a gift is an endowment of genius. Only Mark Twain and Thomas Hughes have approached it, and they only in the psychology of boyhood. Miss Alcott, better than they, knew the state of mind of all children at the age of greatest ingenuousness and innocence.

Sweetness, wholesomeness, and motherliness are the great characteristics of her books. Man grown, when we re-read them, we feel a little that the sweetness is a touch too sweet. But to the children they will always be ideal, "the best stories ever."

DESCENDANT OF CONFUCIUS

The New York Times says that the only living lineal descendant of Confucius is expected to be one of the star attractions at this year's centennial jubilee of the University of Berlin. The proposal to have him represent China at the jubilee emanates from the accomplished Chinese minister at Berlin, Gen. Yin-chang, who is trying to induce the Peking government to act on his suggestion.

The minister thinks that China, as the land of the oldest culture and literature, ought to be notably represented among the galaxy of intellectuals which the Berlin jubilee will bring together.

The present-day representative of the Confucius family, like his predecessors, has the title and rank of Duke and enjoys all the honors of royalty. The local university authorities sincerely hope that he may persuade himself to make this unique excursion into the Occident.

BJORNSON'S THOUGHTS

A Norwegian paper tells the following story about Bjornson, the national novelist, poet and dramatist: One day he was traveling through Valdres and was going to cross Filefjeld. His conveyance was a carriage, with a boy, as usual, perched behind. The road was very muddy, and the poet and the boy beguiled the slow journey with lively talk.

Presently there was a long silence. Bjornson was buried in thought. At last the boy said: "What are you thinking of now, Bjornson?"

"Oh," said the writer, "I was thinking how the big wheel of the carriage reminds me of the wheel of time, which whirls great men away from each other. Ibsen is in Germany. Jonas Lie in Paris. Christopher Jansen in America and here am I sitting rattling along in a carriage."

The boy made no answer, but in his turn seemed wrapped in thought. Coming to a flat stretch of road Bjornson whipped up the horse and the wheels of the carriage ran more quickly through the mud.

"What are you thinking of?" said Bjornson at last to the boy.

"Oh," was the answer, "I was only thinking of how that big wheel of the carriage throws one large piece of mud here and another there." Bjornson relapsed into silence and thought.

Owen Wister is the grandson of Fanny Kemble, the great actress, and a great grand-nephew of Sarah Siddons.

HEALTH EFFICIENCY IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

EFFECT OF CORRECTION OF DEFECTS ON MENTALITY AND DEPORTMENT

If your son or daughter comes home from school every month with a poor report upon his (or her) studies or with a black mark after the word "deportment", take him to the family physician. The chances are about three to one that the child has some physical defect that is easy to remedy once you find it.

So says Dr. N. K. Foster, director of the department of health development and sanitation in the public schools of Oakland. He has proved the theory to his satisfaction and to the satisfaction of the public in Oakland. And in stating the theory and giving his experience he is simply repeating the theory and the experience of the pioneers in the similar department of the public schools of New York. The theory has an addition, which is: two-thirds of the crime in the world is directly traceable to the neglect of physical defects in childhood. The wherefore of the whole theory follows.

Doctor Foster cites a case to illustrate the possible consequences of such neglect, and adds, "This is not an idle fairy tale: it is a statement of a really not uncommon experience."

There is, let us say, a boy in school who is notoriously dull and stupid. He never knows his lessons. The teacher does not know why, the boy does not know why, his classmates never think of wondering why, but take his stupidity for granted. The boy does know that whenever he looks at his book the words all dance about on the page and then run together. He does not know that this is what makes him tired when he tries to study, nor that this is the reason he never reads the lesson aright. But that is just what happens. Then the teacher asks him a question and he cannot answer. She gets angry and tells him to "read it aloud to the class." He tries to do so, but the words run together and he stumbles over a simple sentence. The other boys laugh. Humiliated, the boy becomes balky and refuses to try. The teacher coaxes, then thrashes him. The boy runs away from school. He is thrashed at home and the principal of the school expels him. The boy out of school drifts into bad company, is caught several times in mischief, is given up as incorrigible and is sent to the reform school. He graduates from the reform school and the companionship of criminals at the same time, and enters on a life of crime. He serves a term or two in prison. Between times he commits burglary, meets with resistance, and kills the resister. He goes to the gallows.

Now, it sounds too absurdly simple to say it, but it is the truth none the less, that this whole train of misfortune and crime and sorrow to his family and cost to the state arose from a mere defect of the boy's vision. He was near-sighted and nobody knew enough to find it out. Literally, the difference in that boy's destiny between usefulness as a citizen and viciousness as a desperate criminal lay in a $2 pair of glasses, bought at the proper time.

But it was nobody's business to find out that he needed them. That was the deficiency that Doctor Foster was appointed to fill in the Oakland schools. It is his business, in conjunction with the teacher, to examine all the pupils who show any visible signs of physical defects and to let the parents know that these defects exist and that the future welfare of their children depends upon prompt remedial measures. And already the results are astonishing, especially in view of the facts that Doctor Foster was appointed only last fall and that until the beginning of the present term of the school year he had no assistance except from the teachers.

Doctor Foster has tabulated the records of 1,300 pupils examined by him prior to February 1st, and finds that their cases were divided as to defects as follows:

Vision	485
Teeth	431
Disease of tonsils	424
Defective nasal breathing	251

Enlarged glands	246
Hearing	226
Adenoids	217
Malnutrition	66
Disease of skin	11
Orthopedic	8
Serious disease of lungs	7
Disease of nerves	7
Disease of heart	6
Palate	4

From the illustration used earlier in this article it appears how defective vision affects character and study. The relation of defective teeth is less clear until it is explained. Few parents realize that upon the care of the first teeth the quality of the second set depends. The result is that children's teeth are not properly attended to, and they decay. This decayed matter accumulates in their mouths to an unbelievable extent, so that every time the child swallows he washes down active poison into the stomach. This poison deteriorates the digestion and, which is worse, it impairs the absorptive power of the intestines, causing an impoverishment of the blood. At the same time the blood is poisoned by the absorption of the poison from the teeth. The effect of this impoverishment and poisoned blood upon the brain is that the brain, like the rest of the body, is undernourished, and the child becomes stupid.

The relation of defective nasal breathing, of disease of the palate, and of adenoids, to the development of character and brain is also dependent upon impoverished blood, but impoverishment from another source. All three of these defects reduce the quantity of air that may be taken into the lungs at each breath or they deteriorate its quality. In either case the effect is the same: the child does not get enough oxygen in his lungs to purify the blood properly, and, as the blood feeds the brain, the child's brain is fed with impure blood, and the child becomes stupid.

Enlarged glands are an evidence of lowered vitality. Certain diseases of the skin and the orthopedic defects produce a very depressing effect upon the nervous system which inevitably reacts upon the child's power to concentrate his mind upon his studies and reacts also upon his temperament.

Doctor Foster's tabulations showed another surprising fact: that more children had two defects than had only one. The exact figures are these:

With one defect	411
With two defects	492
With three defects	263
With four defects	45
With five defects	13
With six defects	6

In Doctor Foster's work, the co-operation of the teachers is most important. The selection of pupils for examination by the doctor was necessarily left to them, as it is physically impossible for one man to examine all the school children of Oakland. The teachers showed a varying quickness of apprehension of the idea of the work, though they unanimously, and gladly aided it. One teacher detected 28 defective pupils out of 58. Another teacher, in a class of about the same size, declared that none of the pupils was defective. Doctor Foster's method in this case is illuminative. Sitting beside the teacher at her desk, and speaking in a low voice, he said:

"Do you see that boy in the third seat in the first row of desks nearest the window?"

"Yes."

"Don't you observe anything unusual about him?"

"No, I think not."

"But don't you see that his lips are apart and that he is breathing through his mouth instead of his nose?"

"Oh, that! Of course! But he has always done that."

"Certainly, but he should not breathe that way. He should breathe through his nose. How is he in his studies?"

"Dull."

"Precisely. Put him down on your blank form there as a 'mouth breather.' Now, do you see that girl in the tenth seat in the third row?"

"Yes. She is dull, too."

"But don't you see that she is holding her book right up against her eyes?"

"Yes, but she's always done that."

"She has to—she is nearsighted."

"I never thought of that."

"Exactly. Check off 'defective sight' on the form for her."

A similar casual examination, without leaving his chair, disclosed a dozen pupils with defects. By the time Doctor Foster left the room the teacher knew how to locate the more obvious of these defects at a glance.

The form referred to by Doctor Foster is made in duplicate and contains blanks for the teacher to fill out answering the following questions:

Pupil's name, age, address, father's name and nationality, mother's name and nationality, is the pupil affected with defective hearing, defective sight, nervousness, headache, cough, offensive breath, decayed teeth, or is he a "mouth breather." Other questions relate to the child's physical activity, vicious habits, mentality, conduct, proficiency, cleanliness, age, weight and height.

Other spaces on the blank are to be filled in by the doctor when he examines the child. They indicate his diagnosis of the defect. One copy of the blank is filed by the teacher, the other is filed in Dr. Foster's office. From the blank a slip is made out for the child to carry home to his parents. This slip is a formal note stating that the child is afflicted by a certain defect (named in the slip) and suggesting that the parents should immediately take the child to the family physician for treatment.

Of the pupils examined by Dr. Foster, and by him recommended to medical treatment, about 25 per cent promptly went to physicians and were treated. The remainder delayed for one cause or another, but the percentage of those failing to act on the advice will be very small. Of those who have already been treated, the invariable report of their teachers and parents is "better health and better scholarship." The improvement is almost always immediately noticeable.

Of course there are families in straitened circumstances who find it inconvenient to comply with the suggestions made by Dr. Foster. But the recognition of the value of his work bids fair to eliminate all sources of reluctance on the score of financial embarrassment. The opticians and oculists of Oakland have already agreed to examine the eyes of any school child free of charge, and to supply glasses to fill the prescriptions at a nominal rate. Dr. Foster has an ordinance before the supervisors, which will probably pass, providing an annual appropriation to pay for glasses where they are needed.

The dental association of Oakland, also, is working on a plan by which all the dentists will unite to found a free dental clinic, at which the care of the children's teeth will be entirely provided for in cases of inability to pay. And the free clinics at the hospitals take care of the operations for adenoids, tonsils, etc.

Dr. Foster's work has grown so rapidly and has proved so valuable that two nurses have been added to his staff, relieving him of part of the growing burden of examinations, and adding to the usefulness of his office by providing a "follow-up" system for checking up the results of the work. These nurses visit the parents after the children have been sent to a physician, and make a record of the results of treatments. They visit the teachers, and check up the results on classroom efficiency.

But the work has already demonstrated its tremendous importance. It is humanitarianism practiced at the preventive stage, heading off incipient evils, and adding health and intelligent enjoyment of life to hundreds of children. Every school board in the state should study the Oakland example, and apply it, in modified form, to local conditions.

Playin' Us for Green

(To the old tune.)

McCarthy, dear, and did you hear
The news that's goin' round?
'Tis said a mayor's words are queer
When they're of hoodlum sound.
A verbal threat to "smash his jaw"
Is safe with miles between,
But there should be a law agin'
This playin' us for green.

McCarthy, dear, 'tis whispered here
The Geary road's delayed
To help the cunnin' little game
United Railroads played;
'Tis said Spring Valley looks to you,
And winks, with hopeful mien,
And, faith, the rumor's goin' round
You're playin' us for green.

McCarthy, lad, 'tis said, bedad,
Graft stock is on the rise,
That Ruef and Schmitz are feelin' gay
And Pat Calhoun looks wise.
An' what it manes I wish you'd hint,
Yourself and me between,
For, oh, the rumor seems to grow
You're playin' us for green.

Little Political Fables

Organization Sharp and the Shell Game

A certain Organization Sharp who for years had run a shell game in connection with the Political Circus thus addressed the people about him:

"Between my thumb and my middle finger, as you will observe, gentlemen, I hold the little Nomination pea. Watch it carefully, gentlemen, watch it carefully. Every move I make, you will perceive, is in plain sight. Nothing is hidden, nothing is obscure. Watch my fingers, gentlemen; pay close attention while I move the Anderson shell—the Stanton shell—the Curry shell. Every movement is visible, gentlemen, nothing is hidden. Now then, under which shell did I place the little Nomination pea? Talk right up, gentlemen. Do not hesitate. Do your betting now."

Some guessed the Anderson shell, some the Stanton shell, but a capper who stood in with the Organization Sharp removed the Curry shell, and there was the little Nomination pea.

Moral:—The people may guess all they please concerning where the Organization Sharp has placed his little Nomination pea, but all the time he knows right where it is, and so does a certain tall, black-eyed individual of Sacramento.

The Little Red Demon of Self

He is petty and wee, and we both agree
He is mean and contemptible, too,
But he shows us the earth where we had our birth,

And he says, "It should be for you;
So don't mind the rest, but grab for the best
Of boodle, applauses or pelf;
Another man's rue, it is nothing to you,"
Says the Little Red Demon of Self.

"Your burden of care is sufficient to bear,"
Says the Little Red Demon, says he,
"So it's wiser to dwell in your own narrow shell,

Nor be with your sympathy free.
The pain of another, though haply a brother,
'Tis better to lay on the shelf
Quite out of your view, for it's nothing to you,"
Says the Little Red Demon of Self.

Perhaps you opine that this jingle of mine
For you has no moral, and yet
There's one thing I know—or I think it is so—
This Little Red Demon you've met,
And his voice you have heard, and your spirit was stirred

By his whisper of glory or pelf.
How I know? Well, you see, he is boarding with me,
Is the Little Red Demon of Self.

(As narrated by little Algernon.)

My pa, he just stays at his office, you see,
But ma, she's as busy as busy can be.

For Monday there's the Uplift Club,
That proves how woman's crushed by hub;
On Tuesday ma must rush away,
For Votes-for-Women meets that day;
The Mothers' Club on Wednesday meets,
An' I have fun upon the streets;
The Thursday Club, ma says, is just
To prove that woman's chains is bust;
On Friday ma must edit then,
"The Women's Plea to Tyrant Men;"
The Browning Club on Saturday
Seeks what he meant but didn't say;
An' Sunday course ma makes things hum
To go to church, if her suit's come.

Yes, my ma's busy, our folks owns,
But pa just hangs around an' groans.

A Good Man for High Place

It may easily be that the reader does not know F. J. O'Brien, whom the Lincoln-Roosevelt League honored (and thereby honored itself) with its indorsement of his candidacy for Secretary of State. I do know him; have known him more than three years, and during about a third of that time worked by his side in daily companionship. In that time, and under such circumstances, one learns something of a man, and this is what I learned of F. J. O'Brien: He is a man of excellent executive ability; he does things, without deeming it necessary to blow his own bugle over these accomplishments; he is loyal to his friends and any interest he represents; above all, he is honest, neither buyable nor sellable. This, briefly, is the man as I know him, and I take it that these are such attributes as the people need, and sometimes do not find, in their officials. No corporation can own such a man; as servant of the people he will serve them faithfully. Honest men to represent honest men are needed in California, and F. J. O'Brien will be that kind if he is elected, as he should be.

Scientific Causes of Increased Prices

When I arrived at home I found Eliza in tears.

"Why, Eliza," said I, "what is the matter?"

"Oh, dear!" she replied, "sometimes I almost feel that the privilege of living isn't worth the price that is demanded. The cost of everything has gone up, and we have no aeroplane to overtake it. To-day $30 goes no farther than did $20 ten years ago, and I doubt that it goes as far. Oh, dear! Oh, dear!"

Such was the little domestic episode that caused me to investigate the prevailing high prices of articles of popular consumption, for, aside from the fact that money Eliza spends is earned by the sweat of my typewriting machine, I feel that it is the duty of every intelligent citizen to look into the causes of any phenomena of public interest. So I read the opinions of unprejudiced scientists, from "Jim" Hill downward, on this interesting topic. Right here I may remark in passing that I discovered that a number of these scientists maintain that prices have not increased, but, as I will not believe that Eliza is a liar, I dismissed this theory as untenable. Here are other theories that are maintained by various eminent authorities:

Theory 1—The earth is not producing food and clothing enough for its increasing population. This appears to involve a reflection upon the wisdom of the Almighty, but when one is compelled to make a choice between that and refusing to accept Scientific Authority what is one to do?

Theory 2—In this progresive era people in general are too extravagant. How true this is! For example, Eliza wants a spring suit, and I want an occasional cigar. To be sure, we wanted similar things ten years ago, but they cost less then, and consequently we were not so extravagant.

Theory 3—The tariff does it. Of course, during many conditions of prices we have had practically the same old tariff, and although Aldrich recently monkeyed with it, savants hold it a moot question whether he raised or lowered it. Still, this fact should not affect us. It is all right to attribute anything to the tariff, for everybody does so.

Theory 4—Over-production of gold has boosted prices. I have been somewhat distressed to note that most of the sages who maintain this theory are the same parties who a few years ago eloquently maintained that gold was the one God-given medium of exchange which in its very nature is staple, reliable and unchangeable. However, this fact should not weigh very heavily, as even sages have the privilege of changing their minds.

Theory 5—Halley's comet is approaching, and another and unheralded one recently appeared and disappeared. If this does not account for high prices, what does?

Theory 6—I feel some hesitancy about mentioning it, but numerous low-brows contend that, in order that the Trusts may maintain their beneficent rule over the people, they must and do increase prices so as to be able to declare satisfactory dividends. Of course, such an opinion, maintained by such people, is unworthy of any intelligent man's consideration.

The more I investigate the situation the more I feel incompetent to console Eliza. She may, indeed, have to go without her spring suit, and I should go without my cigars if I were not so fond of them.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

A. J. Wallace, Choice For Lieutenant-Governor

The indorsement, by a unanimous vote of the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League last Saturday, of the candidacy of A. J. Wallace of Los Angeles for nomination as Lieutenant-Governor of California, has given Hiram W. Johnson a strong running mate. A. J. Wallace is one of the most successful among the self-made business men of California. The combination of Johnson and Wallace is felicitous. Mr. Wallace did not seek the nomination, in fact he had completed arrangements for a European tour with his wife. Though a resident of Southern California, the League's candidate for the Lieutenant-Governorship is closely identified with many other sections of the state. He has extensive oil interests in Kern county and elsewhere, and owns and operates considerable areas of farming land in the San Joaquin valley and in Contra Costa and Monterey counties. Fully four-fifths of his financial interests are situated north of Tehachapi mountain, and few business men in the state enjoy a wider personal acquaintance from the Mexican border to the Sacramento river. In Los Angeles, where he is best known, A. J. Wallace is known as a man of unimpeachable integrity. During the first non-partisan campaign in Los Angeles, in 1906, he was besought to sacrifice his business and run for the city council. He agreed to serve the city in the crisis that confronted it. He was the only candidate for councilman put forward by the new non-partisan organization who received the indorsement of the Republican city convention. After an interesting campaign, he was elected by a handsome majority, and upon the organization of the council was made chairman of the important finance committee. In this capacity he became known as the "watchdog of the treasury." Through his individual efforts, generally after hard fights, tens of thousands of dollars were saved annually to the taxpayers.

Wallace's Interest In Public Affairs

Mr. Wallace's interest in public affairs has been by no means confined to Los Angeles and her institutions. He was one of the first men in the state to urge the establishment of a federal line of steamships on the Pacific coast to be operated in competition with the vessels controlled by the railroad and steamship trust. He has also been actively identified with the promotion of modern ideas of popular government, such as direct legislation. Many of the leaders of the progressive movement urged him to announce his candidacy for the United States senate, but the majority favored his nomination for Lieutenant-Governor. Mr. Wallace is about fifty years of age. He possesses all the fire and vigor of a man ten years younger. He is one of the ablest debaters in the state. On his feet he is a rapid thinker. He has the faculty of making quick decisions. Mr. Wallace is a brother of Senator Wallace of New York, the man who first publicly proposed the name of Theodore Roosevelt as a candidate for Governor of the Empire state.

State Campaign In Automobiles

Johnson and Wallace are planning a joint campaign which will be unique. In automobiles they will start shortly from the north end of the state, working their way southward. They will visit every center of population in every county of California, and will stop at as many of the less populous towns as they can possibly include in their itinerary. It is their idea to get closely in touch with the voters in every district. If their reception in Southern California is a fair criterion, their journey will be a triumphal tour without precedent in the annals of California.

Not "An," But "The"

Mr. Phil Stanton is reported by a friendly southern paper as having declared himself an "organization" man, justifying himself by going on to explain that there must be organization in politics or nothing can be accomplished. If correctly reported Mr. Stanton confuses the issue by confusing the terms. We all believe in "an" organization of Republicans, but it is to be hoped that the August primaries will disclose the truth that few Republicans believe in "the" organization as now applied to the Republican party in this state. "The" organization is something with which honest, liberty-loving Republicans have had little to do in forming. The organizing was done by and through the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. "The" organization is as obedient to that company as that company's maintenance-of-way, traffic, motive power or engineering departments, and it has at its head one of the vice-presidents of the Southern Pacific Company. When Republicans, through the direct primary law, get the machinery of their party into their own hands, and have an executive committee representative of them instead of a great association of corporations, we shall all be "organization" men, but not until the work of emancipation has been perfected. Mr. Stanton belongs, not to "an" organization, but to "the" organization. As to the truth of this the people of Southern California should not be of two opinions.

Phil A. Stanton A Likeable Man

The issue this year is not of men, although we want the best men nominated. There is at stake a principle vital to free government and, before that issue, the character of any candidate becomes of secondary importance. The Watchman knows Phil Stanton intimately. He is a fine fellow and ought to be doing better work than he is now doing. He is an "organization" man without at all times acting with the "organization" or taking orders from Mr. Herrin; but he is more erratic than independent, more likely to go off on a tangent than to be actuated by a high purpose. There are a good many Republican votes south of Tehachapi. If Phil Stanton could get them all and Republicans north of Tehachapi were to divide up between Johnson, Curry and Anderson, Stanton might secure the Republican nomination. If he falls short of a plurality of the votes cast in the state he may nevertheless hold so many Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicans in line for himself as a Southern California candidate as to make it possible for Curry to beat Johnson north of Tehachapi. If Stanton were out of the race Johnson would probably get two out of every three Republican votes cast south of the mountain. Stanton is lending himself to this political maneuver. If either Stanton or Curry were to win the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau would find itself as safely in the saddle as though Anderson won. The generalship of the scheme is not bad and is probably Mr. Herrin's. Stanton's part in it is not creditable. Those who allow themselves to be tricked out of meeting the emancipation issue by this or any other political maneuver are not wise.

The Case of C. F. Curry

Mr. Curry and his friends are making his campaign, that part of it that is being made openly and aboveboard, on the claim that he is not the "organization," or Southern Pacific candidate and many are being deceived thereby. What of it? Does that go to prove that, if elected, Mr. Curry will oppose Southern Pacific domination of the politics of this state? Does it mean that he, and not Hiram Johnson, will be the emancipator of California? Not a bit of it. Mr. Curry is not built that way. He has been three times on the Herrin political slate and three times nominated and elected through the aid of the Southern Pacific's political bureau. Not once in all these years has he antagonized that bureau. On the contrary his influence in and about the corridors of the state capitol during legislative sessions has always been exerted on behalf of that side of the political fence. If the event should prove that Mr. Curry was not Mr. Herrin's first choice for the Republican nomination for governor that would not imply that he was not his second choice or that Mr. Curry would not, if elected, work in harmony with the Southern Pacific Company. The political friends of Mr. Herrin and the political friends of Mr. Curry are one and the same. They are McCarthy and his following, the Royal Arch and all the votes it can muster, the political odd-jobs men all over the state and the vote they can hustle together. Why, then, should these two men be at outs? They are not, and even if they were at cross purposes, whoever can get together as strong a personal following as Mr. Curry has can do political business with Mr. Herrin, and will do it whenever their interests run along parallel lines, even if they were to hate each other like cats and dogs. If any Republican wants to see California made a free state, and the Republican party made a free party, there is just one candidate for him to vote for, and that is Hiram Johnson.

Frank McGowan

The candidacy of Hon. Frank McGowan, son of Humboldt, for Attorney General of California, has been launched. Away off up in one corner of the state, with only a trail leading out, Humboldt ought to have proven a good place for the nurture of men of character and independent spirit, men who love liberty and whose voices would always be lifted in the cause of free government. Indeed, they were so when they were sent forth, but somehow the deceitfulness of riches or the allurements of place have proven too much for them and put them, if not all then nearly all, upon the wrong side of right causes. Frank McGowan is one of them. He started out brilliantly. In assembly and senate he made reputations that he could take home with him without shame. Then he went into political retirement for a season, to emerge as candidate of the associated villainies for district attorney of the city and county of San Francisco in opposition to William H. Langdon at the most crucial moment in the graft prosecutions. That was a gratuitous and unpardonable offense against public decency and, in the estimation of all right thinking persons, wrote "finis" to the public career of Hon. Frank McGowan of Humboldt. Naturally a fine fellow, having a splendid mentality and an honorable ambition, he showed in that campaign that there are limitations to his power to resist evil influences. He fell, and very jarring was his impact with mother earth, of which truth he will be fully persuaded when the August votes have been counted. The brand of the Sunset Route shows too distinctly upon him not to be seen by all men, no matter how he may arrange his attire.

Is There More to It Than Has Yet come to Light?

Some strange selections are made when men are chosen to be made martyrs of. On the face of the matter Robert T. Devlin, United States attorney for this district, is a martyr, because he is likely to lose his office for having done his duty. He prosecuted and convicted Benson and Perrin, the land speculators, of violation of the United States laws, and Benson is in prison, while in Perrin's case the conviction was set aside by the appellate court. Perrin has fought hard to prevent the United States senate from confirming Devlin's reappointment, and now the judiciary committee has reported the nomination unfavorably. Devlin says his only fault in this business is that of doing his duty where a wealthy man was accused of wronging the government, and it looks as though such is the fact. Assuming it to be so, Devlin is a martyr. And yet he is a strange candidate for the crown—a man who has been a chronic seeker for offices, a devoted servant of the political machine, long attorney for the Southern Pacific company, a person who would be expected to sacrifice anybody or anything rather than himself. The very peculiarity of the situation for a man such as Devlin has made many believe there must be something more in the affair than has come to public attention up to this time.

Opportunities To Be Useful

The supposed uncertainties of the direct primary law are exerting an influence this year in the direction of deterring candidates which is not likely to prevail to anything like the same extent in future years, when experience shall have made politicians more familiar with the scheme of things. A number of remunerative offices are almost going begging. There are the three railroad commissionerships, which pay six thousand dollars a year. While the present commissioners would like to succeed themselves, and will make some attempt to do so, every one knows that as to two of them this will be an impossibility if strong men in whom the people have confidence come out against them. But there is a scarcity of candidates, and the Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will have to do some hunting if it is going to fill these places acceptably at its next meeting. The same is true with regard to the State Board of Equalization, the members of which are paid four thousand dollars a year and do not by any means work all the time, although the law says they shall. Here again the incumbents aspire to succeed themselves and appear in most instances to lack competitors. These offices furnish first-class opportunities to be genuinely useful. They have been regarded by the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau as sufficiently important to justify almost unbroken ownership and control.

Herrin for Curry Sure as Preaching

It is unfortunate that Mr. W. F. Herrin does not see fit to take the public into his confidence and blurt right out whom he is for for governor, honestly and unequivocally, but he does not and this forces his opponents to divine his purposes as best they may by "putting this and that together," as the saying is. The following incident is strictly true, but, for reasons personal to our informant, we are not able to give names and dates as we should like to. Our information is that a sterling Lincoln-Roosevelter has a friend in San Jose who is, or heretofore has been, an "organization" man, although he may be a bit "wobbly" by now. He has been talking Anderson for governor. A few days since this man met another "organization" friend of his on the streets of San Jose and was astonished to find him working for Curry. Knowing that this friend was closer to the heart of the "organization" head than he was himself, he called the Curry man to one side and demanded to know what he meant by it. "Isn't Anderson the 'straight dope'?" he wanted to know. "No," was the reply, "I saw Mr. Herrin day before yesterday and he told me that Curry is all right." Which goes to show that Alden Anderson has been put up to hold a certain reputable Republican vote from Hiram Johnson, but only to be "Crockered" twenty-four to forty-eight hours before the August primary will be held. By the way, Mr. Anderson's resignation as State Bank Commissioner has not been tendered to the governor. He would do well to hold to that office peradventure. One more pointer: It comes to us very straight that Frank McGowan is for Curry as Curry was for Frank McGowan when he was running for district attorney to beat Langdon. Now W. F. Herrin is for Frank McGowan for attorney general. Doesn't that clinch it?

Political Muddle In Old Mendocino

However party lines among the people may be drawn in Mendocino county they are drawn lightly enough among the court house ring. The head men of both parties get together in advance of the primaries, apportion so many offices to the Republicans and so many to the Democrats, put up dummies in opposition, or pool the controllable vote for the candidates of their combination, and so hold the court house against all comers. Their plans went awry for the first time two years ago, when Preston made a single-oared race for the assembly and won by a plurality of 418 votes over the combination candidate, or a clear majority of 243 over all. That was an astonisher for Mendocino and it opened the eyes of the people to future possibilities. The combination man for governor in that county is Charles F. Curry. His center of gravity is Ukiah, and it is not impossible that a good many "organization" Democrats in that stronghold of Democracy may register as Republicans in order to give Curry a boost in August. Doubtless the Royal Arch has a hand in this. Per contra, on the coast side of the county the Republican sentiment is strong for Johnson and the emancipation of state and county from "organization" control. It will be a pretty fight. John McNab, who concluded after his late visit to San Francisco that he would not be running for governor this time, is expected to swing the county "organization" in August, but he'll have his hands full. The faces of the people seem to be set toward better things than bargaining away their liberty for a petty state office, like clerk of the supreme court, that ought not to be a state office anyhow.

Mr. Johnson's Itinerary In Northern California

Mr. Johnson returns to San Francisco Sunday, the 20th. The first few days of next week will be devoted to his law practice, but the entire month of April he will devote to a series of meetings with the people of Northern and Interior California for the purpose of getting acquainted. Subject only to unavoidable alterations, his meetings will be as follows: April 1st, San Jose; 2nd, Palo Alto; 4th, Yreka; 5th, Sisson; 6th, Dunsmuir; 7th, Redding; 8th, Red Bluff; 9th, Chico; 11th, Oroville; 12th, Marysville; 13th, Nevada City; 14th, Grass Valley; 15th, Auburn; 16th, Sacramento. A tentative schedule for the rest of the month is as follows: April 18th, Woodland; 19th, Colusa; 21st, Suisun; 22nd, Benicia; 23rd, Vallejo; 25th, Calistoga; 26th, St. Helena; 27th, Napa; 28th, San Francisco.

TOO MANY TO HATCH ANY

Johnson's Plan of A State Campaign

The plan for Mr. Johnson's campaign is this: The present tour of Southern California and the tour of Northern California outlined above, are preliminary and for the purpose of meeting the public informally. The last three months of the campaign before the primary election will be devoted to a thorough, systematic canvass of the entire state, beginning at the north and going clear through to the Mexican border, visiting every nook and corner of the state, including those previously visited, meeting the entire electorate of the state and personally putting before them the vital issue of Government by the People vs. Government by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. If Mr. Johnson's earnestness and sincerity, as well as the personal magnetism of his address, do not sweep the state we miss our guess.

Straws to Show How Wind Blows

Max J. Kuhl, state organizer for the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, was in San Francisco a few days this week between trips to the northern counties. He reports enthusiastic support of Johnson's candidacy in Petaluma, Santa Rosa, Healdsburg and the coast towns of Mendocino county. Healdsburg was a surprise, as this is the home town of Lou Norton, chief deputy to Charlie Curry. Another Curry camp was found in Ukiah, but as this is normally Democratic, it did not loom disastrous. The Republican part of Mendocino county, the coast lumber country, is strong for Johnson. Another straw to show how the wind blows, learned from another source, is that the men who are supposed to be working for Alden Anderson in San Jose are found, when sounded, to be hot for prompt organization of Johnson clubs for them to join and use to make Johnson's campaign in Santa Clara of the whirlwind variety.

The Berkeley Plank That Melvin Rejected

When the Republicans of Alameda held their last county convention the Berkeley delegation went in for Right Things with an earnestness that accomplished much, but the delegation was not completely successful. Judge Melvin was candidate to succeed himself on the superior bench. The worst blunder the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League made was in not fighting him to the finish as being a judge head over ears in politics. It would have been notice to the state as to the political proclivities of the man and would have beaten him for the supreme bench. The Berkeley plank that was rejected read thus: "We urge the enactment of laws that will secure the non-partisan nomination and election of the judges of the superior courts, of the district courts of appeal and of the supreme court. To this end we recommend that candidates for such judgeships be nominated by non-partisan direct primary elections, or by petition, and that the names of nominees be placed on the ballot in a column by themselves and without any designation on the ballot indicative of the source of nomination or support." This plank did not commend itself to the friends of Judge Melvin on the platform committee and for that reason was not incorporated in the platform. Judge Melvin was responsible for that failure.

Some Final News Notes

Lee C. Gates has concluded that he cannot afford to make the race for United States senator. Well, then, he should go to the state senate or assembly. He is too valuable a man to be left out altogether at a time like this.

The progress of Hiram W. Johnson through the southern part of the state has been little short of an ovation. He seems likely to sweep the state no matter how many, or how few, candidates the Political Bureau has against him.

Senator Flint has ceased wobbling and reaffirmed his affirmation that he will not be a candidate to succeed himself. This makes former Governor Gage the natural Southern Pacific candidate, unless "Southern California wants me" Gillett.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican endorsement for United States senator is reported as lying between Willis Booth and Joseph Scott of Los Angeles, good men but not much known outside of Southern California. It were better to back Chester H. Rowell, who is known and known to be of senatorial size, and near enough to Southern California to serve all reasonable requirements. His being president of the League naturally interferes with such candidacy, in fact prevents his aspiring at all, but the state has not so much senatorial timber, free or bond, Republican or Democratic, that it can afford to waste any.

"How did you attain your eminent position?" asked the scientist. "Natural selection," said Senator Sorghum. "You mean that you are specially fitted by your ancestry?" "No. Nothing like that. I just naturally selected the offices I wanted and went after them."—Washington Star.

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Enclosed find check for subscription. The way that you tackle prevailing evils in public affairs in California is certain to result to the public good. Your treatment of these matters cannot be too highly commended.

Yours truly,

BARCLAY HENLEY.

San Francisco, Cal., March 9, 1910.

Time was when the daily press was as free to take the right side of public issues as The California Weekly is now, but that was before advertising, the function of being a traveling bulletin board, came to be its chief reason for existing. By the performance of this function the price of papers to the public has been so cheapened that no paper can exist without carrying advertising, and the advertisers, and not the readers, have come to dominate the policies of most papers. The big advertisers are, as a rule, less interested in having public evils exploited than they are in having them covered up and so, in their interests, the daily press of the country, as a whole, with here and there notable exceptions, either color or cover up news important for the public to know and editorial expression, in the main, becomes an article of merchandise and news scarcely less so. No philanthropist has yet seen fit to endow a really independent daily newspaper, and it is not easy to see how such a newspaper could be so endowed as to make it permanently independent. There are a few independent weeklies, as there are some independent magazines, but they are not dependent upon department stores or gas companies for their advertising patronage. They depend upon general advertising and general advertising is as yet not so injuriously organized as to be in a position to dominate the editorial and news policies of the periodicals in which the advertisements appear. If the people of California really want an independent weekly they can have it by supporting this one and by talking it up among their friends.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—I enclose herewith ten cents in stamps, payment for the "Report on the Causes of Municipal Corruption in San Francisco." I read the report with much interest and, I trust, some profit. I thank you for sending it to me. You are doing a great work. I trust some day the forces for good will be as well organized and as aggressive as are now the forces for evil.

Very truly yours,

B. M. CHISWELL.

Washington, D. C., March 9, 1910.

It is easy for the sources of evil to organize for their own advantage for the reason that there is "something in it" for them payable at once. On the contrary the forces that make for good have "something out" at the very start and the compensatory good is to be had, if at all, in the ultimate and not the proximate, in the life to come more certainly than in the life that is. That gives the forces of evil the underhold and there is no way of reversing the relative positions of these interests, bad and good. The bad is the bird in the hand. The good is the bird in the bush. The way to the inward swinging double door of sheol is broad, finely paved and down hill all the way, and so inviting that whole troops of people are traveling it gaily without a thought as to their destination; but it has pleased providence to make the path to rightness, to better things for governments and people, up-hill, toilsome and the recompense meagre this side of the goal which, faith helps us to believe, will be adequate when it is reached. It is the life-giving, arm-nerving power which that hope imparts to which we are indebted for every forward step made in human history and it suffices to keep the human family on the move toward better things in a thousand healthful forms.

Editor The California Weekly.

In large and populous political units, such as we have in this country, it is impossible that there should be, in any large proportion of the electorate, a spontaneous concurrence of opinion as to who should hold public office. Indeed it is improbable that any candidate will be well enough known for every voter to form, unadvised, an adequate opinion of his desirability for a given office. It is necessary, therefore, that the will of the people be directed by some agency.

The co-operation of those having the same political beliefs and purposes is the evident solution. On this our political parties have been built, and have served a useful purpose. The two great political parties, however, now defeat their very purpose. Their elaborate and permanent organization is too rigid. In the last presidential election we found those believing in a reduction of the tariff divided along the party line as to whether such reduction should be made for theoretical or practical reasons. Also in the last San Francisco election we saw those desiring good government, as against class government, divided by the question as to whether the work should be carried on by Crocker or Leland, and principally because one was a Republican and the other was a Democrat. Evidently some means must be devised to assure that the division be on the live issue, even if it be not that of the historical basis of the parties.

The issues that can poll the votes are the ones that count. For years a mere plurality would carry them and, often, a large proportion of the electorate, in supporting what proved to be a minor issue, have lost the opportunity to express themselves on the issue upon which the election turned. That a mere plurality should rule has proved unfortunate. The first, or primary election, should decide between what two sets of candidates (and their principles) the decision should lie. The candidates securing the highest, and the second highest, number of votes should alone appear on the second ballot. The result would be a majority decision upon the vital issue of the campaign.

Providing further that the first, as well as the second, election shall be nonfactional, i. e., permitting the voter to "split" his ticket, will assure that the best and most typical men will be put forward, as a man who runs behind his ticket will probably not make a place on the final ballot, and will assure to the whole electorate a vote on the real issue in the campaign.

The two elections may follow one another as closely as possible. One campaign can inform the voters sufficiently.

From the foregoing you will understand that I have no compunction at working and voting (at the primary election) for the best man on whatever ticket I find him. In your School for Citizenship you teach that this is dishonest. It is that kind of teaching and that

THE FEDERAL CORPORATION TAX LAW

WHY IT SHOULD BE HELD INVALID BY THE COURTS

By JAMES S. SPILLMAN

As a part of (or rider on) the act of congress of August 5, 1909, called by the President the "Payne Tariff Act," but more generally known as the "Payne-Aldrich Revision Upward," a "special excise tax" was levied upon all corporations organized for profit. The text of the section imposing this tax is familiar to most members of the bar and to the harassed officers and accountants of corporations, who in the last days of February functioned only in terms of Form 638, net income, depreciation, ordinary and necessary expenses, rentals or franchise payments, and losses actually sustained.

Substance of the Law

But for the general reader, who has not had to prepare or to criticize a return, and who is concerned, not with the details, but with the principle of the act, the substance of the section imposing the tax is given:

"Section 38. That every corporation, joint stock company or association, organized for profit and having a capital stock represented by shares, and every insurance company * * * shall be subject to pay, annually a special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation (etc.) equivalent to one per centum upon the entire net income over and above five thousand dollars received by it from all sources during such year."

Labor, agricultural or horticultural organizations, fraternal beneficiary societies, orders or associations, mutual benefit building and loan associations, and religious, charitable and educational corporations and associations are exempted.

A method of ascertaining net income, making returns, payment of the tax, pains and penalties for failure, is set forth with more detail than clarity; but if the act be sustained as a valid exercise of the taxing power granted to Congress by the Constitution, and if it be not repealed, we shall in time, with the aid of the rulings of the department and the decisions of the courts, be able to advise with reasonable certainty what the act means. Plenary powers of inquisition are granted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, including the power to examine books and papers, and jurisdiction granted to the federal courts to aid the inquisition by appropriate process.

But we are not now concerned with the minutiae of this act, but with its fundamental principles, its "deeper significance."

Constitutionality to Be Tested

As in nearly all cases where Congress has broken new ground in legislation, the constitutionality of the act has been questioned, and will remain in doubt until the point shall have been decided by the Supreme Court.

While the written Constitution of the United States is a short document consisting of but seven original articles and fifteen amendments, the actual constitution is this short document, plus the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court expounding it, which are found in the 214 volumes of the reports of that court. Practically, the constitution is whatever the Supreme Court says it is. This is said in no flippant or critical spirit; for this final, judicial test of legislation is essential to government under a written constitution. There is no escape from the conclusion drawn by Chief Justice Marshall more than a hundred years ago, that an act of Congress repugnant to the constitution, or not authorized by its terms, is void, and that it is the duty of the court so to declare.

This article is not intended as a brief upon the question of the constitutionality of the act. Whether or not the act is within the letter of the constitutional grant of power to lay and collect taxes is a question upon which reams of briefs have been and will be written and days spent in oral argument, followed by a decision not improbably by a divided court. It is a question upon which men of equal ability and training may candidly differ, and each advocate find abundant reason and authority for his position.

Parallel of the Income Tax

In the great case of Pollock vs. Farmers Loan and Trust Company, in which the Supreme Court had under consideration the constitutionality of the income tax clause of the Wilson revenue act of 1894, the cause was argued orally and on briefs by no less than a dozen counsel, several of them stars of the first magnitude—Choate, Edmunds, Olney, Carter and others. But eight of the nine members of the court heard the first argument. Of these, six concurred in the opinion that the act was void in so far as it taxed the income of real property and the income derived from municipal bonds. Upon the questions, whether these void provisions invalidated the whole act, and whether as to the income from personal property as such, the act was unconstitutional as laying direct taxes without apportionment among the several states according to representation, the eight justices who heard the first argument were equally divided. Thereupon reargument was ordered before the whole court; and the final decision, holding the act unconstitutional in toto, was rendered by a division of five to four.

This brief sketch of the history of the case involving the income tax law (which greatly resembles in principle the act under discussion) is given to emphasize the folly of being hasty in reaching, or dogmatic in announcing, a conclusion upon such a question. It accounts for any little hesitancy that may be observed in the presentation of my own views, which might otherwise be mistaken for indecision or an affectation of modesty.

The final decision of the court in the Pollock case is summed up at the conclusion of Chief Justice Fuller's opinion (in which four other justices concurred) as follows:

Supreme Court on Direct Taxes

"First. We adhere to the opinion already announced that, taxes on real estate being indisputably direct taxes, taxes on the rents or income of real estate are equally direct taxes.

"Second. We are of opinion that taxes on personal property, or on the income of personal property, are likewise direct taxes.

"Third. The tax imposed by sections twenty-seven to thirty-seven, inclusive, of the act of 1894, so far as it falls on the income of real estate and of personal property, being a direct tax within the meaning of the Constitution, and, therefore, unconstitutional and void because not apportioned according to representation, all those sections, constituting one entire scheme of taxation, are necessarily invalid."

That being the law, it would seem to follow that the tax on corporations must also fall. There is no exception of any source of income; on the contrary, the act says ex industria, "income * * * from all sources," which must of necessity include rents or income from real estate and the income of personal property. And if Congress is without authority to levy an unapportioned tax upon the income of all persons, derived from real or personal property, it would seem a fortiori that they have no power to single out a class of persons (corporations) and levy an unapportioned tax upon the income derived from their real and personal property.

When Is a Tax Not a Tax?

The author of the act must have had this point in mind, for he has endeavored to distinguish the cases, by calling the corporation tax a "special excise tax with respect to the carrying on or doing business by such corporation," "equivalent to one per centum" upon its income. And there is the point around which the contest will be waged most fiercely: Whether the definition of "excise" is to be enlarged so as not only to include impositions laid upon particular commodities or upon the conducting of certain lines of business, but also to include special impositions laid upon particular classes of persons carrying on any kind of business for profit; whether a tax "equivalent to one per centum" of one's income is any the less a tax upon that income by reason of that phraseology. It would seem that things that are equivalent to the same thing must be equivalent to each other, in law as in mathematics, and that a tax, however labeled, which is equivalent to a tax upon income must be a tax upon income. In the Pollock case, Chief Justice Fuller said:

"If by calling a tax indirect when it is essentially direct, the rule of protection could be frittered away, one of the great landmarks defining the boundary between the nation and the states of which it is composed, would have disappeared, and with it one of the bulwarks of private rights and private property."

And again:

"If it be true that by varying the form the substance may be changed, it is not easy to see that anything would remain of the limitations of the Constitution, or of the rule of taxation and representation, so carefully recognized and guarded in favor of the citizens of each state. But constitutional provisions cannot be thus evaded. It is the substance and not the form which controls."

Infringement of States Rights

But passing what might be termed the "technical" question of the constitutionality of the act, the deeper significance of this measure lies in its violation of the constitutional principle of the segregation of powers between the states and the General Government. Even if Congress have, by the letter of the Constitution, the power to levy this tax, they ought not to have done it, and the people ought to resent it and to make their resentment heard and felt by those that are responsible.

The seeming public indifference upon the subject of this tax is striking evidence of the gradual centralization of the Union and the decline of that jealous regard for the reserved powers of the states which characterized our earlier constitutional history. The time was when the proposal to pass such an act would have been met with such vigorous protest from the states that the point of testing its constitutionality in the courts would never have been reached. The people of the states would have said to Congress: "We, as states, created these corporations. Their powers are the power that we have given them; and the limitations on those powers, and the obligations resting upon them, are such as we have prescribed. Their members are our citizens. Upon terms fixed by ourselves, we have authorized them to organize, and as organizations to buy and sell, to mine, to build, to carry on any kind of business. In reliance upon our charters, they have invested their capital, and in competition with our individual citizens, are engaged in almost every conceivable enterprise. We reserve the right to regulate, control, even to destroy, these our creatures. But you shall not. We recognize your power to levy taxes. Under this power, you have the undoubted right to impose excises upon any commodity, or upon every commodity, upon any business, or upon every business, provided these excises be uniform throughout the United States. If you see fit to excise the business of dealing in lumber, or grain, or what you will, and lay the tax equally upon all who deal in those commodities, whether they be individuals or corporations, we have no complaint. But we deny that you have the right to select as the special objects of an excise tax associations of our citizens organized and acting under the powers that we have given them while exempting their individual competitors engaged in the same lines of business. And even though you may find in the text of the Constitution a construction that will warrant this violation of the spirit of the compact, we will, if you persist in this course, find other servants who will respect our reserved powers and heed the spirit as well as the letter of those that we have granted to the General Government."

Intrastate Corporations Unjustly Included

But it will be said that corporations are unpopular; that many of them are wicked and oppressive; that the people are glad to see them specially taxed and harassed and hampered in every way; that they enjoy special privileges and ought to pay for them. But the point is that the states grant those special privileges and do so for their own good ends; that the states, and the states only, have the right to tax, to regulate, to control, to destroy corporations of their own making. If the tax were laid upon such corporations only as are engaged in interstate commerce, a different problem would be presented. One would be hardy indeed, who should attempt to put a limitation upon the "constructions that will be found" to afford complete federal control of every corporation (or individual, for that matter) that may ship a sack of potatoes or a box of fruit across a state line.

But there are thousands of corporations—mining, manufacturing, contracting, banking, farming—whose operations are confined to the states of their creation. They are not trusts or monopolies; they are not law-breakers; they conduct their business honestly and deal fairly with their employees, their stockholders and with the public. Many of them are not even rich. Such corporations are a direct benefit to the public, and I believe they are a majority of all corporations. Instead of being the objects of suspicion and hostility, the "corporation for profit" should be regarded for what it is—the embodiment of the democratic principle in business. Through them, and through them only, is it possible for the thrifty man of small means to take part in the conduct of enterprises of any moment. This is true for the simple reason that common prudence would restrain the small investor from assuming the unlimited liability of a partner, and would also restrain the man of large means from accepting as partners any but those of sufficient financial strength fully to share with him the risks of the enterprise. But in a corporation, honestly conducted, each shareholder takes his proportionate share of the profits, as in a partnership, while in the event of disaster, his share of the liabilities is limited in the same proportion.

Possibilities in Discriminatory Legislation

And it must be borne in mind that if Congress can discriminate against corporations, they can discriminate against others. If associations of persons organized in pursuance of charters granted by the states, and owing their existence solely to these state-given charters, can be arbitrarily selected as a class for the imposition of a special federal tax from which their individual competitors, engaged in the same kinds of business, are exempt; if their books and papers can be subjected to inspection, from which the books and papers of their individual competitors are immune, it is difficult to conceive of any limitation to the power of classification and discrimination.

The remedy for the abuse of the corporate privilege lies in rigid regulation and control; but that regulation and control (at least as to corporations engaged in intra-state business only) is peculiarly the province of the state; and the states should resist, by every lawful means, a federal measure which if carried into effect would be an unjust discrimination and a violation of the principles, if not strictly of the letter, of the Constitution.

A WORLD EVANGEL

Is Christendom again upon the eve of a new, tremendous religious upheaval, as awe-inspiring as the epoch of the crusading spirit when all Europe rose en masse—more wonderful because more practically equipped and more shrewdly organized? The rapid spread of the world-wide laymen's missionary movement seems to indicate an affirmative answer.

For years the church has been falling upon days of lassitude. Failing spirituality, feminization, weakness in the pulpit, conflict of science and religion—all these have been cited as the reason for its decline.

But perhaps the greatest reason is that the church has ceased to appeal to the imagination of men. The laymen's missionary movement makes that appeal. It spreads out the vision of a triumphant crusade of organized effort for the evangelization of the world. It speaks in terms of millions, hundreds of millions, of sums of money comparable only to national debts, of sums of souls comparable only to the august roll call of the nations. To show that this appeal stirs the imagination and stirs it effectively, we reprint below parts of an address by J. Campbell White, of New York, one of the founders of the movement. Astonishing meetings have been held in interior cities of California, astonishing in their attendance and enthusiasm. The meeting in San Francisco is now open. It is part of a world movement tremendously significant. It may change the history of civilization.

From Mr. White's Address

"In addition to all the Christian work that needs to be done among ninety millions of people in this country, the churches of America have about six hundred millions of people dependent upon them in the non-Christian world. How shall we discharge our share of religious responsibility for mankind? This is the question being asked this winter in seventy-five leading cities of the United States.

"During the past ten years our country has come into a new consciousness of world-relationships and consequent world-responsibilities. What these responsibilities are depends largely upon our resources and our opportunities. From either of these viewpoints it is clear that this nation has the primary place among all the nations of the earth as an evangelizing and Christianizing force.

"Canada has set the inspiring example of a whole nation, defining and undertaking to discharge her missionary responsibility. After conventions had been held in all parts of the dominion to consider the matter, a national missionary congress was held in Toronto last spring, attended by over 4,000 men. They accepted 40,000,000 as their share of people to be reached in the non-Christian world—a number

SILAS SINGHAM first saw the light down on the Ohio river in one of the southern counties of the state of the same name, but his father came from the Western Reserve and all his antecedents and ideals were of the New England type. All the relatives that he knew anything of lived up in the northern part of the state, or else "back east," but it was little enough that he knew of any of them. Until he was sixteen his world had been bounded on the north by Highland and Pike counties, on the west by Brown, and on the south by the Ohio river, and the only one of these boundaries he had ever seen was the Ohio river, but with that he was on terms of intimacy. He was either in it or on it as much of the time as possible.

Nor could he remember when he and his father were not under the necessity of being extremely careful of his tall, sickly mother, whom his father had brought from across the river. She was never well, and by and by laid down a burden too heavy to carry. Consumption had been long in doing its work, but the end was never in doubt.

That was why his father was so careful of him, because, as everybody said, he "took after" his mother, was very tall, white of skin and flat chested, plainly and painfully commiserated with by all the members of his father's congregation, for his father was a minister, preached to a poor parish regularly and, at off times, supplied a congregation for a mid-week meeting over the river on the Kentucky side. It was by that means that the boy's father and mother had met.

Neither could the boy remember when the slavery issue had not ranked, in the estimation of his father, next to salvation. His mother was not quite so sure about it, having been accustomed to seeing slaves about her all her life, but, like the dutiful wife she was, she did not oppose what she could not feel much zeal for so long as her husband did, and, when now and again a negro came to the house in the small hours of the morning, she said nothing and knew nothing, as the boy was taught not to. They always disappeared, as they had come, in the dead of night. Afterward Silas knew that his father's home had been a way station for colored people on the road to Canada and freedom, but all that he knew about it then was that he must not lisp a word.

But there came a time when, upon one of his supply trips across the river into Kentucky, his father returned in the night, half clothed with tar and feathers and with an old horse-blanket wrapped about him, for he had been put adrift on the river in that condition on a flimsy and improvised raft. After that there were no negroes at his house for a time, but the father had as many night trips to make as before. The underground railroad was still in operation.

All these things had not failed of their impression upon the boy's mind. He had solemn talks with his father, who admonished him, if heaven spared his life, to devote it to defending the liberties of men, black men as well as white, and red men as certainly as black; but when, with the breaking out of the war, the boy of sixteen wanted to execute the high purposes his father had planted in his mind by enlisting it looked different to both father and son. The father thought the son entirely too young and by all odds too feeble to endure the hardships of a soldier, whereas the son thought that a life was a life no matter whether strong or weak, and to be given just as cheerfully. The father went into the army as chaplain of a regiment and the son compromised by going to an uncle in northern Ohio and entering Oberlin college.

That wasn't a real good place to send a boy to get him out of the war atmosphere, for Oberlin college had sent a great share of its male students into the army and anti-slavery sentiment amounted to a religion with the whole faculty. Still, the lad was obedient and, though he chafed and struggled at the tether, he stuck to his books for two years and until John H. Morgan entered upon his ill-starred raid. Then the boy bolted for the front. To his astonishment he did not die the first time he slept out under the stars, nor the first time he slept out when there were no stars in sight, but rain, instead. On the contrary it gave him an appetite like a horse and he gained in strength every day. This determined his action as to the rest of the war. He enlisted, and was at once the tallest and youngest man in his company. In half a year he was about the strongest, most athletic and the best soldier, too, for into the service he threw his whole heart. They were strenuous months, but a half year had made a man out of a boy and a soldier out of a man.

THE BREAKING OF A PROMOTER

Silas Singham was a good shot, quick of movement, keen of eye and clear of perception. He was made first a corporal, then an orderly, and finally a scout, going through the Chattanooga campaign, the next year to Atlanta and around with Sherman to the sea and to Washington for the great parade, to be mustered out a lieutenant and so home to find the grave of his father side by side with that of his mother on the oak-clad knoll of his native village.

Twenty-one, without ties to bind him to any place or person, thirsting for adventure and a chance to do a man's part in what was to be done, he gladly accepted an offer of his general to join in the organization of a construction gang to help build the Union Pacific railroad across the plains to the Pacific Coast.

For a little while he held a place in the office of the construction company which his brigade commander headed, but the confinement was not good for him and he was sent to the front, first to superintend a gang of graders, but, when the grass got good that spring and the Indians got bad he volunteered his services as scout for the protection of the camps and proved as good a plainsman as he had been woodsman in the Appalachian mountains during the Civil War.

Finally the old general relinquished construction work and entered upon railroad promotion enterprises in co-operation with the transcontinental company and invited Silas Singham to join him in a subordinate but responsible relation. The young man had developed a good capacity for getting on with other men, and the spirit of leadership. He was honest, had a boundless enthusiasm, a quick perception, a keen brain and a filial confidence in his commanding general.

The country to the west of the Missouri was, in those days, insanely anxious for railroads. They were land-aided by the government and bond-aided by counties, townships and towns. The Button Willow and Northern was their first enterprise, and it went through humming. Silas worked up the bond-voting enterprise from man to man, neighborhood to neighborhood, appointed public meetings and got the people out for the general to address. The general's empty sleeve and sabre scar spoke eloquently for him and he was no mean talker himself. The "company" took the bonds and built the road, treated the general "right," and Silas fared so well that he felt himself almost a capitalist. The people had been dealt with on the square and were ready to give a certificate of character to the old general and all his associates.

Then came the promotion of the Middle Branch Western, a more pretentious enterprise, for which the old general formed an independent corporation with himself as president and a directorate made up of selected politicians, small bankers and financiers of more notoriety than their financial rating would justify. Silas Singham was made chief field agent to work up the county and township-bonding propositions. He threw himself into it with all the zeal of which his enthusiastic temperament was capable.

There was a choice of two routes to the point of destination. Only one of them could be built upon, at least for the present. Silas was for the bee line and argued for it before the directorate, and with the general personally, with what he thought must be convincing effect; but to his surprise he was instructed to take the route up the valley of the Prairie Hen and inaugurate his bond promotion work. With misgivings he obeyed the command of his superiors and fell to work among the people. It was a hard bargain the directorate was seeking to drive with the people, but Silas did his best.

For a year he talked man to man, neighborhood to neighborhood, county to county, beating down opposition, bolstering up the personnel of the company and offering to whip anybody and everybody who called the fidelity of the old general into question. The company certainly would build the road if the bonds were voted. For what other purpose could the directorate keep him and his surveying parties in the field, he should like to know.

But all the while he was hearing of the efforts the people were making along the bee line to induce the road to come their way. The county seat papers along the bee line route openly boasted that the Prairie Hen people were being "played for suckers," and never would hear the locomotive whistle unless they heard it from over the Bluestem hills where the bee line lay. This made Silas uneasy, but he denounced these utterances as unfounded and, upon his honor as a gentleman, assured the Prairie Hen valley people that his company would keep faith with them. The bonds were voted by counties and the supplemental work of bonding particular townships for particular favors in making deviations in the line was just being entered upon when Silas was called to headquarters.

He went before the directorate.

"You have done admirably, Mr. Singham," declared the old general, rising from the big table and taking him cordially by the hand, "most admirably, and I hope you will not be greatly disappointed when I inform you that we have decided not to build up the valley of the Prairie Hen, at least not for the present."

"Not going to build?" demanded Silas. "Why, what does that mean? What have I been doing out there all these months, I should like to know?"

"My dear young man," broke in the New York member of the directorate, "you have been making the bee line people bid up to the limit of their ultimate farthing in order to outbid the valley of the Prairie Hen, and you have done it splendidly, splendidly, my boy. Nobody could have done it better."

The hot blood rushed to Silas' head and he seemed on the verge of an eruption. The general, cognizant of his rising anger, quietly observed, "You know, lieutenant, that down in Dixie we sometimes had to make feints in one direction that we might outflank our adversary in another."

"Yes, general, but that was in the enemy's country while you have sent me out to deceive our friends, men who have worked hard in our interests. How long since this change of policy was decided upon?"

"Ever since we first put pen to paper," said the New Yorker, in the blandest and most reassuring tones. "We keep nothing from you, Mr. Singham. Do you remember how irrefragable your own championship of the bee line was? There was no getting around it. The Prairie Hen people will get over their wrath and their disappointment in due season, and maybe we'll run a branch up their valley when we get around to it, but it is now for the bee line in quick time. The last township has come into our harbor."

"We have concluded to build the line ourselves this time, Silas," remarked the general, "instead of turning it over to The Company as we did before. We lost a very pretty thing by not building the Button Willow and Northern ourselves. Is there any good reason why we should not get all there is in it?"

"But have you the requisite capital?" Singham demanded to know.

"Oh, we have backers in abundance, young man," broke in the New York broker. "Leave that to us. What we want of you is to superintend the construction."

"I'll not undertake it," was Silas Singham's unequivocal reply.

"I had hoped that you would, Silas," observed the general in a tone of disappointment. "You have been with me so long, and I know of no one else whom we can trust so implicitly. You see our hands will be full with the financing and getting materials to you, and I can no longer do as many days' work in one day as I used to before the war."

Silas then agreed to have adhered to his resolution to sever all relationship with the Middle Branch Western then and there, but he loved the old general like a father and, despite this bit of double dealing, which he felt was chargeable to the rest of the directorate rather than to the general, he had almost a child's faith in the general's integrity.

"Well, I'll undertake it," he said, reluctantly, "but I want it understood that there is to be no more double-dealing from this on."

They all assured him that, so far as his interests were concerned, there would be no further employment of "diplomacy" without his full knowledge and so the construction of the Middle Branch Western came under the direct supervision of Silas Singham, under the immediate direction of the chief engineer.

"We'll put you down for a nice block of stock in the company, Mr. Singham," declared the New York broker. "Your note for the first 25 per cent. of it will be perfectly good until convenient to pay it out of your salary, and that is all it will ever cost you. The rest will be clear gain and at par in less than a year after the road is completed. It will be like picking money up in the road." So Silas went in with the rest and became a railroad promoter and builder.

With corn at twenty cents per bushel money had been getting a bit scarce in the country and the farmers along the proposed line were eager enough to put their teams on the roadbed to do the grading and their sons to do the work. It was no length of time until Silas had the dirt flying right after the engineer and his field men; but he noticed that the roadbed as laid out was uncommonly narrow, the curves sharp and the grades steep, but his business was to build the road, not to engineer it. Besides, it was explained to him that it would be cheaper to perfect the way when construction trains could be employed to handle the dirt.

When it came to laying the ties there were not more than half as many as there should have been, but that would serve, the engineer said, until the construction trains could bring more to be slipped in between, and the work went on.

Under the terms upon which the people had voted bonds in aid of the enterprise the bonds became due and deliverable as fast as the roadbed was made and the ties laid down. What though the roadbed was little better than a brushed-out trail, the trestles flimsy and the ties as far apart as they should have been? The terms of the contract with the counties and townships voting aid were met after a fashion, and a little political diplomacy on the part of the general and the New York broker sufficed to get the bonds into the hands of the company and the work went on.

Then the pay of the graders and suppliers of ties began to come irregularly and scantily. The company got in arrears, first thirty days, then sixty, and by and by ninety. One excuse was offered and then another, but Silas, placing implicit confidence in the general's assurances that all would come out right, upheld the honor of the company, lent to hard pushed sub-contractors not only all that he had saved out of his salary while paying off his note given for shares, but all that he had saved out of building the Button Willow and Northern, taking their notes in return.

With less courage and faith and hope than Silas Singham possessed, with less of confidence than the people along the line reposed in him, the task could not have been accomplished, but it was and, by and by, the road was somehow graded and somehow tied, just anyhow, to its destination, and the aid bonds were all signed and delivered; but what of the completed road and its operation?

Would the people, in view of the serious monetary stringency, vote to relinquish their first lien on the franchise, rights of way, roadbed and all, and take a second mortgage to enable the company to market its bonds and so purchase the rails and rolling stock? Silas Singham implored the directorate to make terms with the bigger corporation to carry the enterprise on to completion; but they talked him over and he threw himself into the campaign for releasing the people's first mortgage and taking a second. The strife was bitter and the criminations and recriminations keen, but, as had before happened, the doughty old general with his empty sleeve and sabre-scarred face claimed his measure of public sympathy and affection and the relinquishment carried in county after county, albeit by narrow margins, and the roadbeds, rights-of-way and franchises were mortgaged. What for? To buy iron and rolling stock? Neither iron nor rolling stock were bought, not then nor for ten years thereafter.

The proceeds of these bonds went to discharge the padded claims of the stockholders in the dummy construction company, made up of the directorate of the Middle Branch Western, that built the roadbed and laid the ties without having more than partially paid for either. The bonds the people had voted were hypothecated for what they would bring as security and, upon default in payment, were sold at auction for a song and so went into the hands of innocent purchasers for value and became a first lien upon every farm and household from end to end of the bee line.

Is it any wonder that desperate men along that line came by team and by stage to the initial point of the Middle Branch Western, where the company's offices were located, came by twos and fours, came with blood in their eyes and ropes in their hands bent on getting something for their money or wreaking vengeance if they were not to be accorded justice? It is a wonder that the old general, astute as he always had been, had not scented danger and was the only official in the office in the city when the rioters held the street, but there he was, the target of all their hate, defenseless and alone save for a few stenographers who were striving, with his aid, to wind up the company's affairs and make the wreckage yield a little something more to the directorate.

The courage that had stood him in stead when he led his brigade up Missionary Ridge did not fail him then. He faced the mob undaunted and openly declared to them that the bubble had burst; that he and his associates had undertaken a desperate gamble with the chances in their favor and might have won out for the Middle Branch Western, and the bee line people, had the suckers of the East and of Europe continued to bite at Western railroad securities as they had been doing until lately. Anyhow, the bee line people had themselves to thank for their predicament. The company had not asked them for a bond, but they of themselves, greedy to get away from the Prairie Hen valley what that valley had been asked to subscribe for, had walked into the trap of their own volition and with their eyes open. If they were looking for sympathy it was of no use to come to him. They had best return to their homes to learn wisdom from experience.

Thus reproached to their faces and goaded to desperation, the mob cared little for sympathy for their predicament, but much for revenge. Some one produced a rope, someone else threw a noose around the old general's neck, there was a rush toward the street and a lamp-post, the old general fighting as best he could with his one arm and calling names at the top of his voice.

Then there was a commotion from the rear, a tall form drove into the midst of the infuriated crowd, a half dozen men were felled to the floor, a knife flashed, the rope around the old general's neck was cut, an arm was thrown about the body of the struggling old veteran and, still struggling, he was dragged from the hands of the mob, half hurled down a back stairway, thrust into a waiting hack and hurried to the railway station. Then the tall young man who had rescued him leaped back up those stairs three steps at a time and once again dashed into the midst of the mob.

"If you want to hang anybody, hang me," he yelled. "I am the only one of that rascally crew left in town and the faith I had in them has cost me every dollar I had in the world.

I would have died for that man and I'd do it yet. With shot and shell screaming through the air and throwing the dirt all over us I carried him off the battle field of Missionary Ridge, his arm hanging by a shred and part of a shell buried in his hip, but not so much as a groan escaped his lips during my mile's struggle to a hospital with my colonel, which he then was, on my back. A wonderful man, that! Brave as a lion, patriotic as a Lincoln, but, it seems, financially as crooked as chain lightning. I can't understand him, but I love him like a father in spite of it all. Yet I never want to set eyes on him again.

"Men, I have been here a week trying to get to the bottom of this miserable business. There is no bottom to it. The bottom has fallen out. They all paid for their stock in the company with their notes, as I paid for mine, but I took my note up in cash, and mine is the only note that was paid. Yet the criminal law will not reach them. What they did was legal and by advice of their attorney. They simply gambled with your money and mine, played a losing game and left the consequences to us. Go home and forget it. I am going to hunt a job that I may have a supper to eat and a place to sleep.

"The last dollar I had I paid the hackman that carried the old general, my general, out of your reach. It took all the rest to pay off the note I had given the company for my holding in its stock, but I was determined that no unpaid obligation of mine should be found among that company's assets. But what I want to know is what you fellows are going to do with me. If you are not going to hang me I want to know it so that I can go and look for a job."

"Three cheers for Si. Singham," was the reply.

"Much obliged, men," Silas Singham returned. "I have been square with you, but I ought to have been smarter. Promotion enterprise is not for me. I am too green. I told you I had no money left, and I haven't, not so much as a 'scad,' but I have some of your notes here. Here is one signed by Martin Gilligan for money I lent him on my faith in the Middle Branch Western enterprise. How much am I offered for it? What, nothing? Well then, here goes for that," and he tore it into shreds and blew the fragments from him. He called out others in varying sums, all advanced to help pay their men while "the company" was holding back their pay and all reading without interest. Every name was greeted with laughter, and every note was torn to shreds in their presence.

"Men," Silas Singham exclaimed in a final outburst, "some of the old general's associates were rascals because God made them so, and some of them, including the old general himself and myself, were crazy to make big money and it made rascals of them and a fool of me. From this time on I'm a farmer. I'm not smart enough to be anything else. Goodbye. Remember me to the folks at home and when you think hard of the old general remember that, despite all his faults, I carried him off the battle field at Missionary Ridge and that, notwithstanding, he was up and at 'em at the head of his brigade, empty sleeve flying, at Kenesaw mountain."

Three months later Silas Singham was a ranch hand in the Sacramento valley, California. He had experienced the "making and the breaking of a promoter" and had washed his hands of high finance.

equal to over six times the population of Canada itself.

"Unprecedented and phenomenal advances are being made by churches in all parts of Canada, in the carrying out of this large policy of evangelization, which involves the quadrupling of their missionaries and missionary contributions.

"Will America likewise undertake her full share of this world task? We also have more than six times as many people to evangelize in non-Christian lands as constitute our entire population at home.

"The two things needed are intelligence and business method. The city of Toronto has increased its missionary offerings from $170,000 to $365,000, within a little more than a year, by the laymen of all churches taking hold as advocates and organizers. The Southern Presbyter-rian church has increased its missionary offerings in three years from $223,000 to $412,000 per year.

"To reach six hundred millions by the churches of North America would require a total of only 24,000 missionaries, which is one missionary for 25,000 persons. At the present moment we have 7,476 missionaries from the United States and Canada, of whom 2,270 are wives of missionaries. Twenty-four thousand missionaries from North America would be less than one out of 800 of our Protestant church members.

"The cost of supporting this force of workers would not average over $2,000 per missionary, or a total of $48,000,000 a year. It should be understood that the $2,000 covers not only the salary of the missionary, but the support of an average of about eight to ten native workers, the complete equipment of the work abroad and the administration expense at home.

"Forty-eight million dollars from twenty millions of church members would be less than a street car fare a week on the average, from each of them. The total is less than 20 per cent of the amount now spent annually for religious and benevolent work by the Protestant churches of the United States.

"If we need to spend $300,000,000 a year for religious purposes in the United States and Canada among a population of less than one hundred millions, is it reasonable to suppose that we can conduct an adequate Christian propaganda among six hundred millions abroad on less than twelve millions a year? This is less than two million dollars a year to reach one hundred millions of people abroad, against three hundred millions of dollars on a constituency of this size at home, or a proportion of 150 to 1.

"By the adoption of a business-like method of missionary finance in each congregation, and by the active co-operation of the laymen, it is an entirely practicable thing to lift the churches of this country to four times their present offerings toward world-evangelization. It has already been done in so many hundreds of churches, that we speak with great confidence when we declare that the financial problem in missions can be solved if the men of the church will put their intelligent and persistent efforts into the task.

"Men are beginning to do this in ever-increasing numbers. In one city recently eighty-two laymen spoke in eighty-two pulpits on the same Sunday presenting the methods and spirit of the laymen's movement. This is but characteristic of the way in which laymen can be led to take hold of the active work of missionary education, as advocates and organizers.

"Within the next six months we hope to see the seventy-five leading cities of America adopt a worthy missionary policy and put it into immediate operation in their churches. If this is done, it will shake the nation. If this nation moves it will move Christendom. And when Christendom moves it will shake the world."

kind of honesty that has kept the Southern Pacific and other predatory powers, in control.

Yours very truly,

"BERKELEY."

We regret that the timidity of the author of the foregoing prevents our attaching the name, lest some "unpleasantness" be encountered. The reformer who is fearful of attaching a name to so innocuous a document is unlikely to set the world aflame.

Nevertheless, the point raised is one upon which conscientious persons will do well to do sober thinking. We know that the forces of evil in this state, by the tens of thousands, will register their party affiliations with little regard to what they really are, but with the view of casting their influence on the side where it will work the largest injury to the public welfare. Are the hands of dishonest men to be tied while those of dishonest are left free to do unneutralized evil?

When one registers he must designate the party with which he expects to affiliate during the campaign, and whose ticket he expects to vote in November. Whoever registers as a Republican, with the expectation of voting the Democratic ticket in November, has registered a lie and has sworn to it, whether he be sinner or saint, and nothing else can be made of it. But whoever registers as a Republican, or as a Democrat, with the expectation of scratching his ticket in November, if he then finds that he has to do so in order to vote for the best man for the place, is within his rights, morally and within the contemplation of the law. There is no presumption, express or implied, in the law which requires any voter to vote his ticket straight. To be specific: the writer of "Little Talks" has registered as a Republican with the full expectation of voting the Republican ticket in November, but if, unfortunately, Charles F. Curry should secure the Republican nomination for governor, he will not vote for Mr. Curry. He will vote for the Democratic candidate, if he be a good man, otherwise he will leave the governorship blank on his ticket and go on down the line, scratching as he thinks the public good requires. This because he believes Mr. Curry, notwithstanding his many admirable qualities of mind and heart, a dangerous man to place in the gubernatorial office.

The voting system which our timid reformer commends is not the system under which this election is to be held. It is the Berkeley system and, in our judgment, is a better system than that under which we are working. Whoever, at the August primary, secures a majority of all votes cast, should be thereby, then and there, elected. That system would bring out a full vote at every primary and whatever brings out a full vote makes for the advantage of the best men and the best government. Let us try to incorporate that reform in our direct primary law.

ELIZABETH WATTS LLOYD, Plaintiff,

vs.

ALBAN W. LLOYD; ENID LLOYD and ALL PERSONS unknown who have or claim any interest in, or lien upon, the whole, or any part, of the real property described in the complaint herein.

Defendants.

NOTICE OF REFEREE'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

Under and by virtue of an interlocutory decree in partition and order of sale, duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 24th day of February, 1910, in the above entitled action, I, the undersigned duly appointed, qualified and acting referee in said action, am commanded to sell all those certain lands situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, described in the complaint herein and described as follows, to-wit:

COMMENCING at a point on the easterly line of Polk Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet northerly from the northerly line of Ellis Street; running thence northerly along said line of Polk Street twenty (20) feet more or less to Olive Avenue; thence at right angles easterly along the southerly line of Olive Avenue parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet; thence at right angles southerly parallel with Polk Street twenty (20) feet, and thence at right angles westerly parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet to Polk Street, the point of commencement.

Said described premises being a part of 50 Vara lot Number Three (3) in Block Number Nine (9) of the Western Addition as laid down on the official map of said City and County of San Francisco.

And public notice is hereby given that on Saturday the 26th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of that day at the street entrance to the office of the sheriff of said City and County at No. 122 McAllister Street, in the said City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and interlocutory decree in partition, sell the above described property at public auction to the highest bidder for cash in United States Gold Coin, ten (10) per cent thereof to be paid as a deposit on the day of sale, the balance upon confirmation of the sale by the Court and the delivery of a conveyance. Ten (10) days allowed before confirmation for examination of title. Objection to title, if any, must be made before confirmation. If after the confirmation the purchaser neglects or refuses to immediately comply with the terms of the sale, a re-sale will be made of the property purchased. If the amount realized on such re-sale does not amount to the former bid and the expenses of the previous sale, such purchaser shall be liable for the deficiency and the said referee will retain such deficiency from the deposit. All checks presented by purchasers must be certified.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Nomination Papers

As heretofore explained, the Direct Primary law does not contemplate that voters will go into their booths and vote for just anybody they happen to think of without previous discussion or leadership. The expectation is that those who want office will offer themselves for office and that those who take an interest in the public welfare, or those who have political axes to grind, will set things in motion for making up primary tickets. Of course tickets will make provision for scratching the ticket, but, unless public apathy makes men altogether unconcerned for their political life, there will somehow be a ticket made up, printed and offered to voters.

To get on such a ticket a candidate must have some sort of backing, somebody to second the motion. This is what the "nomination paper," as it is called, is for. It must be substantially in this form:

State of California,

County of....., —ss.

I do solemnly swear that I am a qualified elector of.....precinct of.....the town of.....county, and a member of the.....political party, and I hereby nominate.....who resides in the town of.....county of.....as a candidate for the.....party nomination for the office.....to be voted for at the primary election to be held on the.....day of....., 1910, and I further declare that I intend to support for such nomination the candidate named herein.

Signed.....

Residence.....

Subscribed and sworn to before me this.....day of....., 1910.

Any civil officer authorized by law to administer oaths may take the above acknowledgment, or the candidate may designate a special verification deputy who shall qualify for his function by filing an oath of office with the county clerk. In this oath he must affirm that he can read and write the English language, that he will, in the performance of his service, faithfully observe the election laws of the state, etc.

Before the nomination papers are filed they must be arranged and bound together by precincts and also alphabetically by the surnames of the signers and then numbered consecutively. They must then be bound together at their left edges with thread or staples, or in some other effective way. If the nomination papers are for candidates for state or district offices and the districts embrace more than one county, then the nomination papers for each candidate must first be assembled by precincts and then by counties, but such papers for more than one county must not be bound up together. Those for each county must be kept separate. This is because, before nomination papers for state or district offices can be filed with the Secretary of State, they must be taken to the county clerk of the county in which the signers live for the comparison with the great register of that county and certification by the county clerk.

It is made the duty of the county clerk to examine each nomination paper carefully. He must see to it that the name of each signer is on the great register of his county and, if not there, he must disregard that signer's paper. Furthermore the date of the registration of the signer must have been the same or previous to his going on the nomination paper. If not the clerk must disregard that signer.

Nomination papers for state and district offices, where the district includes more than one county, after being scrutinized and verified by the county clerk, must be forwarded to the Secretary of State for filing, together with the certificate of the county clerk that comparison of the names of the signers with the names on the great register had been made and giving the number of names that can be certified as correctly entitled to become signers of such nomination papers.

A candidate for the United States Senate, or for state office, must have signed to his nomination papers the names of at least 1 per cent. of the voters of his party in each of at least ten counties of his state and, in the aggregate, not less than 1 per cent. of the vote of his party in the entire state. He must have at least that number of signers, but, to avoid superfluous labor all around, he must not have more than 10 per cent. of the entire vote of his party in the state.

If the candidate be for a district office comprising more than two counties his nomination papers must be signed by at least 2 per cent. of the voters of his party in at least one-tenth of the election precincts in each of at least one-half of the counties comprising such district. In the aggregate he must have at least 2 per cent., and not more than 10, of the total vote of his party in such district.

If a candidate's district comprises just two counties then his nomination papers must be signed by at least 2 per cent. of the voters of his party in at least one-sixth of the election precincts in each of the counties and the aggregate must not be less than 2 or more than 10 per cent. of the total vote of his party in the district.

If the candidate be for a county office his nomination papers must be signed by at least 3 per cent. of the party vote in at least one-fourth of all the precincts in the county and, in the aggregate, not less than 3 per cent. or more than 10 of the entire vote of his party in his county.

The basis of estimating these percentages must be the vote received at the last presidential election by the party elector who received the largest number of votes cast. If any political party did not have a candidate for president at the last presidential election, but was otherwise represented on the ballot at that election, or at the last state general election, then a candidate of that party may be given a party ticket and a place on it if the candidate of that party at such last election received 3 per cent. of the total vote cast in that county. If fewer than 3 per cent. of the total vote was cast by any party, then that party cannot participate in a primary election and its candidates must get on the ballot of the general election by petition if at all.

It Is Enough

LAST WEEK CHIEF ENGINEER DAVIS, of the Reclamation Service, testified that Secretary Ballinger first ordered that service, over its protest, to recommend the restoration of public lands to entry and then restored them, avowedly because of that recommendation. When Director Newell came upon the stand he corroborated the testimony of Davis to the full. Either both of those men lied outright and outrageously or Secretary Ballinger is a double-dealing pettifogger unfit to hold any office of emolument or honor.

As Many As Can Live

POLICE COMMISSIONER FLANNERY, of San Francisco, has become a convert to saloon restriction and limitation. There is somewhat of a gulf fixed between what he would regard as saloons enough and what would be so regarded by almost any other person risen above the breech-clout stage of human development, but progress is to be reported even in his case. He does not want more saloons in any given neighborhood than can eke out an existence in that neighborhood without suffering the horrors of starvation. All right for you, Flannery! That tender heart of yours will enable the bars of San Francisco to cover a multitude of shins.

The Strong Arm of Aldrich

THE PRESIDENT NEVER OPENS his mouth but the heart speaks through it and that heart is aweary. No one who reads his addresses can doubt this or restrain sentiments of sympathy. How it must have encouraged him, at Providence, to be assured that he had the strong arm of Aldrich to lean on in his perplexity and that practiced hand to guide him in the shaping of his administration! Not alone is Aldrich puissant and careful, but he is adroit and prayerful, having ever upon his lips the pious supplication: "God help the rich. The poor can beg." Nevertheless, it were better for the President, and more hopeful for his policies, if he were not to appear upon the same platform with Nelson W. Aldrich. Aldrich looms a sinister figure more likely to mar the President's administration than to make it.

The Only Way

EVERY TIME THE PRESIDENT justifies the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill a Republican congressional district will go Democratic if opportunity offers, and yet the Democratic clean-sweeps in the sixth congressional district of Missouri and the fourteenth Massachusetts do not imply that Republicans are becoming Democrats. They are using the only means at hand for protesting effectively against "Cannonism" in the House and "Aldrichism" at the White House. The only way to save the next congress to the Republican party east or west will be to nominate insurgent Republicans for congress east and west.

Why Leave San Francisco Out?

A LEAGUE HAS BEEN FORMED in New York, of which branch organizations are to be formed in Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Chicago, Detroit, Cincinnati, Dayton and Washington, with the purpose of getting up a petition a hundred thousand strong asking that executive clemency be extended to Charles W. Morse, the plunger banker now serving a fifteen-year sentence of residence at Atlanta at the Hotel de

United States. Why is San Francisco ignored? In what other city will there be found more good men who believe that no rich man should be punished for any crime short of the murder of another rich man? Send that petition out here. Our lid is off, too.

Coming to Their Senses

WORKERS WHO WENT OUT on strike in sympathy with the Philadelphia car men, but without any grievance of their own, are going back to work with the full sanction of the American Federation of Labor and even of the leaders of the car strike itself. That is proper. They should not have gone out in the first place and, had not their advisers taken counsel of their passions rather than of their senses, they would not. The sympathetic strike and riotous conduct are organized labor's most implacable enemies, and yet they are ordinarily appealed to as friends. Greater blunder never was.

Gaiety Agley

THE LID IS OFF. The night life of San Francisco is as it was of old, thanks to the "liberality" of the McCarthy administration, the Flannery standard of public morals and the petitioning of a long string of San Francisco's business men. So be it. If the cafes thus thrown open are fit resorts for the sons and daughters of other men they are fit resorts for the sons and daughters of the petitioners and those sons and daughters may feel that the names of their fathers upon that petition sanction their entry into the life of gaiety thus afforded. No man not too good to sign that petition is too good to pay toll to the fast life. If the benefits of hell are to be made available that business may thrive those who share the profits should partake of the brimstone.

The Greater Service

THE SPECTACLE of a very rich man rendering service to his kind almost inspires one with a yearning to become very rich, and yet not one member of the United States Steel or Standard Oil groups of many-times millionaires will render the world a service so conspicuous as to be commensurate with the unseen service he might have rendered had he refrained from growing so rich through the methods by which his riches were gained. These men cannot, in the giving away of their fortunes, recompense for the evil standard of success they set up in heaping them together. It will still have been more profitable if they had not lived.

A Revel In Prospect

THE PUBLIC MIND may prepare itself for a season of sensational developments at Pittsburg. Whenever opulent criminality finds itself in a corner the worst of which human nature is capable is to be anticipated rather than that justice may be suffered. Murder, assassination, dynamiting, all these are held in light estimation if they may keep malefactors of great wealth from wearing stripes behind prison bars. And, through it all, being under indictment will be a sufficient passport to the alleged best society of Pittsburg and Hades. But, having eaten liberally of the fruit from the tree of knowledge of good and evil, the American public will have its eyes opened so wide that, forever after, a scoundrel will be known by his works no matter how great his fortune or how smart the set with which he trains.

Executive Usurpation

The insurgents in congress will make the mistake of their lives if they cause the submission by the President of measures in concrete form to become a pretext for raising the cry of executive usurpation of, or encroachment upon, legislative prerogative. No measure coming, in form, from the executive department of government should be accorded other consideration than would be given such a measure coming from a legislative committee, and it should carry with it no obligation to be enacted into law without scrutiny or amendment, but President Taft has performed no other service of such value as that of submitting administrative measures frankly as such and in the form of specific bills. It is a movement in the direction of legislative efficiency and is to be hailed with satisfaction.

San Francisco or New Orleans?

The completion of the Panama canal will be a great event in the history of the world. It deserves to be celebrated as a world event, celebrated by occident and orient, celebrated by the eastern hemisphere and the western, by north and south. It should be an epoch-marking event.

The courage of San Diego in tackling the problem was splendid. Its discretion was not so marked. Doubtless it would have been a good thing for San Diego to have done its best in financing and preparing an exposition, such an exposition as it could finance and could prepare, but it is unreasonable to suppose that San Diego could finance and prepare such an exposition as would challenge the interest and admiration of the world and fittingly commemorate an event of such transcendent signification. The state could not be convinced of its ability, neither could the nation, and without co-operation of state and nation nothing worth while can be done.

There are two fitting candidates for this honor, San Francisco and New Orleans. Either of these cities can take the task in hand and put it through to realization, leaving nothing to be desired remaining unsupplied. The proximity of New Orleans to the canal is to its advantage, and it is accessible from Europe and all of the United States, from Mexico and the northern states of South America. San Francisco is more remote from those centers of population, but is at the open door that leads to the orient and it is with the orient that the Panama canal mainly has to do. A hundred invidious things may be said for or against either of these cities in connection with this great event, but it can not truthfully be said of either of them that the task is too big for them, that they can not make a success of the enterprise if they undertake it. Either of them can and either of them will make a success of it if selected. It will be one or other of these two, New Orleans or San Francisco. Which shall it be?

As Californians, from Shasta to Tia Juana, there can be but one answer. It must be San Francisco, if a united effort and a strong one can win the prize. It will be no child's play. Pitted against New Orleans, San Diego would not have a ghost's chance for its life. San Francisco has a fighting chance, and with that chance it should make the fight, invincible because all parts of the state stand by it one and inseparable.

Pittsburg's Predicament

Recent disclosures at Pittsburg serve to show the prevalence of that putridity of infection that permeates much of our national life. We may expect ulcers to break out anywhere as they have at San Francisco, at Denver and at Pittsburg, or wherever else a low standard of political ideals has prevailed. It is fitting that Philadelphia and Pittsburg, and the whole state of Pennsylvania, should share in this disgrace, for it was in that state that the infection was initiated. It is the result of a taint that comes down from the Camerons, through Quay and Penrose, to the robbers who looted the state capitol and the councilmen in Pittsburg who allowed their public policies to be shaped by the slipping of dollars into hand or pocket when they were not looking. For these miserable men, hurrying to save themselves through an immunity bath, only contempt can be cherished. They were cheap villains. There is some satisfaction in reflecting that, at least, our San Francisco scoundrels did not place upon themselves so despicable a valuation. The bloodling bankers of Pittsburg will doubtless be able, through their financial and social affiliations, and the plentiful use of money, to break down the machinery of the law, as our higher-ups did here in San Francisco, and so escape imprisonment if not punishment. All this can be borne with fortitude, but the incidental corrupting of the public mind, such as made it impossible for men of San Francisco longer to make intelligent choice betwixt good and evil—that is to be deplored. It is the crown of thorns pressed upon the brow of righteousness until the blood streams forth. A bank is not only a repository for other people's money, but should be also for everybody's implicit confidence, and whenever a banker becomes a boodler he should suffer the extreme penalty of the law and without benefit of clergy.

Not High Enough to Hurt

The President has expressed his opinion that prices are not high enough to cause suffering. Perhaps not if the standard of suffering be the free soup kitchen, but is that the correct standard? In a great, free country like our own, and in a great, free state like California, there should be no poverty not the result of sin and no suffering not due to fortuitous circumstances; and yet the problem of poverty is a more difficult one for public control than the problem of criminality. We have not the suffering of involuntary idleness to deal with. There is prosperity if by that we mean work to do for nearly all who are willing to work, and yet the dependent child problem is an increasing one; the poor house problem grows; old age pensions are earnestly advocated because of the greater number of those who reach superannuation unprovided for; the poor we have with us more abundantly as the years go by. The joint earnings of American industry were perhaps never greater than now, but the distribution of those earnings was never more unequal and the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill, which the President neglects no opportunity to extol, did little or nothing to equalize that distribution of common profit. While the metallurgist has been the principal factor in the increased cost of living the tariff tinker has, next to the extortioner, been the principal malefactor responsible for that unhappy incident to life. The suffering caused by increase of prices may not be poignant, but it is widespread, and unless our giant industries can be weaned they will suck the nation dry as hay.

Give It to the Government

The incorporation of a self-perpetuating and never dying corporation to administer the ill-gotten millions of Rockefeller, in the name of charity, is still giving concern to thoughtful minds. The senate committee has tentatively approved the plan, but that was to have been anticipated. When the house comes to deal with the problem there may be greater diversity of mind. To be sure the form of the charter provides that the national government may annul it or modify it as time shall furnish necessity for so doing, but abuses will have become serious indeed before public opinion can compel congress to take action. The evils anticipated will be too subtle to be obvious to the many and, in order to bolster its power and permanency, the administrators of that fund will raise up no end of beneficiaries more than willing that great abuses may continue in order that small personal benefits may accrue to them. Therefore suffer John D. Rockefeller to provide for his heirs during his lifetime as he may, give away what he can with what wisdom he can employ while he lives and then make the general government his devisee without condition. Our government is doing a more beneficent work through its departments of research and investigation, through the Smithsonian Institution and the marine and army hospitals, than all our philanthropists put together, and it can do more still if it have more to do with. The adoption of this suggestion will be giving to all of us that which was taken from all of us and will prove the fairest restitution possible.

After Eight Months

For our leading article this week, thanks to the kindness of Mayor Beverly L. Hodghead, we are able to present a resume of the Berkeley form of municipal government in the light of eight months of experience. Eight months is not eight years, and even that would be too short a period to test, to a certainty, the efficiency of the plan, but what of experience there has been is full of promise for the future. The men who now constitute the governing body of Berkeley would furnish good government under any known system of municipal laws, so the last eight months has been more a test of men than of measures, and yet any team will work better in a comfortable harness than in one that misfits and it is not too much to say that the Berkeley municipal harness has proven highly satisfactory to the team. When the time comes, if it does, that special deputies must be sent in pursuit of the citizens of Berkeley to induce them to register that they may be qualified to vote, and automobiles must be pressed into service to fetch them to the polls, that they may vote, Berkeley may awake to find that its exemplary charter will not save it from maladministration of Berkeley affairs. Politics has been driven out of politics in Berkeley and if it can be kept out all will be well and it is not too much to say that the Berkeley system of elections, as explained in Mayor Hodghead's article, should keep politics out of Berkeley politics if anything can. The problem of Democracy must be worked out in American cities and full credit is to be given to our university town for excellent work done toward the solution of that problem.

All Barriers Broken Down

Candor compels the editor of this paper to confess to having entertained, and expressed, a misconception of the purport of the party-affiliation clause of the direct primary law. A preconception of the philosophy of party had so blinded him that when he read the statute he failed to appreciate its significance. He had assumed that what was required of an honest man, in declaring his party affiliations, was, in effect, that he should declare whether or not he was a Republican, a Democrat, a Union Labor party man, a Socialist partisan, or whatever he conceived himself to be politically. A careful re-reading of the law convinces us that the party affiliation declaration contemplates nothing of the kind.

Section 17 of the direct primary law declares that any elector who has qualified by registration, and by declaration of the political party with which he intends to affiliate, as provided by section 1366a of the Political Code, shall be entitled to vote at such primary. Section 1366a prescribes that, "Each elector shall declare the name of the political party with which he intends to affiliate at the ensuing primary election or elections."

Under a plain interpretation of the language used this declaration goes no farther than the ensuing primary election. The voter does not declare that he is a Republican or a Democrat, a McCarthy party man or a Socialist, but only that he intends to affiliate at that primary with the party designated. Under that interpretation of that clause every Democrat, every Socialist, every McCarthy party man in California is conscience-free to register his intentions to affiliate with the Republican party at the August primary this year (because that is where the fighting is going to be) when he fully intends, at the time of giving his party affiliations, to vote his own party ticket straight from top to bottom at the general election on the 8th of November.

Therefore, when the McCarthy party men whom we soundly berated for so doing, registered as Republicans in San Francisco last year that they might vote to defeat the nomination of Byron Mauzy as Republican candidate for mayor, with the purpose of voting for McCarthy that they might defeat Crocker in the election, they were within their legal rights under section 1366a, and we apologize to the rascals for having taken them to task.

We have said, and with truth, that the integrity of the family is no more essential to our civilization than is the integrity of party to government by party, and we had assumed it to be true that the party affiliations clause in the primary law was placed there to maintain the integrity of party, but we were in error. It will not do it. Party integrity is a thing of the past. All barriers are broken down.

It is not the purpose of The California Weekly to quarrel with the Direct Primary law because of the manifest failure of this party test. It is more inclined to rejoice because that failure is so manifest. An iron-clad oath of party allegiance would have bound honest men, but no political adventurer, hanger-on or charlatan was ever yet held to his own side of a party fence because of any oath of allegiance or declaration of affiliation. We rejoice at a form and interpretation of the statute that sets all men free. All bad men will wish to place their primary ballots, in August, where they will do the most harm, all good men where they will do the most good. This they are both free to do under our understanding of the party affiliation clause of the direct primary law.

Two advantages, and only two, as it appears to this paper, arise from the party affiliation requirement. One is that the county clerks may know how many of each kind of ballots to print, the other that party affiliation cannot be changed and guerilla raids be made on twenty-four hours' notice from the head of the political bureau that has heretofore controlled the political actions of the men of this state. The gates are closed against swapping parties twenty days before the primary election is to be held.

The only safeguard, then, for integrity of party lines lies in this: The fear that voters may have that if they do not vote at home mischief may result in their own party nominations. Wherever the big fight is there will the big vote be cast and, as we understand it, with full sanction of the law as it stands.

Liberal But Not Gullible

There are two qualities of political material that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company occasionally rejects. One is that grade that has proven so serviceable for so long a time as to be out at the elbows and patched at the knees. This ilk, if the League will let them, will come to the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League en masse and take seats right up in the amen corner. The other is made up of a bit now and again that has proven refractory, self-willed, owing a higher allegiance than to the head of that bureau and a higher policy than to "take program." Such the League may rightfully invite into its ranks on the simple score of having made good.

But there is a higher issue even than that of making good in a public office. That issue is the making of California a free state. The League may not rightfully demand that its every candidate for election, or holder of office, shall enlist that office and all its attaches in active conflict against the common enemy. It may well exempt judges on the bench, superintendents of schools, members of the railroad commission and other judicial or semi-judicial officials, from the draft; but upon no account should the candidacy of any person be endorsed, no matter how certainly he may have made good in office, if he is going to continue to give aid and comfort to the common enemy—the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. Upon that issue, at least, there should never be compromise. The League can afford to be liberal and unpartisan, but not gullible.

Round Them Up

The movement now under way to round up the saloon business in San Francisco and drive it in from the residential districts toward the business centers where the business can be under better police and public surveillance is in the right direction and to be encouraged. At its best the American saloon is an abomination. At its worst it is an abomination of desolation and it is likely to be at its worst in a sparsely settled and inadequately policed residential locality. These places will generally be found to harbor foolish youths and wayward girls besides debauched men and worse women. They are wholly bad.

Little can be done under the present city administration. Its standards of propriety are lower if anything than those of the Ruef regime, although not as much of venality has developed; but this administration of the affairs of San Francisco will make itself so objectionable that, unless there comes to be a new lot of higher-ups to protect from the law, a revulsion of sentiment will, at the first opportunity, drive it out of power.

Therefore the time for rounding up the outside gin mills and preparing to drive them in upon the commercial districts, where all may see their evil propensities, is not unpropitious. It is not necessarily a temperance movement, and it would be unwise to make it so, but a movement for better police protection, which all good citizenship should favor.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

It was Dr. Tucker, for sixteen years president of Dartmouth College, who declared that as soon as a man is made to feel that he is capable of doing something worth while the temptations that surround him grow less.

So they do, and who ever saw any one amount to anything who was without confidence in his own ability to do something worth while—until he changed his mind. The hopelessness of a sense of inferiority! How it does weigh upon the human soul! It comes to testify of itself in the set of one's clothes. It causes a man to shamble instead of walk, to whine instead of talk, to take hold with a nerveless hand, to strike half a lick, to take habitually the direction of least resistance, to be contented to fail. It is an appalling thing to come upon a human being. It makes one half-brother to the dog that slinks off around the corner with tail between legs whenever confronted by a stranger dog.

Of course there are those who are born misfits, who never quite arrive, as the saying goes, and yet a training better adapted to their needs might have made their failure less confessed, their unfitness less obvious and discouraging. It is a matter to which those who are responsible for others, such as parents and teachers and good citizens generally, need to give no little concern.

They used to say that talent was to be looked for in a napkin and, if looked for searchingly, would surely be found. Sometimes it isn't there and, though the napkin be shaken from all four corners, nothing will, of course, result from the shaking, but those cases are as rare as genius. They will not number one in several hundred. Born failures, born criminals and born geniuses are about equally rare, but not so with failures that were developed, not born. They throng the foot of every ladder.

And one reason that they do is that they have never had the helping hand held out to them at the right time. From infancy they have been scolded for what they did not do, not praised for what they did. How hard a child will work for a little "taffy" spread on rather thick! This is so palpably true that the sense of being "worked" comes to many through that experience, and that also discourages. A child craves sincerity and truth at the hands of its elders. With this foundation many things are possible to the right kind of educator. It is the light that leads.

If, then, one knows of some one else who is downhearted help him to find the thing worth while that he can do well. It does not so much matter what it is. Digging a post-hole true to the plumb line will serve if nothing better can be found. A facile shingler has a useful life before him and a competent lather has himself to blame if he does not achieve a competence. So with a girl who can be taught to cook well, to make up beds with that touch of neatness that invites Morpheus. There is no telling how many men have been kicked out of society because, as boys, they were dropped out of school through inability to parse and analyze or "Bologna sausage" the English language, as they used to do thirty or forty years ago, almost perfectly unimportant accomplishments. As likely as not manual training would have saved them.

The writer happens to call to mind a school fellow who went from the foot of his class well up into the middle of it, and so on finally to the head, or near it, because of having written a successful school composition on a mouse. It proved to sceptical teachers and fellow pupils that the lad really wasn't stupid. To be sure he left his wife and ran away with his servant girl years after, but there were extenuating circumstances, for his wife nagged at him, and he did not do it until he could provide well for both wife and servant girl. Whoever can show another that he can do something really worth while has made the best possible provision for that other's future.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Our Criminal Law and Our Murderers

It is a most forcible indictment of the method of administration of criminal law in the United States that is brought by Andrew D. White, formerly president of Cornell university and later our ambassador to Germany. Says Mr. White: "I will make you a prophecy. It is now January 28. I say, before the 28th of next January comes around 5,000 men and women in the United States will have been murdered. But for the maladministration of the criminal law in the United States, they would have escaped." Solemn prophecy, but the force of Mr. White's indictment is found in the facts he presents as the outcome of investigations he has conducted. Here they are: Twenty-five years ago there were about 1,500 homicides annually in this country; now there are about 8,000. In that time the population of the country has increased about 50 per cent; our homicides have increased by 433 per cent. Murder's list grows nearly nine times as fast as does the population. It is a sorry story, and it grows worse by world-wide comparison, as the following figures demonstrate: Our record is 90 people murdered of every million of population. Just across an invisible line from us is Canada, with a record of three murders to every million of inhabitants—one to our thirty! In Germany there are five murders to the million of inhabitants, in Great Britain ten, in France fourteen, in Belgium sixteen. Belgium has no death penalty. In Canada seven-eighths of the men convicted of murder are executed; in this country one in 74 pays the death penalty. That is to say, a convicted Canadian murderer stands 65 times as much chance of paying the extreme penalty as does his red-handed brother in this country. What wonder that the record stands 30 to 1 against us? And all, as our wisest men have said, because of our "maladministration of the law." It is an unbearable evil condition which should be terminated.

The Center of Population

Now that another federal census is about to be taken there is a good chance to guess where the center of population will be found to be located. Steadily westward it has advanced since the first census was taken, and so it will continue to advance until it finds something approximating a stable location not far from the geographical center of the original United States, perhaps in Kansas. When the first census was taken the center of population was found to be about 23 miles east of Baltimore; in 1800 it had journeyed 31 miles westward, and was 18 miles west of the same city; in 1810 it had shifted slightly to the south, as well as west, and was 40 miles northwest by west of the city of Washington, traveling almost due west, it reached a point 16 miles north of Woodstock, Virginia, and not far from the present line of West Virginia, in 1820. By 1860, still traveling almost due west, it had crossed West Virginia and was so far over in Ohio as a point 20 miles south of Chillicothe. It took thirty years, or until 1890, to pass the eastern line of Indiana, and in 1900 it was less than half across the state, six miles southwest of Columbus. Judging by the past, it now should be found to be located in southwestern Indiana, but there has been a great migration westward within the last decade, and it need surprise no one if the Illinois boundary is crossed.

Glad Tidings for the Crippled

Dr. E. H. Bradford, of the Children's Hospital, in Boston, delivers a message of glad tidings for those who are halt, lame or otherwise crippled, and as about one person in every thousand is a cripple, those who are directly interested in his announcement are many. According to him, two-thirds of the crippling diseases which were regarded as incurable a half century ago now are recognized as curable. That is to say, where, under the unfledged surgical science of fifty years ago, three people must have gone deformed through life, two now may be relieved of their infirmity. Presuming this assertion to be true, as it doubtless is, one realizes how great is the credit that is due to the surgeons of today. Hip disease and club foot now are recognized as merely temporary infirmities, while 99 per cent of hunchbacks can be cured if their cases are taken in youth. In a great majority of instances if a child thus afflicted goes unrelieved, the fault is that of the parents if they are able to pay for surgical relief.

Municipal Expenses Are Increasing

Five years are not a long time even in the brief span of a human life, and this is the time, terminating with 1907, covered by a recent report of the United States census bureau concerning the cost of running the government of cities. The report deals with the affairs of 148 of our greatest cities. It shows that at the close of 1902 the average expense of running these cities was $13.36 per capita. As this means an average of $66.80 for every head of a family of five persons, it seems a heavy enough tax in all conscience. Yet five years later the per capita tax had increased to $15.91, or more than 19 per cent. Let this rate of increase be continued, and the per capita tax would double in little more than a quarter of a century. So stand the unprejudiced and unfeeling facts presented by the census bureau, and they serve to explain, in some degree, one of the great American questions relating to municipalities: What becomes of our money?

When to Look Out for Marital Squalls

The Royal Commission is a British body appointed to secure facts and submit conclusions relating to reform of the English divorce laws, and probably some of the facts it has secured may be considered fairly typical of facts relating to the same subject elsewhere. For example, in the ten years from 1897 to 1906, inclusive, it has ascertained that 9,603 divorce suits were instituted in England and Wales, and these were begun after marital experiences of the following duration: Eighty-five within less than a year from marriage, 263 after from one to two years, 1,270 between two and five years, 2,925 between five and ten years, 3,895 between ten and twenty years, and 1,161 after twenty years. It would seem—would it not?—that a married pair might adjust themselves to each other in less than ten, twenty, or more years, and yet look at those figures. Time considered, the greatest proportion of divorces are from five to ten years after marriage, while ten to twenty years is not so far behind, and the later years have no occasion to feel proud of the showing.

Heat and Light of the Sun

It is both hot and light in the vicinity of the sun. These are axiomatic assertions which do not call for proof, but some figures recently given by Professor Nordmann of the Paris observatory add a statistical point to them. The solar heat, according to the professor, stands on a day of average coolness at 6,482 degrees centigrade, a degree of heat that is expressible in figures, but not otherwise conceivable by men. Every square inch of the sun's surface gives out light equal to 1,994,000 candle power; figures again inconceivable, but some comparative idea of them may be formed when it is remembered that the most brilliant arc light has an illuminating power of but 20,000 candles. But, speaking in a comparative way, the sun is not so warm, after all. Sirius, for instance, is about thirty times as hot as our own luminary, while the polar star, being rather chilly among heavenly bodies, is but thirty per cent hotter than our sun. So it appears that our sun is not really so hot as we have imagined, although it serves our purpose very well.

"Rab and His Friends."

"The best dog story in the English language" is not too strong a phrase to use to describe "Rab and His Friends." The gentle and learned Dr. John Brown of Edinburgh wrote a little cycle of stories and essays through which runs a chain of pure gold of humanity and sympathy, and of these Rab is the best. Here is a short story that appeals to the manliest men's most manly interests, for who is man's closer friend than his faithful dog, and what more closely than the dog runs back farther into the primitive life of man than this same brave and loyal friend? The story of the silent, strong cart driver and his love for his frail and patient wife runs parallel with the life story of Rab, the dog, masterful, deep breasted, grim and unafraid. From Homeric laughter at the dog fight with which the story opens, and at the defeat by Rab of the assailant of his mistress, on through sober joy at the picture of conjugal faithfulness, the reader's emotions pass to the welling up of unresisted tears when the cart driver's wife bares her bosom modestly before the students of the clinic and with sweet resignation lies down to wait the fatal knife. The picture of the journey homeward, the mistress' body borne upon the cart driven by the strong man bowed down with grief and followed by Rab, as grimly dumb in sorrow, is enough to shake the heart of any reader. And yet here is pathos that purifies while it saddens; these are tears that only wash from our eyes the dust of mortal wanderings that we may see heaven clear, leaving no smart behind. Brave, loyal Rab! sweet, patient woman! strong, manly carter! We turn from you with hearts refreshed as a dry land after rain, and think again with gratitude of your creator, the gentle, wise and just John Brown of Edinburgh.

A LETTER BY DICKENS

A letter written by Charles Dickens June 14, 1865, was recently sold at auction in New York. It was addressed to Mrs. Maria Winter, who was a Miss Maria Beadwell, and who was the original of Dora in "David Copperfield."

The date, address, and signature are in Dickens' hand, but the body of the letter is in the hand of some one else. It was written only five days after the railway accident he was in at Staplehurst. The carriage in which he was left the rails, but did not, like the others, fall over the viaduct. He suffered greatly and permanently from the shock.

"My dear Mrs. Winter:—Many thanks for your kind words of remembrance. This is not all in my own hand, because I am too much shaken to write many notes. Not by the beating and dragging of the carriage in which I was—it did not go over, but was caught on the turn among the ruins of the bridge—but by the work afterward to get out the dying and dead, which was terrible.

"Very faithfully yours,

"CHARLES DICKENS"

NOTES

A few months ago a great grandson of Robert Burns was discovered working as a maker of tea urns in a London factory. He is George William Pyrkas. His mother was Anne Burns, only daughter of the poet's eldest son, whose marriage took place in London.

In a letter to Olga Nethersole, Edmond Rostand says that he and Mme. Rostand will soon return to their estate at Cambo, where he will resume work upon "Don Quixote," the drama that is to follow "Chantier." While the poet is at work upon his next drama, which may not be produced for several years, his son, Maurice Rostand, will work upon the English adaptation and translation of "La Samaritaine" for Nethersole's use for next season. Late in the summer the English actress will be a guest at the Rostand castle and will go over the work with the poet, making final preparations for the premiere in London next fall.

LIBERTY'S BELL

(By Madge Morris Wagner.)

There's a legend told of a far-off land—
The land of a king—where the people planned
To build them a bell that never should ring
But to tell of the death or the birth of a king.

Or proclaim an event, with its swinging slow,
That should startle the nation to joy or woe.

It was not to be builded—this bell that they planned—
Of common ore dug from the breast of the land,

But of metal first moulded by skill of all arts—
Built of the treasures of fond human hearts.

And from all o'er the land, like pilgrims they came,
Each to cast in a burden, a mite in the flame

Of the furnace—his offering—to mingle and swell
In the curious mass of this wonderful bell.

Knights came in armor, and flung in the shields
That had warded off blows on the Saracen fields;

Freemen brought chains from the prisons afar—
Bonds that had fettered the captives of war;

And sabres were cast in the molten flood,
Stained with the crimson of heroes' blood;

Pledges of love, a bracelet, a ring,
A gem that had gleamed in the crown of a king;

The coins that had ransomed a maiden from death;
The words, hot with eloquence, caught from the breath

Of a sage, and a prayer from the lips of a slave
Were heard and recorded, and cast in the wave.

To be melted and moulded together, and tell
The tale of their wrongs in the tones of the bell.

It was finished at last, and, by artisan hand,
On its ponderous beams hung high over the land.

The slow years passed by, but no sound ever fell
On a listening ear from the tongue of the bell.

The brown spider wove her frail home on its walls,
And the dust settled deep in its cavernous halls.

Men laughed in derision, and scoffed at the pains
Of the builders; and harder and harder the chains

Of a tyrannous might on the people were laid;
More insatiate, more servile, the tribute they paid,

There was something they found far more cruel than death,
And something far sweeter than life's fleeting breath.

But hark! in the midst of the turbulent throng,
The moans of the weak and the groans of the strong,

There's a cry of alarm. Some invisible power,
Is moving the long silent bell in the tower.

Forward, and backward, and forward it swung,
And Liberty! Liberty! Liberty! rung

From its wide brazen throat, over mountain and vale,
Till the seas caught the echo, and monarchs turned pale.

Our forefathers heard it—that wild, thrilling tone—
Ringing out to the world, and they claimed it their own.

And up from the valley, and down from the hill,

From the flame of the forge, from the field and the mill,

They paid with their lives the price of its due,
And left it a legacy, freemen, to you.

And ever when danger is menacing nigh,
The mighty bell swings in the belfry on high;

And men wake from their dreams, and grasp in affright
Their swords, when its warning sweeps out in the night.

It rang a wild paean o'er war's gory waves,
When the gyves were unloosed from our millions of slaves;

It started with horror and trembled a knell
From ocean to ocean when brave Lincoln fell;

And again its wild notes sent a thrill through the land
When Garfield was struck by a traitorous hand;

And once in each year, as time onward rolls,
Slowly, and muffled, and mournful it tolls

A dirge, while Columbia pauses to spread
A tribute of love on the graves of her dead.

While Washington's name is emblazoned in gold,
While the valor of Perry or Sherman is told,

While the patriots treasure the words of a Hayne,
The fiery drops from the pen of a Paine,

While dear is the name of child, mother or wife,
Or sweet to a soul is the measure of life,

America's sons will to battle prepare
When its tones of alarm ring aloud on the air;

For Liberty's goddess holds in her white hand
The cord of the bell that swings over our land.

PERSONALIA

Edgar Allen Poe recently argued a case before Oliver Wendell Holmes. This Poe is the grandnephew of the man who wrote "The Raven," and this Holmes is the son of the man who wrote "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

Miss Mary Montgomery, daughter of a Presbyterian missionary in Turkey, and Miss Elizabeth S. Colton of Easthampton, Mass., are said to be the greatest linguists of their sex in America. Miss Montgomery only a few years ago astonished the University of Berlin by editing a dictionary of Oriental languages, while Miss Colton is said to speak fifty-four languages.

As a token of his German colleagues' esteem a silver drinking cup, described as of prehistoric German origin, was presented to President Wheeler. As a further indication of German appreciation of President Wheeler's efforts the organization was announced of the "Wheeler Society" for studying foreign pedagogical systems in general and that of America in particular.

Under the direction of the Civic Forum Miss Ellen Terry will come to America next season for a lecture tour of ten weeks, her subject being "The Heroines of Shakespeare."

Mrs. Jefferson is going to sell the summer home of the late Joseph Jefferson on Buzzard's bay.

William R. George, founder of the George Junior Republic Association, is to visit the Pacific coast to look over the republic in California which bears his name. The George Junior republic at Freeville, N. Y., has been in successful operation since 1894, and there are also branches in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. There is talk of asking him to establish a republic in Portland, Or.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has just appeared at her theater in a new drama, "La Beffa" (The Jest), translated by Jean Richepin in sonorous verse from the Italian. The scene is laid in mediaeval Florence and the plot begins with the mutual hatred of two men over a woman. Upon one of these a barbarous and bloody jest, called a "Beffa," is played by the other and his brother. The rest of the piece marks the vengeance of the victim, who contrives so cleverly that one brother by mistake kills the other. The action and the situations are very strong. Bernhardt's acting was superb.

DETECTIVE AND CHRISTIAN

THE INTERESTING CAREER AND IDEAS OF CAPTAIN PETERSON, OF OAKLAND

A lean but athletic figure that moves with the lithe vigor of a panther, a long jaw smooth shaven, a large hooked nose, a big mouth that rapidly changes from the broadest smile of good humor to the grim clasp of a steel trap, frank, light eyes guarded by gold-rimmed spectacles, this is the first impression of W. J. Peterson, chief of detectives of Oakland. If you did not know his calling you would say he was a student, who relieved an exceptionally close attention to his books by plenty of outdoor exercise. The freshness of his personality and the wholesomeness of his appearance rather accentuate the thoughtful expression of the face and the clear whiteness of his long, strong hands.

Captain Peterson is a Christian on a police force, a church officer whose specialty is crime. His theory of criminology is vigorous and brief: "Catch 'em. If you can reform 'em afterwards, do it—but catch 'em." The abbreviations of "them" are not evidences of ill education, they are the explosive abbreviations of emphasis.

Captain Peterson's career has been varied and interesting. Born in New Jersey, all his early life was spent in Oakland. Here he attended the public schools. From these schools an adventurous spirit drove him as a boy. He ran away from home and shipped as a sailor to China. He liked the life and sailed many seas, but he liked one girl better and came back from the lure that makes Kipling's hero say,

"For to admire and for to see,
For to be old this world so wide,
It never done no good for me,
Yet I can't drop it if I tried."

Captain Peterson did drop it, and married. He became an independent sailor with a short run, so that he might enjoy the pleasures of domestic life which have always appealed to him above everything else. A sailing yacht which he rented and sailed for private parties from San Diego to San Clemente Island and on coastwise runs brought him a comfortable income. A plunge in San Diego real estate with the profits of the business ended this career when the boom collapsed.

He brought his family to Oakland then and took the civil service examination for postal clerk. He worked in the postal service for some time, until he saw an advertisement of an examination for candidates for the police force. Without much thought of really entering the service he took and passed this examination. Sometime afterward he was summoned to the office of the police commissioner.

"Look here," said that official, "you are next on the eligible list, and if you say so I'll have to appoint you, but you have a good job already and there are a dozen men on the list below you that need this worse than you do and deserve it more."

"All right, sir," replied Peterson, "don't you give me anything I don't deserve or need. If any other man on that list has a better right to the job than I have, you give it to that man."

"But he didn't," adds Captain Peterson today, with a reminiscent twinkle in his eye. "He sent for me just a few days later."

He patrolled a beat only eighteen months, and was then promoted to be a sergeant. This is an exceptionally quick rise. Not long afterward he was promoted to a captaincy, and a little later still he was made chief of detectives. Ever since he has made good.

"Can a man stay a Christian and stay on the police force?" was the first question put to him by the writer.

"Yes. But it's harder than lots of other places. I believe no man has more temptations about him, more people trying to 'pull him down,' than a police officer. But he can keep his religion and stay here, too."

"Don't you have a good many temptations to profanity?"

"Yes, sir, and I swear sometimes, too. But I don't think my religion is any the worse for it. Sometimes it's better to swear and relieve the pressure than to keep anger bottled up where it will hurt."

"How about moral suasion, and the reformation of criminals?"

"We use that where we think it ought to be used. We are human beings in this office, just like other people, and we don't lose the common instincts of humanity just because we are police officers. Many a man we have brought in here who had yielded to temptation and committed his first crime for whom we have done everything we could to get a pardon and give him a chance. In many cases we have been successful, and of these most of the men we interceded for have lived exemplary lives ever since."

"On the other hand, we bring men in here who are hard and cynical, whose profession is crime and whose sole other business in life is to defeat us. With these we are just as rough as we have to be to handle them, and just as hard and cold as they are. Our business is to catch these men and to 'send them across,' and we do it the best we can."

"What is the most interesting thing about the profession of detective?"

"The chase. It's the old story of the blood-lust, in modern and civilized guise. Man loves a hunt, and no hunt is so absorbing or exciting as a man-hunt. It's this idea of the chase that keeps us keyed up with interest in our work, the pursuit of prey, the following of a scent, the discovery of a clue, the element of danger, the joy of capture. These things give our profession its most powerful and unflagging fascination."

"After these things, the most interesting phase of detective work is the solving of problems. A crime is committed and reported to us. We investigate it as searchingly as we can, and then assemble all the known facts, or clues, in the order of their apparent significance. Then, given these factors in the problem, we must try to find the correct answer to the criminal. First, we must look for a motive for the crime. This may suggest a dozen hypotheses about the crime and suggest a dozen directions for future investigation. These hypotheses must then be compared, rechecked with the evidence, and the more unlikely eliminated. So on, we narrow the field of investigation as far as we can. If we have time and good luck and have worked out the problem right, we get our man."

"What percentage of criminals do you detect and capture?"

"About half. Possibly even that is overstating it. We have this to contend with, however, which partly explains that percentage; we have about 300 cases reported to us every month, and we have a dozen detectives to run them down. That means that we sometimes have to abandon an old case that we do not feel hopeless about, because the people who report the new cases would make such a howl if we did not give them instant attention."

"But mark this, no crime is ever committed whose perpetrator is not one day known. It's as true as Holy Writ, that old saying, 'Be sure your sin will find you out.' It may be only on a man's deathbed, it may be after death, but as sure as it was committed it is found out sometime."

"What about Conan Doyle as a practical detective? Do any of the Sherlock Holmes stories have any practical suggestions for real detective work?"

"By all means. Of course, you understand that in those stories Sherlock Holmes is allowed unlimited time and unlimited resources with which to work out his deductions to their last possibilities, things which, as I have just explained, the regular detective has not freedom to do. So the Holmes stories are stories of ideal detective work, with ideal equipment and ideal conditions."

"Nevertheless, Doyle's description of Sherlock Holmes' method is a distinct addition to detective theory. His process of elimination, by which Holmes removes from the field of his investigations, one after another, whole classes of humanity, whole trades and professions, whole groups of criminals as being certain not to have committed the given crime, thus narrowing his search to a relatively small group of people, and then, by the same process, eliminating all individuals of that group but the one individual who is guilty—this, I say, is a theory of first importance in detective work. It can not always be utilized to its full value in everyday practice, but the detective who understands that theory, studies its possibilities for his own use and then applies it, is a better detective than the man who does not."

All of this sounded very odd from a man who, as he spoke, sat facing an open desk on which lay two huge revolvers—who, while he talked received the reports of several deputies with a crisp, "What you got to say?" that was not curt, but very businesslike—who had been a runaway sailor, a postal clerk, a patrolman on the beat. And yet it did harmonize with the gold-rimmed spectacles, the thoughtful eyes, the long white hands of the student. Captain Peterson does not suggest Sherlock Holmes in appearance, but he does suggest, in appearance and manner and surroundings and speech and antecedents, a very interesting character.

Captain Peterson has done some original work in his line, too. In his office he has a system of records of criminals that is probably as complete and as minute within its scope as any in the world. Not only are the Bertillon measurements of every criminal ever handled by his office filed away in the cabinets behind his chair, but also elaborate data of his own selection—distinguishing scars and marks of the most (seemingly only) trivial and minute kind, thumb prints, foot prints, every item of physical structure that could conceivably be checked off at a future day against another examination of the same criminal. There are also filed here all the photographs and descriptions of criminals whose cases have been reported from other parts of the country. And all this huge mass of intricate data is elaborately indexed, cross-indexed, subdivided, reclassified, sub-indexed and cross-sub-indexed, so that, from the most meager description of a former criminal who may be at large, the process of elimination may be used to reduce the search to the names of those few men who possess all of the characteristic marks indicated in the description.

And, as we noted at the beginning of this article, Captain Peterson is an active Christian. An interesting figure, a combination of Sherlock Holmes and a deacon. But it seems to work, without friction, both ways.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

Every effort is being made to make the centennial celebration of the development of San Bernardino valley, which is to be held in San Bernardino next May, the most striking fiesta ever given in Southern California.

The 1910 national convention of the American Mining Congress will be held in Los Angeles during the week beginning September 26.

The citizens of Fresno have carried the proposition to bond the city in the sum of $60,000 to establish playgrounds for children throughout the city.

A recent escape of prisoners from the Chico jail was the second jail break from that institution within two months.

Thomas Salmon, a brakeman, fell from a Southern Pacific freight train near Exeter and received injuries which resulted in his death.

Near Wheatland, Joseph M. Rutherford accidentally shot and killed himself. Too much port wine is said to have been the cause.

It is expected that a citrus fair will be held in Visalia next December, and the construction of a large pavilion for it now is under consideration.

Steps are being taken preliminary to preparing and submitting a new and modern charter to popular vote in Modesto.

In various parts of the Sacramento valley large tracts of land are being purchased, subdivided and sold in lots of a few acres each.

The people of Willows are to vote on the question of annexing the suburbs to that little city.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

It Is Dreadfully Hard

My wee little daughter quite naughty had been,
And I felt it my duty to chide,
So I lengthened my face, her attention to win,
As I summoned her unto my side,
And I said, "Can't you be just as sweet as you should
To please the good angels on guard?"
But she whispered, "My papa, I want to be dood,
But, oh, it's so dweadfully hard!"

Now I fancy that you, who are wiser than I,
Might have followed a different plan,
But all that I did was to kiss her, and sigh,
"Well, well, do the best that you can,"
For I knew how the years of my pilgrimage stood,
By error and frailty marred.
Like you, little maid, I should like to be good,
But, oh, it's so dreadfully hard!

It is dreadfully hard. The paths we have trod
Bear witness how often we strayed,
But the great, loving Father, the infinite God,
He knoweth the creatures He made;
And perhaps He will say at the close of the day:
"The ages must ripen my plan;
There is hope for my children though sadly they stray
If they do but the best that they can."

The Organization Doctor and His Pills

"Here," said the Organization Doctor to his Public Patient, "are some Anderson pills for you. They are highly recommended, thoroughly respectable and are guaranteed not to make you any sicker than I have kept you for the last thirty years. Be sure to take them."

As the Organization Doctor turned to go back to his office at the Railroad Headquarters he beckoned the Machine Nurse to his side and spoke to her in a low tone of voice.

"Here are the Curry pills," he said. "See that they are substituted for the Anderson pills and that he takes liberal doses. He acts as if he might be tired of the Curry pills, but I know what I want him to have."

Moral:—The Organization Doctor, with the aid of the Machine Nurse, has his own methods of administering his pills, but a rumor is out that the Public Patient is becoming "wise" to them.

Found His Rest, But 'Twas Overdone

He said, "Today I am yearning for rest, for the heart beats slow in my time-worn breast, and I long for a place that is calm and still, where hustle is dead and business is nil, some peaceful, deserted and lonely spot where the throb's unfelt and the surge comes not. I yearn with a yearn that nothing can stun for a quiet place where nothing is done."

So he hied him away, being old and wise, to a store that never would advertise, and the drone of the flies drowned his soft, "Tee-hee!
Here's a place for rest to the steenth degree."

So he sat and dreamed, though the world still ran, outside of that store, on its old, swift plan, and the tides of commerce swept to and fro, but they touched him not—they couldn't, you know, for the merchant had said, "I don't advertise." Oh, the droning hum of the drowsy flies! as he said, with a heart that was full of bliss, "As a place for rest there is nothing like this."

I saw him today. He had left the store, and was back in the hustle and bustle once more.
"I had to get out,"—it was this he said—"for I yearned for a rest, but not to be dead."

Must Have Happened in Pittsburg

"As true as steel," the mayor had said in the course of his remarks.

The representative of the steenth ward sat up and took notice.

"Why didn't you tell me about it?" he said.
"About what?" the mayor inquired.

"Aw, you know," was the response.
"It is spelled with two e's," the mayor explained. Here another official heart broke.

The Opinions of Rufus

Self-conceit's ojus, but I'm free to admit that I don't know any much more useless critter than the man that ain't got any of it.

If some men had to choose 'tween their church an' their political party I s'pose it would kind o' hurt their feelin's to have to treat the church that way.

The more I see of a few men an' women here an' there the more I feel there can't be any question 'bout immortality. I don't b'lieve the Creator could afford to throw that kind o' timber away.

"Make haste slowly," but not so blame slowly that you can't convince anybody that you're movin'.

"Why does selfishness hully govern all people?" says Josh Bings to me. "Why does bread allers fall with its buttered side down?"
says I. "Dunno," says he. "Well," says I,
"the answer in both cases is the same: It don't."

Seems ter me that the unsatisfyin' thing
'bout fame is that its owner has ter be dead a hundred years 'fore he knows whether he's got it or not.

Ezry Pennick says he don't b'lieve in kickin' men down. "Shucks!" he says, "all a feller orto do is just to hold 'em down 'nough so they can't interfere with what he wants to git."

Some folks idee of the millenyum is a glad an' happy time to come when there won't be anybody to interfere with their havin' things the way they want 'em to be.

A reely good man is one that is good even when it interferes with his doin' things he wants to do.

The poet said that the proper study of mankind is man, and he might have added that it frequently is the most discouragin'.

Concerning Being Unselfish

I heard you say, Luella, that you wished to lead a helpfully unselfish life, and I was glad to hear it. It is a fine thing to desire to lead that kind of a life, but it is subject to the little drawback that none of us attain the desire. In order to be wholly unselfish one would have to be born again, and born in another world than this at that, for the plant does not do well in the soil of this planet.

We say to ourselves—at least, we do if we are worthy of salvation—that we would like to remember our brother's or sister's needs quite as much as our own, and we are conscious of a warm feeling about our hearts at the thought that we are so good as to have such a desire. We still are feeling comfortably warm in that region when some question of personal interest confronts us. It is a case of My Brother vs. Me, and here is the opportunity to display our fine altruism. We are just about to display it, when up pops the little, plausible Imp of Self.

"Aw, to thunder with your brother!" he whispers. "He doesn't need this half as much as you do. You really need it, while he can get along without it just as well as not."

I'll leave it to you, Luella, if that isn't the way he talks, and I'll leave it to you, too, if you do not concede, in action, that his argument is sound very, very often. Oh, we mean to be unselfish, but it is so hard to resist the little demon's argument.

Nevertheless, Luella, I wish to make it clear to you that no man or woman can be worth very much to mankind unless he at least has the desire to be unselfish. Having that desire, the little Imp of Self will whisper hardly less, but sometimes we will resist his suggestions, and every time we do it the world is made a little better as a living place. To this extent the desire counts, and that is a great deal.

So hold to your pretty wish to be unselfish, Luella. You will come a long, long way from attaining it, but you will take some halting steps in the right direction, and that is infinitely better than to remain selfish, cold and callous in a world where a brother's hand outreached to brothers is needed on every side and in every day of the long catalogue of days.

Thoughtful Man on Noises You Hear

"I was going down the street," said the Thoughtful Man, "and the Salvation Army was out. The bass drum was booming, and the tambourines were jangling. 'I will stop and see what our honored mayor has to say,' said
I to myself, but soon I realized that I hadn't heard Heney's name mentioned, and then I knew I had been mistaken."

"'Tis a militant mouth our distinguished mayor has," the Thoughtful Man continued.
"It is night, and, notwithstanding the hard times, you are peacefully sleeping on your humble, mortgaged couch, when there comes a noise as of an Eastern thunder-storm and a midnight cat rolled up in one, and you wake with an idea that Gabriel has just blown his horn and you would better get a move on or you will be late for the debate. 'Tis merely our noble mayor ridding himself of his idea of City Attorney Long and his jaw. You haven't more than got to sleep again when you are aroused by what appears to be a tornado playing tag with a hurricane. In the morning you ascertain from the papers that our heroic mayor has been saying what he thought of Heney."

"The other day a report went out that San Francisco had been visited by an earthquake.
The error was natural, but we who are here know that all that happened was that our heroic mayor was explaining why it was necessary to give the taking of the city's collections to the president of the Sutter Street Railway company in order to expedite the city's operation of the Geary street line."

"He has a great capacity for expression, has our revered mayor, don't you think so?" the Thoughtful Man inquired.

"Yes, but so has a fog-horn," said I.

Another Spring Pome

Now do the winds of March run to and fro,
And Nature's smiles are lost in fleeting tears;
Now Spring essays her anthem sweet and low,
And blest is he who her faint music hears;
Now from some hidden place, or near or far,
O'er some obscure, undesignated track,
Unseen processions none may halt or bar,
The ants come back.

Lo, how the teasing zephyrs slyly toss
Myrtilla's hair, wherein the sunlight lies—
Her hair of gold untouched by lesser dross—
And filmy veils are drapery of the skies;
From Winter's sleep the tiny violet wakes,
The Columbine's wee watch-fires gleam and burn,
And from some haunt where each itself be takes
The fleas return.

From scenes remote a phantom voice is heard,
"Come out, come out, and know the life supreme,
The life by worry and by care unstirred."
We hear the voice as in some sweetest dream,
And we would go where happy songsters trill,
And Nature's balm for souls distempered find Where days are fair and nights serene and still,
Nor skeeters mind.

Baby Knew Where She Was

Baby was in her wonderful third year, and her doting mamma and papa had taken her out for a walk. As they neared home, on their return, it occurred to the mother that she would ascertain just how observant the little one was—did she recognize the vicinity of her home? So the test was made.

"Baby," said her mother, "do you know where we are?"

"Es," piped the wee voice.

Happy parents! How observant their tiny tad was!

"Where are we?" was the next question.

"Here!" was the shrill answer.

And as that was exactly where they were, there was nothing more to be said; but the parents knew that there never was such a baby as their baby, just as we all do.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

The Event Of the Day There was something splendidly dramatic in the way that Old Joe Cannon on Saturday last faced the crisis in his political history. He did not lose his head until the fight was all over and the fact that, before the Illinois Society, he scolded like an old woman will hardly be long treasured against him. It was too much to expect that so much wrath could remain pent up indefinitely. The "Old Order Changeth," and Joe Cannon belongs to the old order. He can not be made to understand the new order that is to take its place. He has "done politics" all his life, and can conceive of no other way of running a government except by "doing politics" in the interests of those who furnish the sinews of war. There is no reason why the public should hate Uncle Joe Cannon, but there is every reason why the public should hate "Cannonism" and do all in its power to destroy it. Joseph Cannon belongs to the era of the rough-and-ready, the doing things by "main strength and awkwardness," guided by mother wit rather than exact knowledge and living and acting in the present instead of with an eye to the permanent good of the nation and the ultimate welfare of the human race. The rough-and-ready fitted a time when there was a raw continent to subdue instead of a skimmed continent to conserve, rehabilitate and fertilize and make fit to sustain our children's children, however numerous they may be. The old order changeth and with that change must go a change of men in high places and a change in the ideals of all men. That change in ideals has already taken place among the people. It is only among Bourbonistic upper class men that the signs of the times are not perceived.

Insurgency and The New Order Many will wish to understand what the new order has in mind to take the place of the old. It is not perfectly certain, as yet, what will result, but this much seems evident. Hereafter the Speaker of the House will be the presiding officer of the House and nothing more. He will preserve order, put motions and declare results, and little else. Party government will not be abolished, but it may be liberalized. The party caucus will succeed the speaker as autocrat. The committees will, by and by, be made up by a committee of which the presiding officer will not be a member, to the end that he may have no temptation to be partisan in his conduct of the deliberations of the House. In short we shall come near to the English system which makes the presiding officer of the House of Commons so non-partisan that he is not even a member of the house. The tendency will be also to encourage independent voting in the House. There is no reason why party lines should be drawn on the hook worm, on conservation, savings banks, the disposition of power sites or the reformation and party had a chance to cross that stream before they got into it. It was one of the first proposals put up to the President when he had taken the oath of office, but he turned the proposal down and undertook to carry his policies through with the organization as it was, and it was better to swap horses in the middle of the stream than not to swap at all. The "organization" would not have agreed to swap at all without making a sound drubbing a condition precedent. If the House shall prove so irreconcilable as to be unable to do business from this time forward the public may conclude that the revolution was ill-timed, in which case our stand-pat delegation may not be seriously injured when they come up for reelection, but if the revolutionists take hold loyally to enact the Taft policies into law the honors will be theirs. At present public sentiment is strongly with the revolutionists and if the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League does not get out candidates to contest for the nomination with the standpatters Democrats will be much encouraged to enter the fight. Our stand-patters in Congress are so mainly for the reason that that is the way to "get things" for their districts. That has been the truth.

MR. A. J. WALLACE
Candidate for Lieutenant-Governor

What "Cannonism" Really Stood For The theory of the Old Order was this: That the people, in primary and caucus, elect delegates to conventions, that these local conventions elect delegates to other conventions and that these other conventions adopt political platforms and nominate candidates for office standing on those platforms and pledged to enact them into laws. When all parties had gone thus far came the general "try out" before the people and the party that found favor in the people's sight was placed in power to run the government, the minority party being on hand to watch every step to see that good faith was kept with the people and an account of stewardship given in each recurring campaign. That was a good theory and if practice conformed to theory the Old Order would not suffer change.

But great and selfish interests grew up, and they were non-partisan. They made use of the party that, in any given place or time, could be made most useful to them and they did this by supplying means for making campaigns, by giving retainers to legislators, by employing bright men to make politics their business and, when they had elevated one of these to office, he was expected to serve the interests of these selfish organizations rather than the public interests. Therefore the American Congress had come to be an institution for carrying into effect policies antagonistic to the common welfare, such as the Payne-Aldrich tariff law, and it became the function of Cannon, as speaker of the house, to reward those who "took program" and to punish those who would not. This he did through the power given him as presiding officer of the House of Representatives, to constitute all the committees, name their chairmen. Through a rules committee of his own construction he became dictator of the house and autocrat of all he surveyed. His plea has been loyalty to party. It has been loyal to the selfish interests that have usurped control of the party organization in the nation just as Herrinism has usurped control of party organization here in California.

of the procedures of the United States courts. It will not be needful for issues to become party issues before they can become public issues. This reform will be to the House of Representatives a good deal what the direct primary is to become to the general public—a means of participating in the business that comes before the House instead of leaving such disposition practically to one man and that man more a representative of special than of public interests. Anyhow, the Speaker of the House will no longer be able to use the tremendous powers incident to the organization of the House chiefly that he may reward those who "take program" from the oligarchy to which he belongs and punish those who do not. The House of Representatives, on the nineteenth of March one thousand nine hundred and ten, did a good day's work.

California Delegation The question first to arise in the minds of Californians is, Where were our congressmen when the great insurgent fight was fought and won? The answer is easy. With the exception of E. A. Hayes they were on the side where the "Cannonization" was thickest. They "stood pat" and for so standing they will have to reckon with their constituents. Their justification will be that while crossing the stream was no time to swap horses. There is some merit in the contention. They will also claim that loyalty to the President and his policies prevented. The strength of that excuse will be determined by the result. But president ham has, until within three or four years, been independent at home while clinging closely to the "organization" at Washington and for the reason that that has been the only way to "get things." Knowland started in as a "kicker," but Needham soon showed him the error of his ways. When Smith got back there he had rather a hard experience through being brought into antagonism with the administration. The attitude of our stand-patters is not as difficult to account for as the independent and courageous action of E. A. Hayes as an insurgent. That is much easier to commend than to understand, but he has done splendidly and should be given full credit for it. There is going to be a strong demand upon the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to bring out and put up contestants at the August primaries for every seat except that of Hayes. The action of the League may depend on the history that is made at Washington during the next two weeks, by which time it is likely that recent events will have become more perfectly understood at home. The political atmosphere is heavily laden with the spirit of liberty, liberty in congress and liberty at home, and what that spirit demands it is likely to get even if California has to wipe off the entire political slate and begin new.

Anybody to Beat Leavitt The idea of "getting things" instead of righting wrongs finds much in human nature to sanction it, but it is detestable, the more especially when advocated by a worker in the cause of Right Things, such as the Oakland Enquirer. Frank W. Leavitt represents the sixteenth senatorial district in the state legislature. He is the most forceful legislator on the floor of the senate, and, if he were as good a man politically as he is efficient as a legislator, he should be kept in the senate or sent to congress. But he is not. He spends three-fourths of his time doing wrong things instead of right. His political ideals are no better than those of Charley Curry. For years the existence of the racetrack iniquity at Emeryville was due to Frank Leavitt. He ought to be beaten by whomever can beat him. It may be that Young Tyrrell, Mayor Mott's private secretary, is not the man to try conclusions with Leavitt, but the argument urged against Tyrrell and on behalf of Leavitt by the Enquirer—that Leavitt can "get things" for Alameda county—is an argument not worthy to be made in the columns of that paper. Somebody must have slipped that editorial in while the regular management wasn't looking. If the public character of Frank Leavitt were on a parity with his capacity he would be one of the first men in this commonwealth, but it is not and he should be beaten by the man who can beat him, a thing not easy, for he is hard to beat. There is no danger of doing a worse thing than to elect him. The sixteenth district owes it to the state to keep Leavitt at home.

Completing a State Ticket The executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League convened in San Francisco last Saturday and went as far as possible toward completing a state ticket. The committee invited Mr. A. J. Wallace of Los Angeles, to become the League's candidate for lieutenant-governor, endorsed the action of the Southern Californian delegation in bringing forward Mr. Wallace's name, and pledged him its hearty support in his race. The same action was taken with respect to the candidacy of Judge John D. Works, of Los Angeles, for United States senator. The committee also came to an understanding that the candidacy of Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, of Los Angeles, for associate justice of the supreme court of California, would be similarly endorsed as soon as the Southern delegation took formal action in line with its tacit avowal of Judge Wilbur as its choice. The committee also asked Alexander Gordon, of Sacramento, to be the League's candidate for railroad commissioner from the first district, to succeed A. C. Irwin, the incumbent.

Judge John D. Works for The United States Senate Judge John D. Works, who will make the race for the United States senate, is one of the ablest and most highly valued men in Southern California. He served as Superior Court judge in San Diego county in 1886-87, and was appointed to the Supreme Court of California in 1888, by Governor Waterman, to succeed Elisha W. McKinstry, who had resigned. Six weeks after his appointment he was regularly nominated and elected, serving to the end of McKinstry's term of twelve years, ending January 1, 1892. After his retirement from the Supreme bench, Judge Works enjoyed a lucrative practice in Los Angeles. When the crisis in the city government of that city occurred last year, Judge Works accepted a nomination from the Good Government forces for the city council, to which he was elected and of which he became president. There his forceful personality helped raise the plane of city government from its old ward politician hue to the level of a public service worthy the labor of the best citizenship. He has already entered upon a campaign in conjunction with Hiram Johnson and A. J. Wallace that promises to sweep the state for the League ticket at the primaries. Judge Works promptly put himself on record as a follower of Roosevelt, a believer in the conservation policy, a sympathizer with the insurgent movement in Congress, and unalterably opposed to the continuance in power of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company.

Judge Wilbur For The Supreme Bench Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, who will be the running mate of Justice Sloss on the League ticket for the Supreme Court bench, has already been described on this page. He is clean, he is honest, and he is an able lawyer. He has also an abounding humanity, attested by his work in the juvenile court of Los Angeles, that is a quality sorely needed on a bench now overloaded with judges whose tendency is to put the letter of the law above its spirit, and who too often enforce the law with an eye to its effect upon things rather than with a thought to its effect upon men. He is also aware of the necessity for greater simplicity and less delay in the administration of justice. He is of the type of men most needed to bring the Supreme Court of this state into a living relation with living problems in the lives of real people, and to get that court out of its realm of aerial abstraction and aloofness from mankind.

Alex. Gordon, Ideal Man For Railroad Commission Alexander Gordon, who will make the race for the railroad commission from the first district, is a "plain, blunt man," a rancher turned banker, a sturdy, shrewd Scotch-American, whose name is a household word from Bakersfield to Chico. Mr. Gordon made money and a reputation for rugged honesty as a vineyardist near Fresno. His shrewdness and his upstanding character caused the Savings Bank of Sacramento to ask him to handle its loans on real estate in the San Joaquin valley. His success in this work led to an offer from the bank to become its vice-president and manager of all its loans department with headquarters in Sacramento. Several years' work there has spread his reputation for vigor, character and ability throughout that district. He is now ready to retire from business life, still in the prime of mature manhood, and to round out his career he is willing to offer his experience to the service of the public. If he is elected he can be counted on to see that the railroad commission "does things" besides drawing a salary. Nothing Mr. Gordon has ever handled has been allowed to be other than a live business proposition, dealt with upon a basis of vigorous constructive action, and carried to success by sound judgment and square dealing.

J. W. Linscott Is Bound By Santa Cruz Charter The nomination for State Superintendent of Public Instruction could have been had by Mr. J. W. Linscott, of Santa Cruz, upon a statement by him that he would make the race. Mr. Linscott, however, feels himself morally bound by a probably illegal provision in the Santa Cruz charter which requires teachers in those schools to resign upon participating in politics as candidates for office. Mr. Linscott had, and has, the heartiest respect and good will of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, and the failure to procure his candidacy for the state office can only be recompensed by such a choice as, for instance, Mr. Francis of the Los Angeles Polytechnic High School, or Mr. Barker, of Santa Rosa and Oakland.

What the League's Principles Are The state executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has just issued the following statement of Cardinal Principles, or platform, of the League: "The immediate and essential purposes of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League of California are: "1.—(Foremost) The emancipation of the Republican party in California from domination by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Railroad company and its allied interests. "2.—(Executive) The nomination and election of a state administration free from control by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Railroad company and its allied interests and pledged to a policy of efficiency and economy rather than to the maintenance of a political machine through the spoils of office.

"3.—(Legislative) The nomination and election to the Legislature of those candidates only who are recognized as capable and honest and who, while treating all persons and property interests fairly, are known to be absolutely free from any dictation by or obligation to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company or its allied interests.

"4.—(Judicial) The indorsement of the principle that the judiciary be removed as far as possible from the sphere of politics, believing that the dignity and usefulness of the bench will be best promoted by continuing in office judges known, not by their activity in partisan politics, but rather by ability and fidelity to duty proved by their judicial conduct and record on the bench.

"5.—(Reform of Laws) Such a revision and simplification of our system of laws and our criminal and civil procedure as shall result in the speedy and equal enforcement of justice.

"6.—(Election of United States Senators) The enactment by the next Legislature, and transmission to Congress, of an act or joint resolution favoring an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing for the election of United States senators by direct vote of the people, and, pending the adoption of this federal amendment, such a revision of the primary election law of our state as shall afford a statewide advisory vote as to the election of United States senators."

Hiram W. Johnson's Reception in Southern California Enthusiastic Johnson and Wallace wound up their week's tour of the South Saturday night at Ventura. Their reception wherever they appeared was remarkable in more ways than one. Never before in the political annals of California have two candidate for public office been so completely overwhelmed with expressions of good will and promises of active and hearty support five months in advance of the day of nomination. These two men have set the entire South aflame with enthusiasm. Men who have always hitherto been regarded as staunch supporters of the old organization—not a few, but many, in every county where these two candidates have spoken—have pledged their earnest efforts to aid them in their fight to free the state from the shackles bound upon it by the Southern Pacific. The sincerity and unselfishness of both men have appealed strongly to the hearts of thousands of voters who heretofore have not identified themselves with the progressive movement. Perhaps the dramatic incidents transpiring at the national capital during the past few days have awakened many of these to the necessity of entering heartily into the nation-wide fight to restore to the people their inherent rights, in state as well as nation; at any rate the reception accorded the field leaders of the struggle in California has transcended the highest hopes of the promoters of the movement to free the Republican party and the state from the incubus of machine control.

Southern Newspapers Believe It's Johnson A study of the editorial columns of the Southern California newspapers develops an edifying and hopeful situation, so far as the interests and aspirations of the forces at work for reform in state government are concerned. While it is true that Curry and Stanton have their supporters among the Republican editors of the South, they are found to be few in number and not of any particular influence. Many of the interior papers are claiming that Hiram W. Johnson will secure fully two-thirds of the Republican vote of the South at the primary election. The editorial utterances of these papers, with rare exceptions, show that the writers have kept closely in touch with sentiment within the party not only in their own communities, but throughout the state generally. They are expressing not their own opinions perhaps so much as reflecting the sentiments voiced by the majority of their exchanges. If the opinions to which these papers give expression are a criterion, Johnson's victory at the primary

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—Enclosed please find stamps for your cor-respondent's report for which accept thanks. "The Beast and the Jungle" is also a good thing and we believe with Roosevelt that publicity is the surest and speediest way of minimizing corrupt legislation and business methods. The feeling of security from public censure and prosecution is a great incentive for greedy business men and legislators to gratify their instincts. When the Guggenheims have gobbled what is left of our public domain we will have Mars.

Yours truly,

W. A. ROGERS.

Kansas City Stock Yards, March 7, 1910.

There is little reason to doubt that if the "Denman Report On the Causes of Municipal Corruption In San Francisco" could be placed in the hands of every intelligent voter it would render the repetition of such another carnival of crime almost impossible in any city of this country and in any state in this union. And all that these reports cost is ten cents each!
There are 9,000 school district officers in this state, all leading citizens of their respective neighborhoods. A copy of that report should be placed in the hands of each one of these.
Who will contribute to that end? It is publicity that cures. These reports would be read and passed from neighbor to neighbor and so leaven the whole neighborhood and all the neighborhoods in the state.

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I thank you for calling my attention to the price of the pamphlet on "Municipal Corruption" in your city. I received the pamphlet and was much interested in the contents.

I also thank you for calling my attention to Mr.
Hichborn's book, and herein I inclose Chicago exchange for $1.50 to pay for a copy of the same. I want to see how corrupt the Southern Pacific is. I understand it does the legislating for the state. I am not interested in Pacific coast affairs, only as I am interested as a citizen of our common country in getting cleaner, purer, and wiser government. We are nearing a crisis, and whether our people will be wise enough to go through it peacefully I can not foresee.

I trust you and your associates may succeed in establishing clean and honest government on the Pacific coast.

Very truly yours,

R. A. SANKEY.

Wichita, Kan., Mar. 12th, 1910.

We are going to clean 'em up, Mr. Sankey, without any question except as to time, and we are going to do it peaceably. There is nobody to be licked. There is nobody upon whom to make war with force and arms.
There are a few politicians who are cordially and deservedly detested, but their taking-off would be assassination, not war, and the forces of reform in California are not inclined to the Russian method of redressing wrongs.
It is all a question of making the people of California know and realize that they are not,
and for a generation have not been, the government in California, though they ought to be and can be without employing any weapon more sanguinary than the Australian ballot.
Mr. Hichborn has done fine work to that end with his "Story of the California Legislature of 1909." The California Weekly is helping.
You ought to read that, too.

Editor California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—I do not believe that it is a case of exaggerated sex consciousness that makes me wish so strongly to protest against your editorial called "Miserable Women."

It is so evidently born of some special case that it becomes at once an almost insulting generalization. And it inspires one to ask the pertinent question, What can any outsider, or even close friend, really know of the true causes of domestic infelicity?

I think it is a deplorable weakness in a paper which we have grown to expect to be rather free from them-- to indulge in such an outburst.

Because a certain man here in Los Angeles has just divorced a confiding wife on the ground that he could do so if she did not bear him children—and rushed the thing through in order to hold a public office, would you approve of an editorial entitled "Miserable Men?"

I for one hope I should feel the same pang over it as I do now. If I am too warm in my expressions or discourteous pray pardon me.

Very sincerely yours,

DOROTHEA MOORE.

1649 Orange St., Los Angeles, Mar. 15th.

Our correspondent is neither discourteous nor too warm in her expressions of dissent.
The offending paragraph was not written to fit a single case, but rather a considerable class of cases which our present day journalism loves to make the most of, a class sufficiently numerous to keep up interest in that kind of journalism from ocean to ocean. There are domestic infelicities that make the heart bleed.

There are splendid women who go through life chained to the body of death, and there are women, and men, too, who have force of character so robust as to enable them to burst the bonds of that death and dare to live. To them all honor and glory, provided that innocent children suffer no wrong in consequence.
Better death itself, yea, a living death, than the wrongs inflicted upon childhood through broken homes. Indeed, almost the entire problem of childish dependency and delinquency has the broken home for its foundation. And yet, if there be any one of the teachings of Jesus to which exceptions may be taken it was that which forbade divorce-ment except for one cause, not by any means the cruellest wrong that may be committed against the marriage relation.

Fire Record of the Forest Service

Last year the national forest service made an excellent record in fire fighting, as the following official announcement indicates: Almost eighty per cent of the forest fires were extinguished before as much as five acres had been burned; less than one and one-half acres to the square mile of national forest land was burned over, or scarcely more than one-fifth of one per cent; average damage to burned-over areas amounted to but $1.26 an acre. In 1908, 230,000,000 board feet of timber was consumed, while in 1909 this very considerable total was reduced to 170,000,000 board feet, a reduction of more than one-fourth.

EIGHT MONTHS UNDER "BERKELEY PLAN"

HOW THE NEW CHARTER WORKS OUT IN PRACTICE

By BEVERLY L. HODGHEAD, Mayor of Berkeley

A charter is only an aid to good government. Municipal government is more a question of men than of constitutions or charters, but that form of charter is to be preferred which provides the best method for the selection of the officials and makes the wisest distribution of its powers.

The Berkeley charter which has been in operation since July 1, 1909, was framed along the lines of the commission plan, but it embodies some original provisions. Its fundamental characteristics are its simplicity and the concentration of authority and responsibility.

The chief features of the Berkeley charter are:

- 1st. The provision relating to elections.
- 2nd. The small council with large powers and full responsibility.
- 3rd. The abolition of wards.
- 4th. The ultimate veto in the people.
- 5th. The co-ordination and unification of the administrative departments of the city government.

The Provision as to Elections

The aim of the freeholders who prepared the Berkeley charter was, as far as possible, to place the power of selection of officials in the hands of the non-political or business element of the community, and then offer an inducement to the apathetic or indifferent business man which would encourage him to exercise his rights as a citizen. To accomplish this, Berkeley originated and adopted the system of dual elections. It abolishes the party primary, the party convention and all forms of party nominations, and provides that all nominations for office shall be made by petition only, and that no party designation shall appear on the ticket, nor anything indicating the course of the candidacy. The first election is a primary or a final election according to the votes which the respective candidates receive. The first election is not a mere primary. To designate it a primary merely would only invite the indifference which is usually displayed toward primaries by the non-political element of the community. Heretofore the business man has voted once, that is, at the final election. The politician votes twice, not only at the election, but also at the primary, and the choice is frequently determined by the result of this first, or politician's election. The remedy which the Berkeley charter proposes is to make the first election not a mere primary, but a conditional election. It does not restrict the first election to the mere nomination of candidates. It is not called a primary at all. It is called an election and does result in an election should any candidate receive a majority of the votes cast for that office. The signatures of twenty-five qualified voters on any petition is sufficient for nomination. There is no limitation of the number of candidates. Where any person may run for office without the sanction of political leaders, it is possible the candidates may be numerous, though the number will not be as great as might be assumed. Notwithstanding the number of candidates for the same office, if one should receive a majority of all the votes cast, the people have then expressed a choice and a second election is needless.

If no candidate receives a majority of the votes at the first election, then that election serves as a primary and the two candidates receiving the highest number of votes become the nominees for office and the second election is held.

Advantages of Dual Election Plan

The obvious advantages of this plan are several. It requires in all cases a majority vote to elect instead of a plurality. It not only enables but it induces the people to make their own nominations. It eliminates parties, it eliminates bosses, it eliminates conventions. The business man, who only votes at the election and never at the primary, turns out to vote because the first election is not a primary.

The effectiveness of these provisions to arouse an interest in the first election is illustrated by the results in Berkeley. The vote at the first election under its new charter in May last, which corresponds to the primary election, instead of representing an insignificant proportion of the registered vote was 25 per cent greater than the votes cast at the second election. That may be partly explained from other causes, but it is a significant fact that the number of votes cast at the primary for municipal offices two years before, when the population was about the same, was 631, whereas the vote cast at the first election under the new charter, corresponding to the primary election, was 5,025.

The Small Council

The first advantage of the small council is that it results in short ballots. Outside of the school directors, the only elective officers of the city are the mayor, auditor and four councilmen, and of the latter, but two are to be elected every two years. At each election therefore after the first, there will be but four municipal officers to elect. As the confusion of voters is to some extent proportionate to the length of the ballot, the small number of officers to be chosen makes the issue clear and distinct.

The council is composed of the mayor and four councilmen. The mayor has a vote but no veto. This council constitutes what is practically the board of directors to transact the business of the city. It appoints the officers, all of whom hold during its pleasure. It is directly and immediately responsible for everything to the people. A comparatively small part of the business of the city is legislative. It is nearly all executive and administrative. Most of the questions which arise require prompt action, and simply demand the application of sound business judgment and somebody to attend to them daily without waiting for the bi-monthly meetings of the city council. The members of the council assemble each day to deliberate on and dispose of such questions as arise. The administrative business of the city is divided into four departments and one councilman is assigned to the head of each department as commissioner thereof. Each commissioner with complete knowledge of the details of his department and of the officials under his direction, comes in daily conference with members of the council for consultation. The powers of the city are thus centralized in one body, the responsibility fixed and the fault easily located. The councilmen are not elected as commissioners of any particular department, but after election their assignment is made by the council or the mayor. As an illustration of the merits of this plan, the department of public supplies may be instanced. Were a particular councilman to be elected by the people to serve in that department, designing persons who sell large amounts of supplies to the city might become overzealous in the interests of some particular candidate.

Small Council More Efficient Than Large

The small council of capable business men meeting in daily conference, can in my judgment dispatch the city's business more satisfactorily and more expeditiously than a large council, which, though it possess the wisdom of numbers will be slower in action and less efficient in execution of the administrative details which comprise the great mass of the duties of the office. The weakness and inefficiency of the large council arises from the division of responsibility flowing from the division of official power and duty.

Abolition of Wards

I believe a council elected by the city at large can do more effective work than if the same individuals were elected each by separate wards. A man elected by the qualified electors of a single ward will, whether consciously or not, feel a natural allegiance to those who elected him and who may elect him again. Such loyalty to a particular section may be good for the section, but it is not good for the city.

Ultimate Veto in the People

This remedy lies in the provisions for the use of the initiative, referendum or the recall. No opinion based upon experience could be formed as to the merits of these provisions in the Berkeley charter, as the remedies have not been resorted to.

Co-ordination and Unification

The system which gives the council general supervision over all the departments of the municipal government, and makes it responsible for their work, tends to a greater unity of action and simplifies the remedy. The people understand where all complaints are to be made. The council has power to correct the evil, and failing to do so, the people have the power to correct the council. The centralization of power and responsibility in one body of men will tend to greater uniformity than the disjointed policy of independent action by each elective officer. Any council will take pride in the efficiency of the city government, but if it has no power to control the operations of the departments, it will be unable to accomplish results. There can be no consistent policy enforced throughout municipal government unless the power is given to one set of men.

Non-Partisan and Non-Political

The Berkeley charter has resulted in non-partisan elections and non-partisan and non-political administration. The councilmen have absolutely no restrictions upon the full and free exercise of their business judgment in all matters. They are not embarrassed by the importunities of office-seekers, nor of their friends. No one has set up the claim that he elected us. No one has asserted any claim to office or other favor as a reward for political support. We have had no balancing of the respective political strength of different factions, and in this way have escaped one of the greatest difficulties and obstacles in the way of successful municipal government. All the officers of the city are appointed by the council, except the auditor, and yet there is no more politics in making the appointments than in the ordinary employment of the foreman of a factory. I attribute this result largely to the charter.

Proceedings Unanimous

The proceedings of the council during the eight months since the charter has been in effect have been quite unanimous. This is due largely to the fact that we have not prejudged questions and the councilmen have not attempted to act independently of each other. But in all questions of policy our judgment has been deferred until after full investigation of the facts and full conference and interchange of views. I can see no more reason why under these conditions councilmen should not be able to agree as readily as the appellate courts agree upon the proper judgment to enter in any case.

Not Approved by Professional Politicians

The Berkeley charter has provoked considerable discussion and comment among the cities of the state. A great many applications have been received for copies of the charter and information concerning it, from various points in California and from most of the polls is already assured. There are papers, of course, which are out for Curry—a few of them—and still fewer for Stanton; no Southern California paper, so far as the writer has been able to learn, has declared for Anderson. Recapitulating, sentiment in the South is overwhelmingly for Johnson, with Curry and Stanton sparring for second place, the chances being largely in favor of Curry for that position.

Beardslee Machine Choice For Lieutenant-Governor

It begins to look as if the machine forces in the southern end of the state would be found lined up solidly behind "Bob" Beardslee of Stockton for nomination as Lieutenant-Governor. Beardslee is generally believed in the South to be too strongly entrenched in the good graces of the railroad push to be beaten in the contest for indorsement by that element. In Los Angeles, Pasadena, Riverside and other large towns of the South the feeling among the machine men is that Beardslee, having once relinquished his ambition to become speaker of the assembly, and having always been a faithful and obedient servant of the powers that were, should not be further humiliated. So what support the South has to give to a machine candidate for nomination as Curry's running mate at the primary undoubtedly will go to the Stockton man. Beardslee is not personally well known in the south end of the state, but his record as a "regular" puts him in the logical position for second place on the organization ticket next August.

Hans Stealing Otis' Thunder George J. Hans, of Fruitvale, Alameda county, who represented a transbay assembly district in the last legislature, is out against Frank Otis for the Republican nomination for senator from the 17th senatorial district. Otis also was in the assembly last session, representing the 47th district, and has been making his campaign for the senatorial nomination on the strength of his record in the assembly.

He is especially claiming support because of his stand on the anti-racetrack gambling bill, on which he stood for the right. Now Otis is a little embarrassed by the fact that Hans is making a bid for the same nomination on exactly the same grounds. Hans' record on the racetrack bill is identical with Otis'. It would be more to the point if one of these gentlemen would come out squarely on this year's issue instead of on one phase of last year's issues, and say positively that he will fight for the overthrow of the Southern Pacific political machine. A third candidate, who will make this stand on this year's issue, seems the likely solution of the situation in the 17th senatorial district.

A Chance for Alameda

Since Frank Otis has vacated the 47th assembly district fight to run for the state senate, one Sumner Crosby has entered the lists under the grooming of Joe Lanktree of Alameda. These auspices are more familiar than desirable. Those voters who wish to favor some one who is not favored by the machine boss of Alameda are notified that Alfred L. Morgenstern, Lincoln-Roosevelter and stanch fighter, is in the race against Crosby. The 47th assembly district comprises the city of Alameda, and should at last be taken clearly and decisively from the ranks of the machine's "rotten boroughs."

And the Sonoma Ass Made Bold to Speak

This from the Sonoma Index-Tribune. It is beautiful. It is quite the best "organization" diatribe yet evolved. Clerk Caughey of the supreme court should send for Editor Granice and give him a deputyship that he may lend his genius to the cause of government by, of and for the Southern Pacific Railroad. During the forthcoming campaign nothing better will emanate from the other side of the house. The San Francisco Chronicle will not equal it and it will not be surpassed by the Oakland Tribune. The bray of no other ass will so resound. Tom Dozier is in eclipse. Don't fail to read this and scrap it. Great is Granice!

"An appeal has gone forth from the Lincoln-Roosevelt League to the interior press for its support in favor of Mr. Hiram Johnson, its candidate for governor in the forthcoming primary election.

"Personally, we have no objection to Mr. Johnson, who is one of the leading members of the San Francisco bar, but politically we have decided objections to his candidacy, backed up as it is by a convention of political soreheads and disappointed office-seekers, who long since have outlived their usefulness and in their political senility do not appear to realize that they are dead ones in so far as the Republican party in this state is concerned.

"Chagrined and sour-balled because they have been placed upon the shelf by the party that has honored them in the past to make way for better and more able men, they would now rule or ruin. These ungrateful insurgents bear the same ear marks of the 'Dolly Vardens' of over a decade ago, who tried to elect Morris M. Estee, of Napa, governor of California and made such a dismal failure of the whole business.

"Johnson, like Estee, has accepted the support of an insurgent band of Republicans, and by doing so has likewise 'burned his bridges behind him,' and having cut off all retreat, can never be the governor of California. He has been taken out of the private walks of life and interjected in this campaign by a band of political conspirators, who, failing to rule, would disrupt the Republican party, and like his prototype, Morris M. Estee, is doomed to inevitable defeat should his name ever be presented to the voters as the Republican nominee for governor of California."

Warning as to County Verification Deputies

The appointment of verification deputies from one county to act in another should not be made until the law as to the legality of such action is reviewed. Such appointments have already been made in several instances, and some county clerks hold that it is legal, but others do not. Secretary of State Curry's office holds that it is not, and that a verification deputy

Post and Montgomery Sts.

I 'LL bring Elsa over this evening, Martha, although to tell you the truth, I feel a little nervous about having the child away from me at night, since burglars are holding high carnival in this town." John Bruce's forehead took on several furrows as he basked in the warmth of the grate fire preparatory to setting forth in the cold and snow out doors.

Martha's knitting needles clicked ominously. "I am not six feet tall and correspondingly broad, John Bruce, but I have yet to see the burglar I should be afraid of. Elsa shall sleep in the room next to mine, and I'll deliver her to you safe and sound tomorrow." Martha's tone was sarcastic.

"I trust so, Martha. As Susie is away and I must keep an engagement tonight, why, this is the safest place for the child. I would not leave her with the servants as guardians, and besides, Elsa has set her heart on coming. She is very fond of you, Martha."

"She should be, to match my fondness for her," and a softened look came to Martha's face in the fire-light.

"My car is coming, I'll see you tonight," and catching up his hat and overcoat John Bruce ran from the room slamming the front door behind him.

"What noisy creatures men are," commented Martha. "As for burglars, I believe I should like to meet one; I'd show him—well—what now, John?" as her brother returned, out of breath. "What's happened?"

"Nothing, Martha, except it occurred to me that just now it would be safer if you took your diamonds down to the safe deposit vault before night. Every one in town knows that you inherited ten thousand dollars' worth of diamonds, and that you scorn to keep them in a safe place. Burglars know a good deal about a residence before they start to loot it."

"You'd better see a doctor, John, your nerves seem out of order. If that is all you came back for you might have saved yourself the trouble. My diamonds stay just where I've always kept them—at the bottom of the soiled clothes hamper, a very safe place."

"Don't be foolish, Martha—you'll be sorry, some day."

"You're the foolish one, John. Here's the next car coming," and Martha dismissed her brother and the subject.

Martha Bruce, spinster, aged forty-five, had given her young life to her parents, loving them and ruling them with an iron hand until their death. She was a bright and comely girl, and more than one man had desired her for a wife. To one man it had hurt her to say "No," but she had sternly refused the call of her own heart, and now in middle age she had given her whole love to her niece, Elsa. To those who said: "You are young enough to make some man happy," she replied, "I am too used to my own way—I could not stand a man's whims, and I do not need a home—why should I deliberately jump into trouble?"

Then the very firm look would creep about Miss Bruce's mouth and the well meaning questioner would subside.

Elsa Bruce was sleeping the sleep of healthful youth when Martha stole softly into the dimly lighted room and stood by the bed.

"Bless her heart, her Aunt Martha will take care of her. Burglars? pooh!" and a look of derision mingled with the love on Martha's face. No one but Elsa knew the tenderness of Martha Bruce's heart, and even she did not comprehend the depth of her love. Protect Elsa! Martha's hands involuntarily clinched as a feeling like that of a tigress protecting her young pervaded her being.

Sleep did not come to the spinster's eyes as quickly as usual that night. Against her will her brother's words had affected her. She had paid unusual attention to the locking of the house doors and fastenings of the windows, and instead of the customary darkness of the room a faint light was allowed to burn, "To please John," Martha said.

"What a goose I am to lie here, actually getting nervous. There are times when John Bruce acts like a fool," and Martha turned over with much determination and settled down to sleep.

Two hours later, when the little brass clock on the mantel was striking twelve, Martha awoke with a start. She generally slept through from 10 p. m. to 7 a. m. This was a very unusual proceeding; she did not like it. She lay quietly, and became aware of a persistent noise, and tried to locate it. Yes, it was those creaking stairs. She had always grumbled about the way those stairs had creaked, but now she was glad of it. Some one was in the house. Some one who had no right to be there, for the servants always used the back stairway, and she knew that both Betty the cook and Annie the housemaid had gone to bed at 9 o'clock that night. Well, she wasn't afraid. She would await developments. A stealthy hand on her door-knob, followed by the appearance of a masked man. Martha's hand reached up to the wall back of her bed, touched a button, and the room was flooded with light. With a bound the man was at her bedside, and a revolver was thrust within an inch of her face.

THE COURAGE OF MARTHA

"If you scream you will be a dead woman," said the burglar. "I don't intend to scream, you coward," and anger, not fear, was the predominant note of Miss Bruce's voice. "But if you think I am afraid of you you are mistaken. What are you creeping into decent people's houses for, instead of earning an honest living, you great big, hulking man, you with no more modesty than to enter a lady's bedroom. What do you want?"

"See here, old lady, suppose you shut up and"— "I shall not 'shut up,' as you call it, in my own house, and I'm not old."

The robber chuckled. "Well then, young lady, no nonsense, now, I'm in a hurry, so tell me where the sparklers are."

"The—the—what?"

"The sparklers, the diamonds. I know you keep them here, in the house, and I'm not going without them, so you'd best get it over with, quick; you don't seem to like me," here he chuckled again, "and I'll leave as soon as I get the jewels."

"You must think I'm a fool," replied Miss Bruce, energetically.

"Yes, ma'am, that's just what you'll be if you don't tell me pretty quick. Suppose you get up and find them for me, it will save time."

"Me! me!" exclaimed Martha, ungrammatically; "me get up in my night dress, and a man in the room!"

The burglar shoved the revolver unpleasantly near Miss Bruce's head.

"You hear me? You either tell me or show me where the jewels are. I know they are either in this room or the next. You get me the sparklers and I'll leave the silverware alone. If I have to search for myself I'll be likely to take a few other things. Hurry up, young lady, march before me into the next room and I'll search there first."

"No! no!" exclaimed Miss Bruce. "They are not there." Fear was tugging at her heart strings, fear that Elsa would wake and be terrified. It would be such a shock to the child; anything but that.

"Oh," said the burglar, "I think they are in the next room. March in, my lady, and get them," and he moved toward Elsa's room.

In her agony of mind, forgetful of her night-dress, Martha was on the floor, grasping the man's arm.

"You shall not go in there—the diamonds are not there—a child is sleeping in that room. I do not want her frightened; I beg you not to go," and Martha's knees grew weak and gave under her. She was kneeling as she begged the man to yield to her prayer.

"Hands up!" came a voice from the door leading to the hall. The robber wheeled to confront a revolver pointed directly at his head. His own weapon clattered to the floor. Martha's almost unbelieving eyes saw her brother's six feet of height filling the doorway, and she sat down, hugging her knees, laughing and sobbing.

"You get into bed, Martha; I'll see to this fellow," said John Bruce. "Here, you, march ahead of me down stairs. I'll gladly put a bullet through you if you start to run. I'll be back in half an hour, Martha."

When John Bruce returned he found his sister dressed, and a cold chicken and hot coffee supper awaiting him.

"I feel we both need something, John," was her greeting. "How did you happen to come just at the right moment?" asked Martha, as she poured the fragrant coffee.

"I felt anxious and thought I'd walk past the house on my way home. I saw the brilliant light in your room and found the hall door ajar, so I knew there was trouble up stairs. Fortunately, I had my revolver with me. But, Martha, Martha," said John Bruce, teasingly, "you don't know what a shock it gave me to see my brave sister on her knees before a burglar, and really, Martha, to see you so forgetful of your costume." John's eyes twinkled. Martha made a grimace. "To quote the robber's command, John, 'shut up.' I was not afraid of the pistol he thrust at me, but I would beg a burglar on my knees to keep out of my little darling's room. I could not have her frightened; she has slept through it all, the little dear!"

"You're a good woman and a brave one, my sister," said John Bruce, with a break in his voice. "Good night, dear," and he bent and kissed her—an unusual thing between these two. "I'll finish the night in your guest room."

Coming back a minute to say something he had forgotten to mention, John saw his sister kneeling at his little daughter's bedside, and tip-toed back to his own room.

is authorized to act only in the county of which he is a qualified elector. This interpretation seems to be borne out by subdivision 2 of section 5 of the primary law, which must be read in connection with section 1188 of the Political Code, which seems to limit the origin and activities of verification deputies to the territory within the legal limits of authority of the clerk with whom their affidavits are filed. Attorney-General Webb is now investigating this subject and will give his interpretation of the law within a few days. We would suggest that it would be well for candidates to take no chances on the question until they read his opinion.

Final Notes Douglas White, who is managing Curry's campaign for governor in Southern California, says that the Lincoln-Roosevelt organization in Los Angeles is about as nearly perfect as such an organization could be, and that it will carry Los Angeles county for Hiram Johnson. Of course, White adds that Curry will be second in the race there, but Stanton's friends speak otherwise.

Max Kuhl, state organizer, says that a personal investigation of conditions in Shasta county assures that county to Hiram Johnson in the primary election.

Eldorado county is strong for good government this year. All the Democratic sentiment there is for Bell, and all the Republicans for Hiram Johnson.

A NEARER VIEW

The Editor of The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—You're wrong about the Philadelphia strike where you ought to be very, very right. That is, it is one of those issues where of all our modern issues clear insight is the greatest demand of the hour, and it is not had where the strikers are pictured as violent participators in riots at the cost of public sympathy. The strike is tactical, not heated; it was deliberately foreseen on both sides for a year and the shrewdest generals both of plutocracy and of organized labor were on hand tactically preparing for it. The organization of the Keystone union was plutocracy's move; the service of C. O. Pratt who was constantly on the ground was the answer of labor. And the last thing that Pratt leads to is violence. Policing irresponsible boys from mischievous work is one thing. Deliberately sending out police to crack heads is another. Bringing in the plutocratic cossacks known as the Black Huzzars is still another, and that action is the one that will probably stir Philadelphia to whatever reaction in violence of a deliberate kind may finally result.

The men will win that strike for they are in league with the inevitable progress of the times. The one thing that made this strike possible was that organized plutocracy saw there a chance to utilize the government of Philadelphia as its agent to whip the carmen from their vantage won last year.

Behind Director of Public Safety Clay who may call all the waterworks and fire and police departments men to his service, stands Mayor Reyburn. Behind Reyburn, and responsible for him, stands Boss McNichol, and behind McNichol stands Penrose, and behind Penrose is all of the organized plutocracy of tariff-made Pennsylvania.

Behind the car men in this fight stands Pratt, a prophet turned strike leader, and a man whose leadership comes out of ten years in the white hot crucible of labor battles. Behind Pratt stand all the working men of Philadelphia, and behind them the workingmen of the world. And more than that the very essence of Pratt's generalship is his skill to pull the public with him. When he does move to violence, if such a situation is forced as a last resort, it will be with the people on his side, rest assured of that.

This fight won't be lost ultimately till the last ounce of power to fight has left all of Philadelphia's workingmen and all of Philadelphia's citizens who see it as having been brought about as an aggressive plutocratic move.

On a civic scale Philadelphia is fighting out what the nation will sooner or later have to fight out, if plutocracy's hold can be loosened in no other way.

It is not written of gold brick men that they do a successful second season business in the same town, and none of us have played a three pea game twice. Harriman got gluttonous laws from our Utah legislature once, but he couldn't do it twice. The fact is that in every game of exploitation there has been one ignorant party, and he always found he paid the bill. Ignorance is a diminishing quantity in every part of America to-day, especially that kind of ignorance that gave the exploiter his chief opportunities. And given laboring men who really see the issue, as they really see it in Philadelphia, and citizens who really join them in this view, who has the hardihood to hope that they won't really fight to ultimate exhaustion before giving in? If hope really is lost in courts and government, "riot" won't be the word for what will result, but it will be a "revolt" and it will involve on the side of the strikers all those who are informed and are not plutocratic in their affiliations.

Keep constantly before you in estimating the Philadelphia situation the significant fact that Philadelphia was the only city in the world that sent police to break up the Ferrer mass meetings, and clap those who tried to hold them into jail, and that Philadelphia was the only city in America that sent police to ride down the shirt waist girls when they tried to hold their first public strike meeting in the Arch Street Theater. Also that the government of Philadelphia is just as willing as the car company to bring about a condition of peace, and is not at liberty to go one inch farther than the company wishes it to.

You remember that union labor once won the elections in an Idaho county, and forthwith martial law was declared there, while an investigation held after the Steunenberg outrage, showed that the courts of both Idaho and Colorado had for years been wholly in the service of plutocrats and were no instrument whatever for the obtaining of the equal justice that is the safest guarantee that violence will not be resorted to.

In New York the shirt waist manufacturers had faith in their ability to have striking girls arrested and convicted. Came into office Mayor Gaynor who read the police a curtain lecture on their all too prevalent practice of making arrests on any provocation. Wilted at once the manufacturers. There is no Gaynor in Philadelphia. There is no force in the actual government of the city nor in the affiliations of the bosses behind it which will make that government become a real and disinterested government. There is no force there save the terrorizing force of widespread revolt which will pry the clutch of the car company loose from the reins of the administration. If it hadn't been for their certainty that they had the administration for their agents the car company officials never would have forced this strike. Remove this certainty and the welching of the company will be a matter of hours only. Never anywhere was the issue between the "system" and the exploited people more clearly drawn, and never was there such need that the people see clearly just what are the problems in dispute—not what dust throwing plutocratic agents say are the issues.

Yours truly,

ISAAC RUSSELL.

MORE ABOUT CONGRESSMEN.

(From the New York Times.)

The tariff on raisins put Representative Needham of California into Congress and has kept him there longer than any other coast member. When Mr. Needham smiles he looks like Billiken.

Polite Elvins, next to the youngest member of the house, hails from Elvins, Mo., a town named for his family. Charles G. Edwards, the youngest member, who votes in Savannah, Ga., has him beat by two months in the kindergarten race.

Speaker Cannon and Representative Dalzell of Pennsylvania always wear pink carnations in their coat lapels.

The prettiest hair in the house is owned by Mr. Hughes of West Virginia. It is as white as country snow, and if he allowed it to grow would outshine and outdazzle Chief Justice Fuller's.

Session before last Representative Ellis wore a long, gray, spade-shaped beard. Last session he dyed it a brilliant black, and it looked like one of the famous Hessians' shoe-blackening-tinted adornments that we read of in revolutionary history. This session the beard is neither gray nor black, for it isn't there at all. He now wears a smooth chin.

Two Maryland members, Mudd, Republican, and Gill, Democrat, are very ill. Neither has appeared in the house this session.

Senator William Alden Smith of Michigan was once a bootblack. He is now worth more than a million, made chiefly through promoting railroads through northern forests and buying judiciously along the lines of route.

Curtis of Kansas and Owen of Oklahoma are the realest American members of the senate. Curtis is part Kaw Indian and Owen part Cherokee.

Senator Crane of Massachusetts is known as the Human Smoothing Iron. Whenever any of his senatorial brethren fall out with themselves or with the President, Crane is always pressed into service to patch things up.

Senator Daniel of Virginia walks with crutches as the result of three wounds received in the cause of the Confederacy. He was wounded at the first battle of Manassas, when he was a member of the "Stonewall Brigade," at Boonsboro, Md., and at the battle of the Wilderness, when he was General Jubal Early's chief of staff.

Senator Carroll Smalley Page of Vermont is a dealer in calfskins when he is at home at Hyde Park—Hyde Park, if the remark be permitted, being an appropriate place for a calfskin dealer.

Every time Representative Adamson of Georgia gets into one of the elevators to descend to the subway that connects the capitol and office building he exclaims: "Take me down to the snake hole!"

Representative Lindbergh, the insurgent Minnesota member, is writing fifty letters daily to his home editors and influential business men for the purpose of educating them on the anti-Cannon fight in the house. He winds up each letter by asking his correspondent's advice on the subject. This is a very effective and diplomatic piece of flattery, as many members know. Many of them use it.

"Blacksmith, actor, statesman," is the way biographers will describe Representative Tawney of Minnesota. When he acted Mr. Tawney was a tragedian, and "Damon and Pythias" was his favorite play. He admits that he was a very good tragedian, too, and even a better blacksmith.

The father-in-law of Representative Taylor of Ohio makes automobiles. Every one of the Ohio congressional delegation that can afford a buzz wagon has one of father-in-law's brand of cars.

Thomas P. Gore, the blind senator from Oklahoma, is only forty years old.

Representative Hollingsworth of Ohio has the most remarkable mustaches in the house. They are white, long, and smooth, and when they leave his face describe first an outward shoot, then a back curve which brings them far below and under his chin. The effect at a little distance is that of a very sedate and dignified appearing walrus.

Tulio Larrinaga, the Unionist commissioner to Congress from Porto Rico, built the first railroad on the island. Early in his professional career he left Porto Rico to work as a civil engineer in the United States, and while in New York helped build the Grand Central station. He speaks five languages, several of them better than English.

The two "Generals" of the Ohio delegation, Representatives Keifer and Sherwood, have very little regard for each other. Every once in a while one of them will arise on the floor to attack the military record of the other, and then before very long the General lambasted will leap to his feet to hurl heavy verbal ammunition right back.

Mr. Kronmiller of Maryland is the most inveterate gum chewer in the house.

Senator Carter is the most popular story teller in the chamber. He used to be a farmer and a school teacher in his younger days.

The unerring eye and strong arm that made Senator Aldrich a famous baseball player when he was at college may explain the accuracy with which he directs political and legislative shots in the senate.

Having passed his eighty-first mile-stone, Representative Nehemiah Day Sperry of Connecticut has announced his retirement from Congress at the end of his present term. Mr. Sperry was the bondsman for the builder of the Monitor.

Senator Taliaferro of Florida pronounces his name as though it were spelled Tolliver.

Representative McDermott of Illinois is a telegraph operator by occupation, and when a youngster was one of the blue-coated messenger boys.

Butler Ames, the representative from the Fifth Massachusetts congressional district, is a grandson of the late Benjamin F. Butler, and was educated for war at West Point. He resigned from the army to take up civil engineering, and was a peaceful peaceable citizen until the outbreak of the Spanish war, when he enlisted and saw fighting in Cuba.

Sometimes congressmen's secretaries fall into the shoes made vacant by their chiefs. Representative Cassidy of Cleveland was secretary to Representative Burton before the latter was promoted to the senate, and Mr. Cox of Dayton once upon a time occupied the same position under Paul Sorg, the millionaire tobacco man, when he spent a little time in Congress.

Maye—Which would you rather marry—a rich bachelor or a rich widower? Joy—The widower. He will have learned to give up without a struggle.—Cleveland Leader.

other states in the Union. So far as I know, the charter has not been received with favor by any persons who practice politics as a profession. I prophesy that the provision for dual elections will be quite generally adopted in future city charters, for I think it affords a satisfactory solution of the problem of overcoming the prevalence of civic apathy and in inducing the people to make their own nominations. The council is not especially desirous of appearing in the role or attitude of reformers, but we have been trying, and the people of Berkeley have been trying, to work some changes that will tend to place municipal government upon a more stable and satisfactory and strictly business basis. Political reform has two aspects: Reform in the method of transacting public business and reform in the attitude of the people toward the government. The people of Berkeley have been doing their part in this work. As a whole they look with disfavor upon the professional politician or those who are attempting to exploit the city for their own private gain.

Other Original Features

Two other features of the charter might be referred to as original provisions. First, the establishment of a department of public supplies, the commissioner of which is the purchasing agent for the city. He signs all requisitions and contracts, makes every purchase of supplies which the city requires, from penholders to fire engines, and audits all claims before they come before the council for allowance. Second, the commissioner of finance and revenue is ex-officio member of the board of education, with a vote in that body. The board of education is charged with the expenditure of all funds for the support of the public schools of the city, but the duty of levying the tax to raise that portion of the funds which the city contributes for the maintenance of the schools is imposed upon the council. We have found it a very useful and practical plan to have one of the members of the council serve also as a member of the school board.

Finally, I consider the chief merits of the Berkeley charter lie in the provisions for elections above explained, in the concentration of official power and responsibility, and in the general plan of co-ordinating and unifying the administrative departments of the government.

UNANIMOUS

Here the lecturer threw upon the screen the portrait of a man well known in the financial world. “This,” he said, “is one of the great captains of finance. I do not need to mention his name. His face is familiar to all of you. Look at his corrugated brow, the furrow in his cheeks, the pouches under his eyes, the deep lines about his mouth. That face, my friends, bears the unmistakable and ineffaceable stamp of care. Anxiety has marked it indelibly. It shows the traces of sleepless nights, weary days, and bitterly fought campaigns, with millions of dollars at stake. Success brings such a man no happiness. Look at him! How many of you, my friends, would change places with him? How many of you would be willing to take his wealth if compelled to assume the terrible burden of responsibility that goes with it?” His hearers rose en masse. “I would!” they shouted in unison.—Chicago Tribune.

Defendants.

NOTICE OF REFEREE'S SALE OF REAL ESTATE.

Under and by virtue of an interlocutory decree in partition and order of sale, duly given and made by the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 24th day of February, 1910, in the above entitled action, I, the undersigned duly appointed, qualified and acting referee in said action, am commanded to sell all those certain lands situate, lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, described in the complaint herein, and described as follows, to-wit:

COMMENCING at a point on the easterly line of Polk Street, distant thereon one hundred (100) feet northerly from the northerly line of Ellis Street; running thence northerly along said line of Polk Street twenty (20) feet more or less to Olive Avenue; thence at right angles easterly along the southerly line of Olive Avenue parallel with Ellis Street eighty-five (85) feet; thence at right angles southerly parallel with Polk Street twenty (20) feet, and thence at right angles westerly parallel with Ellis street eighty-five (85) feet to Polk Street, the point of commencement.

Said described premises being a part of 50 Vara lot Number Three (3) in Block Number Nine (9) of the Western Addition as laid down on the official map of said City and County of San Francisco.

And public notice is hereby given that on Saturday the 26th day of March, 1910, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. of that day at the street entrance to the office of the sheriff of said City and County at No. 122 McAllister Street, in the said City and County of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and interlocutory decree in partition, sell the above described property at public auction to the highest bidder for cash in United States Gold Coin, ten (10) per cent thereof to be paid as a deposit on the day of sale, the balance upon confirmation of the sale by the Court and the delivery of a conveyance. Ten (10) days allowed before confirmation for examination of title. Objection to title, if any, must be made before confirmation. If after the confirmation the purchaser neglects or refuses to immediately comply with the terms of the sale, a re-sale will be made of the property purchased. If the amount realized on such re-sale does not amount to the former bid and the expenses of the previous sale, such purchaser shall be liable for the deficiency and the said referee will retain such deficiency from the deposit. All checks presented by purchasers must be certified.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't. —
The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 14th day of February, A. D. 1910.

[Seal of Superior Court] H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

Memoranda.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:

The City and County of San Francisco, whose address is at the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California. 2-18-10t.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

The Ballots

All voting at the primary elections must be by ballot and the ballots must be prepared as the law directs, by whom the law directs, or they can not be received or counted. The provisions governing the form of ballot are strict and made in the interests of a free vote and a fair count.

Before the Australian ballot came into existence there were all sorts of ballots in use. Any one who wished to could have ballots printed and offered to voters. Of course voters did not have to vote them unless they wanted to, unless they worked for a corporation or individual employer who wanted to run things, in which case employees were often under the necessity of voting the ballot that was given them, as it was given them, or lose their jobs. At all times voters were under the necessity of scrutinizing their ballots as though they were dubious bills and might turn out to be counterfeit. A ballot might be just like the authorized ballot of the party with the exception of a single name substituted for another name in the hope that the fraud would not be detected. In short, experience has shown that human character is so unsafe that no honest election is possible without throwing around the ballot all the protection that laws and penalties can afford.

The law makes it the duty of the county clerk to prepare the ballots for the August primary, and the ballot must be printed on paper furnished by the Secretary of State known as "official" paper. This paper must be manufactured to order for the Secretary of State, must be of a tint prescribed by him and must bear a "water-mark" made in the paper itself from a design furnished by the Secretary of State, which design can not be repeated again for fourteen years. There must be new paper with a new design for water-mark, and a new tint, for each general election, though for primary elections the paper used at the last general election may be used. This is to prevent any counterfeiting of ballots.

For the August primary the ballot must be at least 12 inches wide and as long as needful to contain the names of all candidates for whom nomination papers have been properly prepared and filed within the specified time.

Across the top of the ballot must be printed in large, black, Gothic type, "Official Primary Election Ballot," so that the voter will know what he is voting. Below this, in type half the size, must be printed the name of the political party whose candidates this ballot bears, and there must be as many different kinds of ballots as there are political parties with tickets in the field. Then must follow, in still smaller type, but large enough to be seen, the name of the voting precinct where that particular ballot may be voted. Following this are the instructions to voters telling them how to stamp their ballots. These instructions read as follows:

"To vote for a person whose name appears on the ballot stamp a (X) in the square at the right of the name of the person for whom you desire to vote. To vote for a person whose name is not printed on the ballot, write his name in the blank space provided for that purpose." This space is provided right below the printed names of the candidates and there are as many such spaces after each printed list as there are offices to be filled.

It is hardly necessary to describe the whole ballot in detail, for its purport will be readily understood the moment the voter looks it over. Beginning at the upper left hand corner the candidates for state officers will be started, leading off with governor, lieutenant governor, justices of the supreme court (in which two vacancies are to be filled this year), secretary of state, controller, treasurer, attorney general, surveyor general, clerk of supreme court, superintendent of public instruction, and superintendent of state printing. This ends the state ticket and it will run over into the second column, each column being two and one-half inches wide.

Immediately following will be the district offices leading off with the district court of appeals, board of equalization and railroad commission, and judge of superior court, which will be followed by United States senate and house of representatives, state senate and assembly.

Then will come the county tickets, beginning at the top of the column with sheriff, but separated from the state and district ticket by a heavy black line, running from top to bottom. After the sheriff will come district attorney, county clerk, auditor, treasurer, assessor, tax collector, recorder, public administrator, superintendent of schools, coroner, surveyor, supervisors, winding up with the township officers and, at the end, delegates to the county convention, of which a lesson will be given later on.

For the election of 1910 there will have to be nominated, for state offices, twelve persons; for state district offices, three; for the congressional ticket one United States senator and one member of the House; in half the state senatorial districts a senator and one assemblyman in each of eighty districts.

The county ticket will have twelve offices to fill besides supervisor, justice of the peace and constables so that, all told, there will be from thirty to thirty-six persons to be voted for, state, district and county, but these may have to be picked out of two or three times as many candidates, perhaps four or five times as many as there are offices, so there is no telling how big the ticket will be, except that it must be anyhow twelve inches wide and is likely to be two or three feet long.

If California ever adopts what is called the "short ballot," it is likely that the offices of attorney general, surveyor general, clerk of the supreme court and superintendent of state printing will be cut off the state list and perhaps one or two off the county list, but that is not as likely. It is more than likely that the railroad commission would be eliminated. All such offices would then be filled by appointment. Few voters know "Who is Who" well enough to select so large a number of officers with a discriminating intelligence.

Something Doing

NO SOONER DID THEODORE ROOSEVELT reach the threshold of civilization than dry bones began to rattle, resolutions to be passed for and against, amid shouts of approval and derision. No intellect is so dull that it is not quickened into thought by the burning "platitudes," as his enemies call those plain, common sense truths that fall from the lips of the first citizen of the civilized world. Whether or not we like the strenuous life we shall have to live it while Theodore lives and, bottle himself as he may, American affairs will be handled by him and without gloves. He does well to inform himself first, but, being informed, he will speak to the people in a way to be heard. Ninety millions await his counsel with an intense, if not a submissive, interest.

The Law By Law Confounded

IF ISABELLA MARTIN be not a she-wolf then has there been much ado about nothing. The appellate court has given her a new trial because irrelevant testimony was admitted to the jury that found her guilty. Assuming that evidence of cruelty to Baby John was irrelevant to the dynamiting of Judge Ogden's home, what of it? Just this: the law says, in effect, that it shall not be lawful to admit testimony necessary to the vindication of the law. The law is by the law confounded. What was that jury for? If it was not capable of separating irrelevant testimony from relevant, that which bore upon the fact from that which did not, that which implied guilt from that which indicated innocence, of what good was it capable? Either juries should be treated as something less than imbecile or the jury system should be abolished.

Reconstruct the Charter

WERE SAN FRANCISCO'S CHARTER to come down from heaven on tablets of stone it would not give San Francisco good government with the powers of government reposed, as now, in hands least able to exercise such powers. Nevertheless it were well to make the charter as perfect as human foresight can make it. To this end attention is called to the thoughtful leading article in this issue of The California Weekly on charter revision by Mr. Allen G. Wright. While this administration is reveling in the shady spots of a shady quality of Parisian-American life is as good a time as any for thoughtful, reputable men to take the well-being of their city to heart to the end that such a miscarriage of government may not again occur and that government may be made more efficient when again it gets into the hands of good and capable men.

Be Just But Invincible

FRANKLY, CAN THE UNITED RAILROADS be blamed for using all lawful means to retain its monopoly of lower Market street? Who, being in its position, would easily yield so important an advantage? But that does not imply that the city and its government should not do all in their power to wrest from its grasp a power it holds in contravention of public interests. If there be power enough in government, virtue enough in law, and money enough in the common treasury to wrest that outside franchise from the United Railroads it should be so wrested if it takes ten years to do it. Meantime let there be no compromise and no tolerance of any public official who plays into the hands of the city's adversary.

David Josiah Brewer

LET THE TRUTH BE TOLD. He was a kindly man and a good, but was not great, and he watched his political p's and q's all his life as carefully as any politician in the state whence he came. General McDowell, for many years the Republican political boss of Leavenworth, was his good angel and McDowell, during all the years of his prosperity, and until he wore himself threadbare in their service, served those interests that were able to pay for his services. In short, Brewer's path to eminence was not differently blazed from that of most other jurists of his time and if, in his utterances and decisions, he held the rights of property superior to the Rights of Man it was because it was in that school that he was nurtured and through that influence that he was advanced. Yet he would not consciously have reasoned to a false conclusion. He merely leaned as a judge as he was inclined as a twig of the law.

The Stakeholder

THE SUPREME COURT has determined that the stakeholder who serves without compensation serves without criminal liability. It was never the intent of the anti-racetrack gambling law to penalize one man's betting with another with a mutual friend to hold the stakes, but it were better that stakeholding in any form be made a felony than that the racetrack iniquity be allowed to go on with its harvest of delinquents, defaulters and suicides. Where gentleman bets with gentleman a stakeholder is superfluous, for no welcher can lay claim to being a gentleman, and whatever betting takes place beyond that which gives zest to a sport, and does not make the winning of money the purpose of the game, is against public policy and should be against the law. The conclusion of the court has more to commend it than the process of reasoning by which it appears, from press reports, to have been reached.

A Malignant Suggestion

WHOEVER GAVE CURRENCY to the report that the President contemplates the appointment of Richard A. Ballinger to the supreme bench to succeed the late David J. Brewer must hate the President with virulence. William Howard Taft may not prove the effective statesman we had hoped he might, but he is neither a fool nor a madman that he should do such a thing. The most fitting tender of the appointment he could make, not being able to appoint himself, would be to one Charles E. Hughes.

Wages Rising

A WEEK OR TWO AGO arbiters at Chicago found in favor of an increase in the wages of certain locomotive firemen on the ground that investigation showed an increase in the cost of living amounting within two years to 25 per cent. In view of this finding the reported increase of 6 per cent. in the wages of railroad employes on a number of big eastern systems does not appear to have been recklessly generous even though the sum total does run up into the millions. The prevailing price current is still several lengths ahead of the wage scale and likely to keep its lead.

Miserable Men

OF ALL MISERABLE BEINGS there is none more deservedly miserable than the man who, having become suddenly rich or famous, and lured by thirst for social recognition, rids himself of the wife of his youth because she is plain in feature, unattractive in figure and unfelicitous in speech, that he may marry some social stunner as certainly attracted to him by his money as he to her by her style and superabundant animalism. He were happier driving a dray or swinging a sledge in the streets, to go home at night to a three-room cottage with a Bridget and childer awaiting at the gate.

The Strategy of the Enemy

We may look with confidence to the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company for splendid specimens of strategy and generalship. It is not for nothing that the astute head of that bureau commands a salary befitting the revenues of a prince or that he is financed to hire the services of men of finesse and small scruples to execute his orders. It should be a part of the business of those opposed to the domination of that bureau to divine his strategies that his plans may be frustrated. With modesty The California Weekly begs to call attention to a few significant facts.

The strength of Charles F. Curry cannot be taken from him. It is beyond the domain of argument. To urge upon the Curry following that Alden Anderson is a better man, that Nat Ellery fought the cement trust, that the governorship ought to go south this time, would have no more effect upon it than shooting peas at a battleship. It is held together by the cohesive power of official patronage and petty plum pickings to be had if Charley gets in. It is made up, in the main, of the McCarthy crowd in San Francisco, the redlight districts of all the state and the Royal Arch. The most that Herrin could do, if bent upon the discomfiture of Curry, would be to share with Curry in that untoward element in our political life and that would be to give the nomination and election to Hiram Johnson. To presume that Herrin would prefer that to the nomination and election of Curry is to presume that he is a madman and a traitor to his great and greedy corporation. Such a presumption is untenable.

It follows, then, as night the day, that Charles F. Curry, by the logic of the situation if for no other reason, is and must be the "organization" candidate for governor of California. By his low political ideals and the quality of his personal following, he becomes the most dangerous factor in our political life.

Accepting these conclusions as true what becomes the most natural strategy for the commanding genius of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau to employ? Why, to divide the votes of the good men of California into as many fractions as possible while helping Curry to hold his rank and file in line of battle, and this is exactly what he is doing. The unbroken Curry contingent should number 25 to 30 per cent. of the total vote.

Alden Anderson is a good, clean man who has been so politically astute as to make no enemies. Not one of Curry's men will vote for Anderson and two out of every three votes Anderson gets would go to Johnson if Anderson were not in the field.

Phil Stanton is a good fellow according to his lights, and a capable man, too. He will not draw to himself a fraction of one per cent. of the Curry vote, but two out of every three votes he gets would go to Johnson if Stanton were out of the race.

And Nathaniel Ellery! He will not get more than a scattering vote at best. Not one of them will be a Curry supporter, and every vote he gets would go to Johnson if Ellery were out of the field.

Consciously or unconsciously these men are being used as stalking horses in the interests of Curry and, consciously or unconsciously, they are to be blamed for it, for no man in his senses has a right to be so stupid as to be so used.

But if these facts can be made plain to Republicans of California, as we believe they can be, Hiram W. Johnson will secure more votes at the August primary than all the others put together. That is the job cut out for the League—to make the voters see and know. Fortunately there are five months yet to the harvest and the outlook is most promising.

The Spirit of the Conflict

In order to go into this campaign Hiram W. Johnson relinquished a future exactly to his liking. With a reputation at the bar thoroughly established, a splendidly lucrative practice at the threshold, a long desired opportunity to provide for his family clearly within his reach, he thrusts all aside to hazard new fortunes in untried fields because his friends, and his own conscience, join in thinking that he ought.

A. J. Wallace is a man of large affairs calling for his undivided attention. The salary of lieutenant-governor is nothing to him and the honor attached to the office cannot be great after it has been filled by a Warren Porter. The duties of the office will absorb a great part of his attention and he must leave his business to expend months in canvassing the state.

John D. Works has reached the time of life, and has achieved such circumstances, as entitle him to look forward to an unhurried afternoon and evening of life, yet he is going forth into this campaign, as he went a lad in his seventeenth year as a common soldier to fight the battles of his country.

Aside from those whose candidacies for office have been endorsed because they have made good in office there is scarcely a man on the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League ticket who is in any sense an office seeker or who would not gladly have stood aside to give place to another had it not been made to appeal to him as a call to duty.

And yet there are those who refer to these men as an aggregation of soreheads! A more illfounded calumny was never uttered. Their hearts may be sore, but not one of these men has made a race for an office that he did not get. There is not a disappointed or disgruntled candidate on the ticket. The spirit that animates these men is the spirit of '76 and '61, and it is going to prove as contagious now as it did in those times that tried the souls of men. Only the Tories and copperheads of our time will remain unmoved by their appeal. California is to be made a free state and the men who lead the hosts of liberty will live to see the day when there will be few not glad to do them honor.

Face the Truth

The Pasadena News takes this paper to task for venturing the opinion that the President's Corporation Tax measure will be nullified because the financial interests are unitedly opposed to it and that whatever they are unitedly opposed to they can defeat. That this sounds pessimistic is true. That it is more true than pessimistic is sound. The brave way is to face the truth, even at the risk of being charged with pessimism, for only by facing it and planning in accordance with it can reform work be made successful.

It was Benjamin Kidd, so far as the writer knows, who first declared that history affords no instance where a united commonalty ever won an enduring victory over a united power-holding class and, with us, the power holding class is made up of the body of those who control the employment of active capital, otherwise the financial interests.

When the income tax feature of the Wilson tariff bill was first sustained by a decision of the supreme court of the United States there was jubilation in the ranks of those who had taken issue with Benjamin Kidd, but their joy was short lived. That court, upon rehearing, reversed its former decision and invalidated the law. The power-holding class was against the law and it was swept off the boards. The supreme court conformed and always has conformed to the views of the power-holding class where that class was united, as it now is united, against the corporation tax law of the President.

What the reformers must do, then, if they would achieve victory over selfish financial interests is, first, to divide those interests along unselfish lines, that is, divide them on an issue of human rights, on an issue of conscience. When the power-holding class is so divided then a united commonalty may make common cause with the righteous-minded element in the power-holding class against the other element and so achieve the victory. There is no other way in the world among men whereby that class may be divided and progress made in the interest of the common good.

Fortunately, it is possible to make a division of the power holding class on issues of Right Things. It was such a division that placed Rudolph Spreckels and James D. Phelan on the people's side of the graft prosecution in San Francisco. The trouble was that the division did not cut deep enough and the commonalty was not held together for Right Things.

The President's corporation tax law has not received the vindication of good conscience. The still, small voice has not pronounced it right as a tax, but only feasible as a method of getting at the inner workings of corporations in the interests of a public control of corporations. This advantage may prove a sufficient warrant for dividing the financial interests on an issue of good conscience. If it does the law may stand, otherwise not. The income tax stands on safer ground and will be vindicated, soon or late, by being made a supplemental revenue raising policy. It is right that some part of the national revenues should be raised in proportion to ability to pay rather than ability to consume, and many of those who have ability to pay concede the justness of the income tax idea. That is why we shall some day have it.

It Wears a Wicked Look

It were better that the horse cars ran from Sutter to the ferry until heaven and earth pass away than that any advantage should accrue to the United Railroads through the enactment of the Bancroft resolution requiring the United Railroads to route their cars over the inner track, but the reason attributed to the mayor and his advisers for opposing the Bancroft resolution is not convincing. Evidently Cleveland Dam has overruled the city attorney, and great is Cleveland Dam, but the San Francisco public will prefer that the city attorney's advice be taken rather than that of Dam. However, it is a good subject for the San Francisco bar association to take in hand and sift to the bottom. The incident wears an evil look. It hath the aspect of a renewed assurance of gratitude on the part of the mayor and his associates for pre-election favors had and received at the hands of the United Railroads crowd. If the suspicion be unmerited let those who suffer because of it have greater regard hereafter for the company they keep.

Law or Men?

It was Ballinger's attorney, Vertrees, who dramatically declared that, "On March 4, 1909, government by law in this country succeeded government by men." This utterance splendidly voiced the sentiments of those interests that always looked upon the Roosevelt administration as lawless and the head of it as a brigand.

The declaration of Vertrees was high sounding but lacks substance. Laws are mummies until they are placed in the hands of men to be construed and executed, and what they are to amount to then depends almost wholly upon who is to construe and execute them. If given a liberal interpretation they may mean human progress and human advantage. If construed narrowly, technically and with a timid dread they will have no more power of locomotion in them than a foot-bound Chinese female.

Under the Roosevelt administration the laws of the land were executed in a broad and liberal spirit, with the view of advancing to the farthest limit the common good. So far under the Taft administration the laws have been haltingly executed, executed in the fear that a misstep might prove fatal. The first policy gave joy to the American heart and made the man responsible for it the most striking figure in contemporary human history at home or abroad. The man responsible for the policy which Vertrees extols has so far proven the greatest disappointment of the new century, although there are many of us who, recognizing this to be true, yet cherish the hope that the coming year, or the year after, may make the winter of our discontent summer through a change of policy and advisers at the White House in Washington.

Lead Not Into Temptation

Any business man who keeps his finances at such loose ends as to make it easy for his employees to steal from him is putting temptation in their way and is in part blameworthy if they steal. It is equally true of a city. No city has a right to conduct its affairs in such a slipshod manner as to make it easy for city officials to steal from it and escape detection. It is not that every official must be watched as though the presumption were that he is a thief. That of itself might make him a thief, but accounts should be so checked, and the books so expertly that detection is certain to follow defalcation. Even a thief will be honest if he knows that his sin is sure to find him out.

Now one of the purposes of the Public Welfare Fund in San Francisco is to establish and maintain a Municipal Research Bureau, unofficial, yet representing the public interest. This bureau will employ certified accountants to look up and trace out every item of public expenditure. It will ascertain what materials and supplies are purchased and when and where they are used. This is not a new and untried idea. It has been tried elsewhere with splendid results and not one result was of more public importance than that of not leading public officials into temptation through lax methods of administration.

Help the Public Welfare Fund. It should have $100,000 a year.

Johnson, the Orator

We are sometimes told that oratory is a lost art. If so, Hiram W. Johnson found it, and among the good results likely to flow from fetching Johnson out into a participation in the larger life of the state will be a stimulation of oratorical ambitions among those capable of entertaining such ambitions. Not only will Mr. Johnson's campaigning the state prove an inspiration to ingenuous youth, but a model for them to pattern after.

The voice of Hiram Johnson is good. It has not the resonance of the voice of John P. Irish, for instance, or the yelling power of George A. Knight, but it is musical and carries splendidly. Nowhere off the theatrical stage will the hearer encounter such splendid enunciation. No word leaves his lips slurred or half formed. Each word is perfectly molded and ejected a finished product. To him language is too fine a thing to be delivered as from a planing machine. He neither sputters nor chatters. He talks and, best of all, he has something to say, a message to carry to the people.

And what a splendid message it is! A message of liberty, a gospel of glad tidings to the common man who is assured of his power and inspired to use it for the common good. Mr. Johnson's gestures are fine, his delivery appealing, his earnestness palpable and his sincerity unquestioned. He employs none of the tricks of the professional orator, who too often beguiles his hearers because he can, and sways their emotions that he may confuse their minds. Nor is he chargeable with that intellectual laziness that afflicts so many men having oratorical talent, inspiring them to make picturesque language take the place of conscientious thought. His argument is well knit and carries conviction.

The fame of Hiram W. Johnson will increase with every meeting he addresses. Before the campaign is half through there will be no halls big enough to hold those who will wish to hear him and, if his health continues good, he will sweep this state as certainly as election day rolls around. He ought to. He will have achieved success by right of conquest. Henceforth Hiram W. Johnson will be, perhaps, the most conspicuous personality in this commonwealth. A new star of the first magnitude has risen. California's orators of other days, Irish, Knight, Tom Fitch, Edgerton—their voices were virtually let for hire, were lifted on behalf of special interests. From Starr King till now the cause of liberty, the interests of the common man, have been able to call few silver tongues to their aid. It is different now. There has risen among us one who speaks almost with pentecostal power, even Hiram W. Johnson.

Redemption of the Great Valley

The foregoing is the title of a most interesting little pamphlet by A. D. Foote, a civil engineer, and suggests a plan for redeeming from overflow and sterility alike the great interior valley of California. The plan outlined is the basin system of catchment and storage of the flood waters, allowing the sediment to settle and the clarified water to escape back into the river when it has fallen far enough or into artificial channels through the trough of the valley to the bay.

It is not the purpose of this article to analyze or criticize the project of Mr. Foote, but rather to commend the pamphlet to the careful consideration of thoughtful persons. The interior valley of California could supply an enormous product and sustain an enormous population if its arid areas could be irrigated, its flooded areas lifted above the reach of overflow and its sterile areas covered over with the fructifying silt that comes down from the mountains, enormously rich in plant food and enormously injurious to the rivers and the bay when allowed to be precipitated in them.

The situation affords opportunity for a splendid statesmanship, but we are not likely to have such a statesmanship so long as the political affairs of the state are confined to a political bureau that can find no use for any man too big and too independent to "take orders" to do dirty work when commanded so to do. When we have emancipated the state from such low-browed domination there will be some incentive for men of capacity to enter public life and when such men do enter public life we may hope for the "Redemption of the Great Valley," but the redemption of the state must come first.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

It was left to Charles F. Dole, of Jamaica Plains, Mass., to take Jesus of Nazareth to task for having scourged the money changers out of the temple with a righteous indignation. According to the Dole philosophy all indignation is assumed by the indignant one to be righteous, whereas, in truth, indignation is never righteous even when yielded to by the Son of righteousness himself. Which reminds one of the good old Scotch mother who "thought nae better o' the Lord" for having plucked the heads of grain while passing through the fields on the Sabbath day.

For aught that the writer of this knows to the contrary this Dole may occupy a position so transcendently elevated as to warrant him in taking the Nazarene to task for giving way to a wrathfulness heretofore regarded as righteous, but, as for the writer, when he finds one devoid of the power of indignation he finds it difficult not to harbor the thought that such an one, under extreme provocation, might suck eggs.

There is a namby-pambyism abroad in our land that is injurious. There is no form of human "cussedness" that has not its apologists. Good people, or those who rate themselves as good, fellowship with persons publicly known to have committed felonies, and men who publicly petition to have the lid taken off the fast life of a big city, that they may prosper more abundantly in their business, scarcely lose social standing by that act. Are these things become true because we, as a people, have lost the power to become indignant?

Righteousness, to be productive of results, needs to be robust. If we may not hate the sinner at any rate we are warranted in being indignant with the sinner so long as he persists in his villainous practices and manifests no contrition for his evil behavior, and we are at liberty to hate the sin to our heart's content.

When the tissues of the human body begin easily to break down, when the cellular walls no longer persist to resist encroachment, that body is in a bad way and soon will become food for those bacteria whose office it is to resolve flesh and bone into the dust and slime of the earth. So it is with us when our moral standards begin to decay, when licentiousness is only wild-oat sowing, when thievery has become irregularity, when being drunken is overstimulating, when being crooked is spoken of as being circuitous in method, when moral cowardice is referred to as being diplomatic, when marital faithfulness is only a peccadillo. We have indeed come a long journey from the eternal verities when a moral teacher ventures to take The Christ to task for driving thieving money-lusters out of a temple dedicated to the service of God.

It was none other than the Wall Street Journal, the greatest financial periodical of the country, that, not long ago, cried out that the greatest need of our time was a rejuvenation of the moral sense of the nation, such a revival of religion as would give men a renewed sense of the sinfulness of sin. The need is not for a doleful Dole, but for a modern John the Baptist to preach repentance and a preparing of the way for the Judge of all the earth.

It was the office of the serpent in the garden to break down moral standards and for that offense the serpent was condemned to crawl in the dust throughout all generations and, whether this be history or allegory, it is still true that those who break down moral standards are worthy of that condemnation. "I fear, that we have done wrong," whimpered one who had taken her first false step. "Yes, we have," was the unhesitating reply of her companion. There was still too much of manhood in him to permit of his seeking to debauch the mind of his victim, for he who debauches the mind is a debauchee indeed, and yet that is precisely what has befallen us in recent years. To present-day folk the old-fashioned standards of rectitude seem as much out of place as powdered wigs and knee breeches.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Southern California Doing Business

The business transacted in the little harbor of San Pedro not unreasonably may be considered a species of gage of Southern California's industrial growth, and, judging by a report recently issued by the National Forest Service, that gage indicates a full head of steam. After calling attention to the fact that the gazetteers of but eight years ago gave San Pedro no other mention than as "a bay and inlet of the Pacific ocean, in California, 105 miles southeast of Santa Barbara, 33 degrees, 48 minutes north," the report says that San Pedro custom house figures last year showed receipts of over 500 million board feet of lumber. It requires comparison to make these figures appreciated, and here are statistics with which they may be compared: New York last year received less than 490,000,000 board feet of pine, Chicago less than 340,000,000 feet of all kinds of lumber except logs, North Tonawanda, N. Y., a little more than 170,000,000; Ludington, Mich., less than 80,000,000; Cleveland about 72,000,000, and Detroit little more than 66,000,000 feet. That is, the little harbor of San Pedro received more lumber than did any Eastern city, and it is unnecessary to call attention to the fact that the receipt of lumber in such quantity indicates that the building business is booming. The amount of lumber received in San Francisco bay was about 900,000,000 board feet, which is a showing that speaks for itself.

First Account of Noah's Flood

Never, perhaps, was a more interesting relic of long-ago generations of men discovered than was found, not long ago, in the ruins of Nineveh. The relic consists of a bit of stone about 2 3/4 by 2 5/8 inches in dimensions. Professor Hilprecht of the University of Pennsylvania estimates its age at somewhat more than 4,000 years, so that, had it the gift of memory, it could recall a time when Bryan was not running for President. On this fragment of stone is engraved what doubtless is the first account of the great flood of many nations' fables that now is in man's keeping. Professor Hilprecht translates the writing on the fragment as follows: "... Thee ... (The confines of heaven and earth) I will loosen, (a deluge I will make and) it shall sweep away all men together; (but thou seek) life before the deluge cometh forth; (for over all living beings,) as many as there are, I will bring overthrow, destruction, annihilation ... Build a great ship and ... total height shall be its structure. It shall be a houseboat carrying what has been saved of life, with a strong deck over (it). (The ship) which thou shalt make (into it bring) the beasts of the field, the birds of heaven, (and the creeping things, two of everything) instead of a number ... Number ... and the family ... and ... " Sounds considerably like an indorsement of Genesis 6 and 7, does it not?

Divorce in Switzerland

Switzerland does many things in its own way, and in doing so frequently improves upon methods in vogue in other countries. Its manner of dealing with what threaten to become divorce cases is decidedly unique. In each city of any importance is published a semi-official paper known as the Teuille d'Avis, in which are printed announcements reading about as follows: "Monsieur and Madame X, who are in instance of divorce, are requested to appear privately before the Judge, alone or with their lawyers, in order to come to a reconciliation if possible." This notice precedes divorce trial, and the parties may respond to it or not, as they please. Very often they meet before the judge, and it is said that his kindly semi-official offices result in reconciliation in at least 30 per cent of cases. It is understood that if either of the parties fails to attend this preliminary meeting the case will be fought to its conclusion. Swiss lawyers will not definitely take charge of a divorce case until this quasi-official attempt at reconciliation has been made.

Money in Our Savings Banks

Notwithstanding the high price of meat—not to mention other things which equally deserve mention in this respect, but receive less of it—the people of the United States have far and away more money, in proportion to numbers, deposited in savings banks than have any other people. A report of the secretary of the savings bank section of the American bankers' association shows that the total savings deposits of the world are $15,389,672,014, while the deposits in this country are $5,678,735,379. That is, with perhaps one-twentieth of the population of the world resident in the United States, well toward three-eighths of the savings-bank deposits are ours. An excellent showing, but bear in mind that it is due rather to rare opportunities than to economy. Of our total population one person in six has money in a savings bank, and his average deposit is $381.28; in the rest of the world the depositors number one to each eight of population, and the average deposit is $101.66. That is, again, we have one-third more depositors in proportion to population, and our average deposit nearly quadruples that of other depositors.

Are Radium Rays a New Form of Matter?

Prof. William H. Bragg of Adelaide University, Australia, promulgates the theory that the alpha rays, as they are termed, of radium, are neither solid, liquid nor gaseous, and yet are a form of matter hitherto unknown to mankind. These alpha rays unceasingly shoot forth from the radium at a velocity of 10,000 miles a second. As this would take a ray from the earth to the moon in about one-third of a minute, it must be classed as "going some." Mass for mass, the energy of these rays is about a quarter-million times as great as that of any other known atom. The rays travel in a perfectly straight line, passing through any substance they encounter without deviation from that line. Nothing known is so dense that it can alter their course or delay their progress, and there is no other atom through which they do not pass. It is because of these facts that Professor Bragg has decided that the radioactive particles are a form of matter hitherto as unknown to man as, say, the fourth dimension.

Italians in the United States

The Italian bureau of emigration is responsible for the estimate that 1,750,000 people of Italian birth were residing in the United States at the close of the first half of the year 1908. Further than that, it is estimated that the number of such immigrants residing here had increased by 1,007,803 since the census of 1900 was taken. That is, in eight years these immigrants multiplied their number by 136 per cent. It looks almost as if Italy had concluded to come over. The most of these people have settled in the East, it being estimated that the Italian population of New York, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey and Rhode Island now numbers about 1,300,000, or nearly three-fourths of the entire number. They are coming fast, but it may as well be remembered that one and three-fourths millions is little more than two per cent of the population of this country at the present time.

Before Great Babylon Was Built

Because of various articles exhumed in excavating in Babylonia, Leonard King, assistant in the department of Assyrian and Egyptian antiquities in the British museum, has been enabled to evolve a very clear conception of the life of the Sumerians, the prehistoric people who inhabited southern Babylonia prior to the advent of those Babylonians of whom we possess some fragments of historic knowledge, probably about 3500 B. C. It appears that the Sumerians had some acquaintance with the ways of civilized life. They lived in cities, their houses being built of sun-burned brick and surrounded by mud walls. They had some knowledge of irrigation, raised water by means of wheels, and cultivated fields.

BALZAC PLAY JUST PRODUCED

A rather curious feeling was produced among students of literature and the theater when it was announced that a play by Balzac, written seventy years ago, was to be acted at the Odeon this week for the first time on any stage, says the New York Times. It seemed almost like a resurrection of the dead. The event affords a test also of the present popular value of Balzac. The result of the test, however, cannot be expected, in so peculiar a case, to be known at the earliest representations. The piece exhibits Balzac's usual extravagances and excesses, but three of the five acts are strong enough to invest the whole with intense interest.

"L'Ecole des Menages"—such is the title—presents the violent love of a merchant, a typical Paris bourgeois, for a young woman whom he has taken into his household and who has become the confidential supervisor of his business. After some stormy scenes of jealousy and heroic efforts by the wife to exile the young woman, the resolute nature of her husband's passion and the force of other circumstances convince the wife that it is best to tolerate the arrangement; but then another member of the family, a mere child, moved by the continued lamentations of her mother and grandmother, makes a stupid attempt to poison the interloper. She succeeds in making the whole family ill, but none dies except a favorite dog.

The merchant first, and afterward the woman go mad, and in the last act they seek pitifully to recognize each other, but cannot.

The interplay of motives among the different personages is marvelously revealed in the piece, but the finest scene is that in which the merchant, in trying to discover the author of the crime, causes the doors of the house to be locked and calls all the members of the family before him, examining each of them in turn. When, by chance, the truth is made known, the poignancy of the situation stands vividly forth.

THOREAU'S ASCETICISM

R. L. Stevenson in Familiar Studies

But a man may be both coldly cruel in the pursuit of goodness, and morbid even in the pursuit of health. I cannot lay my hands on the passage in which he explains his abstinence from tea and coffee, but I am sure I have the meaning correctly. It is this: He thought it bad economy and worthy of no true virtuoso to spoil the natural rapture of the morning with such muddy stimulants; let him but see the sun rise, and he was already sufficiently inspired for the labors of the day. That may be reason good enough to abstain from tea; but when we go on to find the same man, on the same or similar grounds, abstain from nearly everything that his neighbors innocently and pleasurably use, and from the rubs and trials of human society itself into the bargain, we recognize that valetudinarian healthfulness which is more delicate than sickness itself. We need have no respect for a state of artificial training. True health is to be able to do without it. Shakespeare, we can imagine, might begin the day upon a quart of ale, and yet enjoy the sunrise to the full as much as Thoreau, and commemorate his enjoyment in vastly better verses. A man who must separate himself from his neighbors' habits in order to be happy is in much the same case with one who requires to take opium for the same purpose.

Mrs. Kendal, the great English comedienne, is about to retire from the stage. As Andrea del Sarto was described as "the perfect painter," so may Mrs. Kendal be termed the "perfect actress." Her art seems never at fault; whatever she says or does the spectator feels that she has discovered the one way to say or do it. She has learned the trick of acting until nothing is left to say of the quality of her art, except that this quality has its own defect. Mrs. Kendal is essentially a comedienne, but, as she proved in "Diplomacy," she has emotional powers.

GREENE'S ATTACK ON SHAKESPEARE

There has just been added to the King's Library at the British Museum a unique example of the first edition of Robert Greene's "Groatsworth of Witte bought with a Million of Repentance," a book doubly valuable owing to its rarity and because it contains an extraordinary attack upon Shakespeare, says the Times, of New York.

"Hitherto it has been believed that no copy of the first edition existed," said one of the museum officials yesterday. "We have purchased this copy, dated 1592, from a bookseller. We do not know its previous history."

The attack upon Shakespeare is contained in the following paragraph:

"Yes, trust them not; for there is an upstart—Crow, beautiful with our feathers, that with his 'tyger's hart wrapt in a Player's hide,' supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blanke verse as the best of you; and being an absolute 'Johannes fac totum,' is in his own conceit the onely Shake-scene in a Countrey."

Greene was himself an old, penniless, and worn-out playwright and poet, and his "Groats-worth" was a warning to his old associates, Marlowe, Peele, and Nash, to beware of the coming man, who, by imitating their plays, would drive them to penury.

THACKERAY HUMORIST, NOT WIT

Dean Hole is responsible for the remark about Thackeray's conversational powers that "he said so many good things—that they trod down and suffocated each other." His sense of humor was very keen and there are enough stories of his witty sayings to show that he said many more good things than ever came to be recorded.

Seeing in a window off the Strand the legend "Mutual Loan Fund Association" a friend with whom he was walking wondered what it meant. "Oh, it means," said the novelist, "that they have no money and lend it to each other."

Mere fun, mere farcial nonsense, he did not value highly. When he was asked if "Vanity Fair" would be funny he retorted that it would be humorous.

On March 12th a dinner was given to celebrate the completion of the twenty-fifth year of Walter Damrosch's career as an orchestral conductor. Twenty-five years ago they used to say that he could not conduct because he was too young, and now that he is old they say he will never learn. Others say that he can not conduct because his hair is too short and others declare that he is not even a musician. But he is still at it.

Californian Poets' Corner

LYRIC

(By Howard V. Sutherland.)

Pale lips that yearn for kisses,
Sad lips that ever grieve,
Red lips that know what bliss is
And taste of it at eve—
Bethink you how the flowers
Beneath the mould must lie;
They bloom a few short hours
And then they fade and die.

O blue eyes live with fire,
O black eyes lit with flame,
O eyes that wake desire
And eyes still soft with shame—
Bethink you time is flying
And love is passing, too;
At dawn you may be lying
Beneath the somber yew!

There rest the old-time lovers,
There sleep they, man and maid;
Too late each one discovers
The sunshine turns to shade.
Bethink you, you must follow,
As night-time follows day,
To where the hills are hollow
And love no more holds sway.

AMERICAN OPERATIC STAR

Discussing Americans who have succeeded in opera abroad, the New York Sun says:

Edward Lankow, who is a native of Tarrytown, N. Y., where he was born in 1883, has just been engaged to go to Vienna as the first bass in the Imperial Opera House, which is a remarkable post for a young man whose experience on the operatic stage has been so brief. He has spent the last two years in Frankfort after one season in Dresden. Last winter he went to Vienna to sing as guest with the idea of being engaged for the company, although it scarcely seemed probable that the post of first bass would be offered to such a young man. He was immediately engaged. He retires from the Frankfort Stadt Theater at the end of the present season and then goes to Vienna for the next five years.

Mr. Lankow was the adopted son and pupil of Mme. Anna Lankow, the singing teacher who recently died. Associated with him in the company as tenor will be William Miller, now at the Royal Opera in Dusseldorf. Of all the American singers abroad his career has been the most surprising and he is said to possess a voice of uncommon beauty. He is a native of Pittsburg, where he began life as a newsboy, and in his youth was sick from smallpox, which left him scarred from the disease. So he has no beauty to account for his great success. He studied in Berlin, and after singing for various agents was engaged for Dusseldorf. When Herman Gura gave his season last summer at the Royal Opera House he engaged young Miller to come there for several performances. So great was his success that Felix Weingartner of the Imperial Opera in Vienna immediately began to negotiate for his services to take the place of Leo Slezak, who had to come to America. Andreas Dippel, who was at that time in Berlin, hurried to persuade the American tenor to sign a contract for the Metropolitan Opera House. He demanded a sum, however, beyond what Mr. Dippel thought proper. Mr. Miller receives in Vienna $15,000 a year, which is a large sum to pay in a foreign opera house. Byford Ryan is another American tenor who has succeeded abroad. He is at the Komische Opera in Berlin and has been a successful feature of all the productions there.

William Wegener is a native of Wisconsin and went to Berlin in 1890 to study. He remained there for four years and then came back to Chicago and sang in a synagogue. Later he came to Brooklyn and remained there until 1904, singing for the following three years with the Savage English Opera Company until it was disbanded. Mr. Wegener then decided to go to Europe and was engaged at the opera house in Freiburg, where he has been for the last two years and a half. In that time he has acquired fifteen new operas, including, of course, the entire Wagner repertoire, in which he has the leading tenor role. Mr. Wegener has been engaged again for the new opera house in Freiburg, which was recently completed at a cost of a million and a half dollars and will be opened in September.

Putnam Griswold, who has been engaged for the Metropolitan Opera House and may find his path just as difficult when he comes over here as Clarence Whitehill has, has been for the last three years in Berlin. He was born in Minneapolis in 1876 and from twelve to twenty-one pursued various business occupations, continuing casual study and practice of music. He thinks this talent was acquired from his mother, who is a direct descendant of Israel Putnam, the revolutionary general. While in St. Paul Dr. Rays-Herbert discovered that he had a voice worth cultivation and Mr. Griswold considers that he owes more to this teacher than any other.

George Broadhurst says he will write no more propaganda plays. He infers that he will return to the old emotional formulas, abandoning his effort to write dramas criticizing social, political and economic abuses, as shown in his "The Man of the Hour" and "The Dollar Mark."

BETTER LAWS FOR DEPENDENT CHILD

A PROPOSED PLAN OF PROBATION FOR WAYWARD MOTHERS

The judges of our courts declare that no woman shall be deprived of the right to see her child, no matter how miserably she has failed in her maternal duty. A judge will take the child from the mother and commit it to an institution, but he will insist that the mother may have access to the child.

This position of the judges is simply a reflection of public sentiment. This public sentiment is a thoughtless reflection of one of the profoundest emotional attributes of humanity.

But it happens that here this emotion is misplaced. The general public is not acquainted with the facts in the long series of cases that pass through the hands of institutions and before their managers. The public does not know that most of these mothers are either drunkards or depraved or live the life of the underworld, and that their pernicious influence upon their children is so much greater than the beneficial influence of their maternal instinct that they are a curse instead of a blessing to their children. The public does not realize—what institutional workers and home-finding agents know—that the possibility of placing a child of such a mother in a home where it may be properly reared is effectually blocked by the attitude of the court, because it allows a drunken mother to create a scene at periodic intervals in the homes of the decent people to whom such a child is committed. The public does not realize that the only influence of moral suasion for making that mother a decent woman is the fear, enforced by law, of permanently losing the child, and that, with this fear non-existent, as it now is, the efforts to reform such a mother are foredoomed to failure.

Look a moment at a typical case. Here is a woman who has been married five or six years and has a daughter, say, four years old. The woman is fond of a gay life, she has moved to California from an Eastern community and the absence of old acquaintances removes the restraints of old days. Her husband is away from home a good deal, sometimes in the evenings. She gets acquainted with fast people, takes a drink now and then, drifts into worse associations, gets caught at the unforgivable sin and her husband gets a divorce. The chances are that the court will give her the child. The fast life now continues as a matter of course, the child is neglected or, even worse, is made to share in scenes that would disgust the coldest heart. The woman becomes an habitual drunkard, and, finally, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children hears of the case and the woman is arrested.

Now, the court will deprive the woman of the custody of the child and will commit it to the care of the Children's Agency, but with the proviso that the mother may see it. The mother visits the child every so often for a time, loses interest and drifts away. The agency could place the child out for adoption if the court would deprive the mother of its care, but this the court will not do. Then the mother turns up again and renews her visits to the child's new home. She brings it candy—it is the rarest thing in the world for her to bring clothing or shoes or money—candy and perhaps a toy, and she makes a great fuss over the youngster. The child thus sees in the mother only a lovely lady who brings her more candy than anyone else, she constantly keeps the mother in mind, she idealizes her.

Then the mother may want to take her back. She sobers up for a couple of weeks, dresses herself neatly, and goes into court, where she makes a plea that would melt one's heart, and the judge lets her have the child. That means that she goes back from decency and comfort into a chaotic world of alternate immorality, drunkenness and spasms of repentance and reform. The child sees and hears and learns things she ought never experience, she is neglected, gets no training and no moral guidance. The result is easy to see.

Or, if the mother does not get the child back the best that can be done for it is to continue to board it out, for no one will adopt a child who knows that a dissolute woman is to have the run of the place and that the adopted child will never be allowed to forget its mother and learn to substitute the foster mother in its affections.

In other words, in the present state of public opinion and of that public opinion as expressed in court orders, the process of helping the child is always incomplete, broken at exactly the point where really effective help could begin.

What is necessary is a change in public sentiment, a change in the point of view of the courts, and a change in the law. Here is the practical solution of the problem offered by Miss Katherine Felton, of the Associated Charities:

Make the mother in the typical case described above an offender against the laws. Establish a system of probation for such offenders, and make the agent of the child-placing agency the probation officer in charge of the case. Require the mother to report periodically to this probation officer, and warn her to mend her ways. Then present to her two alternatives: either she must earn the right to take back her child by decent living and productive industry, or have all legal claim upon the child removed by a final decree of the court. Give the woman a fair length of time—say one year—in which to stay on probation and prove her right to the child or to prove finally and conclusively her incapacity to rear it properly.

Now the practical operation and benefits of this plan are these:

It places the real offender, the mother, in the attitude she should justly be required to assume, that of a culprit and defendant at law. As the case now stands, the "heartless" agent of the home-finding society is on the defensive, and the mother has no burden of proof placed upon her to show that she is competent or worthy to have her child.

After the court has determined that the culprit is guilty of unworthiness to have the child, the mother is, by this plan, placed in the position of a prisoner on parole, under the surveillance of a probation officer, to be judged by her conduct for a stated probationary term. By such a process she is supplied with a powerful incentive to good behavior, not merely sporadic good behavior, but consistent good behavior. This is calculated to have a very sobering effect upon her ideas of life. The practice of self restraint through a long term of months is calculated to teach her the habit of right living. And, if she really has the love she professes for her child, she is given a fair chance to prove it and recover the child. Under the system—or lack of it—now in effect, no incentive at all is offered her, and she is rather apt to brazen it out, knowing that the agent in charge of her child is likely at any moment to lose her authority.

The effect of the proposed plan upon the child itself is salutary. In the first place, the child is at once and completely removed from the baneful influence of its mother. It can be boarded out under conditions that ensure its proper care until the mother's probationary term expires. If the mother profits by the probation and the child is restored to her, it is restored to a woman who has begun, at least, to live right and who is likely to continue to live so because she has had a chastening experience of the power of the law and the intention of the courts to compel her to live properly while the child is in her hands.

If the probationary term be a failure, the child is finally and forever removed from its mother's influence. It is now in a position where it stands a chance of adoption by decent people who will rear it properly, replace the mother in its memory and its affections, and see that it grows up to usefulness and morality and honor.

Such is the plan and such are its effects. It is based upon years of practical work in child study, it is the outgrowth of reflection upon years of experiences with wayward women and their unfortunate children. It is practical, it is sensible, it is just, and it is by all odds more humane, both to the mother and the child, than the present indeterminate, ineffectual and often worse than useless method. It does no violence to the sentiment of men for the instinct of maternal solicitude, for every step of the process is by judicial process in public courts, and every act of the probation officer is subject to judicial review.

Miss Felton's suggestion should be debated in those bodies that are devoted to the discussion of serious problems, and the details of a coherent plan should be threshed out by the united efforts of charity workers, lawyers and legislators. Then some definite embodiment of the plan should be made the law of California.

But the first step is to educate the public mind to the actual facts about dependent childhood, so that public sentiment will cease to be purely public sentimentality, and so that the judges, who necessarily reflect public sentiment, will appreciate the justice of such a statute and enforce its provisions in practice.

SHEAR WIT

"Gifford Pinchot walks slowly," says the Des Moines Capital. Probably has a lumbering gait.—New York Mail.

"What was the best after-dinner speech you ever heard?" "The other fellow said, 'Let me settle with the waiter.'"—Cleveland Leader.

After a brief conversation on conventional topics, the physician visiting the asylum said: "Why are you here?" "Simply a difference of opinion," replied the patient. "I said all men were mad, and all men said I was mad—and the majority won!"—Lippincott's.

"You are not supposed to walk on those rugs," said the dealer. "You hang them on the wall. They are works of art." "I see," replied Mr. Cumrox. "I am just beginning to understand that art is something which transforms articles of natural utility into things that get in the way."—Washington Star.

Life once published a picture which represented a lot of jolly gentlemen forming a clamorous semi-circle around the front door of a suburban house. A lady in a night-cap has opened the window. The legend runs as follows: "Dear Mrs. Shmith! Will you—hie!—come down and pick out Mr. Shmith? The rest of us want to go home."

The court-martial was in session. "Why are you so sure that Captain Blank was sober that evening?" the judge advocate asked the witness. "Did he speak to you upon his return to his quarters?" "He did, sir." "What did he say?" "He told me to be shure an' call him early in the mornin', sir." "And did the captain say why he wished to be called early?" "Yis, sir, he did, sir. He said he was goin' to be Queen o' the May, sir," responded the orderly with convincing gravity.—Cosmopolitan.

Chairman Koskiatowsky, of the Congressional Committee on Immigration, rapped that body to order. "We will now hear those who desire to speak on the new bill for the restriction of immigration," he announced. Whereupon Messrs. Amazuma, Hip Lung, O'Laughlin, MacDougal, D'Eauvre, Schwartzentfest, Spagaroni, Kumar Ghosh, and Navarrez made eloquent talks in favor of putting up the immigration bars, so as to preserve the purity of the great American race. Mr. John Jones spoke in favor of opening the doors to all, but he was roundly hissed as being un-American. The bill was favorably reported.—Lippincott's.

An Irishman over the age of fourscore and ten, who by strict economy had accumulated a modest fortune, and was about to die, called in the parish priest and the family lawyer to make his last will and testament. The preliminaries of the will having been concluded, it became necessary to inquire about the debts owing to the estate. "Now, then," said the lawyer, "state explicitly the amount owed you by your friends." "Timothy Brown," replied the old man, "owes me £50. Jim Casey owes me £37, and—" "Good! Good!" ejaculated the prospective widow; "rational to the last!" "Luke Brown owes me £40," resumed the old man. "Rational to the last!" put in the eager old lady again. "To Michael Levy I owe £200." "Ah!" exclaimed the old lady, "hear him rave!"

AS THE WORLD WAGS

The Girls Who Have Helped Us Out

"Seven times seven is forty-eight." The statement I made was bold,
And the look that the teacher turned on me was searching and also cold.
Till a doubt crept in and I tried again, "Er—no—it is forty-two."

Oh, the frozen look on that icy face as colder and colder it grew!

And I felt my wee soul shrink and shrink till there came a whiper fine,
And I straightway cried, "Why, I most forgot —of course it is forty-nine."

Ah, little wee maid of the seat next mine, wherever and e'er you be,
Here's a grateful thought for the whispered word and a health to the wraith of thee.

The lass who sat in the seat next mine was freckled, I now recall.

And her hair was just of that sun-baked shade which isn't a shade at all.

And her nose was snub, and her eyes were blue of a somewhat faded hue—

I guess that the angels had washed them out and left them the ghost of blue—

And her skirts were scant—but it matters not;
on many and many a day

She whispered the word that I longed to hear and hustled my care away.

Oh, I know she's old, and perhaps she is thin, or wrinkled by worry and doubt,

But here's to the girl of the seat next mine,
the lassie who helped me out.

She wasn't alone. All the way through life
I've noticed, and notice still,

When a man falls down there's a woman at hand to help him to climb the hill.

She may not be wise, nor strikingly good—when Eve passed the apple, you know.

She was foolish and bad, but the taste was so good she longed to give Adam a show;

And it's so with them all. They help if they can; if they can't they are willing to try.

And their whisper is heard when we're needing to hear, since we of life's learning are shy.

So here is a pledge—we'll join in it, lads, with never a question or doubt—

A health to the lassies we all have met, the girls who have helped us out!

Where the Boy Mayor Will Fall Down

It is to be feared that the boy mayor of San Francisco will not be able to maintain business at the high standard which it recently has attained in the city. Thanks to the noble and heroic exertions of some of our prominent business men, the red-light district has been booming of late. Having been officially indorsed, Terpsichore has tripped her light, fantastic toes to a particularly light, fantastic height, and the primrose path has been almost bereft of primroses, owing to the large demand effected by their official indorsement. Boys and girls have been drunk who never were drunk before, and everything has moved along just as our good business men and wise officials desired.

With this much gained—and let us pause here to congratulate ourselves that nothing could be better for business—with this much gained, I say, we must at any cost maintain the ground thus won, and it is to be apprehended that a boy could not do it successfully. Of course a "Paris of America" early educates its youth along these delectable lines, yet it is to be feared that no boy can maintain business in such lines up to the standard this administration has set. The red-light dancing will continue, but it will languish without official recognition.

The boy mayor will do his best, and all of us will rejoice in the honor extended to him, but he will not be able to live up to the standard set by the administration whose mayor steps down and out for a week. For a dreary seven days the tenderloin will miss, at least in some degree, the hand of official encouragement.

The Opinions of Rufus

We can talk a man's (or woman's) repytashun away, an' we sometimes do, but let's be grateful, brethren, that our affectin' comments can't touch his character, for prob'ly we'd knock that, too, if we could.

I reckon the most s'prisin' thing 'bout the Judgment Day'll be the stupenjus drop in prices the world has set on some of its prominent citizens.

It's a good deal easier to forgive the same kind of fool es we are than it is to forgive the other kinds.

The poet writ of "love's eternal flame," an' I guess the flame is eternal, but frequently the candle it's burnin' on gits changed, es the grass widdier said.

"Friendship is a sacred trust," an' it's 'bout the only trust I know of that is sacred.

Again, speakin' of friendship bein' a sacred trust, my observation is that you can't gener'ly work its trust fer more'n five or ten dollars at the outside.

Jabe Brower says he reckons some men perclaim their own merits on the principle that they ain't enough of 'em so they'd be noticed if they didn't.

Sister Brown says she loves her husband more'n she does the spring styles, an' greater love hath no woman than this.

Lots of women act as consciences to their husbands, 'cept es conscience is said to have a still, small voice.

I knew a man once that was so honest that he paid his doctor's bills without bein' dunned more'n once—but I don't know es I blame you fer claimin' they's sech a thing es bein' too partic'lar.

"I'm of respectable stock," said old man Simmons, weepin' bitterly, "of old New England stock," says he, "an' yit my daughter spells her name A-l-y-c-e!" an' then he bust forth cryin' again. An' what could I say to comfort the poor old man?

Life

A voyager, strangely puzzled,

Borne here from an unseen shore;

A voice in the hurly-burly

That never was heard before;

Little, wee hands a-flutter,

Feet that no-whither start,

And, registered up in heaven,

The prayer in a mother's heart.

Rollicking games and laughter;

Tears that are lost in smiles;

Romps on the sun-kissed meadows;

Childhood, and childhood's wiles;

Home when the even cometh,

In a mother's arms to lie

And list to the wondrous music

That croons in her lullaby.

Stress of the daily struggle;

Race that the feet must run,

Haply to gain a bauble,

Haply a height unwon;

Two who shall stand together

All of life's pathway along;

And years that crept in the morning

Now speed in a hurrying throng.

Tears by a low cot falling;

Sighs, and the last brief breath;

A coffin, with pallid tenant

Who looks on the face of Death.

Slowly the body passeth,

A garment worn out and frayed;

Finished the dream called living,

And all of its drama played.

L'ENVOI

Father, our lore is nothing;

Ay, and our deeds are wee;

We walk in the mist, unseeing

The end that is clear to thee;

Still doth our faith assure us:

Knowledge shall yet be mine,

For a gate in the mists leads to it,

And death is its key divine.

An Important Announcement

It is pleasant to be able to announce that Mayor McCarthy, the board of supervisors and District Attorney Fickert, after careful consideration of the local situation, and being influenced by a deep realization of their moral responsibility to the people who elected them to office, have fully determined to use their great influence for the regeneration and social betterment of San Francisco. In doing this, they regretfully admit that for a short time they were unwittingly led astray by the blinding allurements of the false sirens of evil, but that sorry day is past, and it is their fixed purpose now to give San Francisco an administration which will be a world-wide credit to it. To this end, they have pledged themselves.

First—To leave no stone unturned to secure the conviction of Patrick Calhoun and the other men whom the whole world knows to have been guilty of the crime of bribery;

Second—The saloons, being recognized factories of vice and crime, not to mention lesser grossness, will be confined closely within those limits which the law contemplates;

Third—Every step to the end that the people shall own the United Railroads, instead of the United Railroads owning the people, will be taken;

Fourth—Forgetting Spring Valley and its automobile rides, municipal waterworks will be hastened toward completion;

Fifth—Realizing that the true welfare of a people is based upon the maintenance of high standards and the spiritual altitude which—

April fool, you chump! You should have remembered that this is the first day of the fourth month of the year, and, more than that, you should have realized that, while it may be possible to be born again, it is deucedly improbable that a mayor, a board of supervisors and a district attorney would select the same day for that pleasing event. It's on you.

Easter—and It Rained!

It was Easter Sunday, and it rained; rained persistently or hesitantly; rained in great drops or small drops; rained methodically or spasmodically; but, anyway, it rained. And madam's new hat lay untouched in its gigantic box, and grief unutterable was in madam's heart, for, lo, the dreary day must pass, and the new hat and she could not display themselves in sacred places! Talk about woe, boiled-down and super-extra condensed, this is where you found it.

And yet, do you know, I have been wondering if nature's affront to the new hat and madam were not deliberate on the part of the Almighty. I have been wondering if in those High Councils which we comprehend not there may sometimes come a sense of weariness that that Resurrection Day which should be held holy, if it lie in the heart of man—or, particularly, woman—to esteem anything holy, is converted into a National Display Day. The chandelier bonnet, the vegetable-garden bonnet; pomp, gewgaws, baubles, painted and gilded nothings—all this, and a much-betinsed more, to commemorate the rising of one who had not where to lay his head because he was so busy doing good that he would not take time to find such resting place. His resurrection commemorated by bending supple knees to Goddess Fashion! Lips that faintly murmur, "Lord, be merciful to us, miserable offenders," while back of the prattled, pitiful words lies the old query, "Is my hat on straight?"

It was Easter Sunday, and it rained. Do you suppose that the Almighty, wearying of man's—or woman's—vanity of vanities, sent the dreaded downpour to compel Dame Fashion to stay at home on a national Show Day which every association should have maintained as sacred? Probably you will not agree with me, but, as I said, I have been wondering.

Let us, then, be up and eating.

With a heart for any stress;

If we can't afford a beefsteak,

Mush will take its place, I guess.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

A Laborious Spontaneity

Mr. Alden Anderson feels that he is called of the People of California to be their governor. He affirms that this call came to him in the form of innumerable letters from influential men asking him to make the race and he has it not in his heart to say "nay."

We wonder if Mr. Anderson was cognizant of a case of spontaneous combustion that occurred three years ago. If not he will find it suggestive. Senator Eddie Wolfe had gotten through the legislature a bill carrying a huge appropriation in aid of holding an exposition in San Francisco and it had gone to the governor. It was perfectly evident that the state's finances were in such shape that the governor could not sign the bill without becoming a candidate for incarceration in a state hospital and it was also reported at the time that Mr. Harriman had admonished him not to sign that bill. He would not, he could not, he did not.

Nevertheless telegrams poured in upon him from all parts of the state and from hundreds of men in and around San Francisco imploring him to sign that bill. The governor soon had a barrel full of them, but for every such telegram that went to Sacramento a "dead-head" telegram had previously gone out from the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company urging that an urgent telegram be sent to the governor with "rush" orders to please sign. These telegrams had but one result and were expected to have but one—a demonstration of the governor's independence of the influence of the power that made him governor, and yet the demand to sign that bill did seem at the time to be beautifully spontaneous.

Lacks Sufficient Provocation

It goes without saying that Mr. Anderson is personally above any such method of working up a political spontaneity, but there are those who are not. He is more likely to be a victim of, than party to, any such attempt to pump political thunder out of a star-lit atmosphere; but if the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau stood in need of a candidate to be "Crockered" in the interests of Charles F. Curry nothing would be easier, or more natural, than to pass the word down the line that letters be written to Mr. Anderson begging him to make the race. If Mr. Anderson will take the trouble to trace each of his letters to its source he will find that, with striking unanimity, the inspiration for them came, somewhat circuitously, perhaps, from the vicinity of Powell and Market streets, in San Francisco. For, to be frank with Mr. Anderson, there is little in his past or present to prompt a great uprising in his favor at this time, little to designate him as the lone and only Winkelreid of the hour. To be sure he has been able to go through many hot campaigns unscathed and without being made conspicuous for the performance of valiant service for or against the "powers that be." In fact he has not known that there has been any fight on behalf of free government in this state. He has not heard of any insurrection against the domination of the Republican party by the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau. He is a good man and a fine fellow and if he were chief executive of California he would drift right along with the tide in the same old way and never ruffle a feather. Meantime it would be well for him to look to the factor of spontaneity. It may have been forced.

The Richest Joke Perpetrated So Far

Editor Prisk of the Grass Valley Union has long been known to be able, but it is only lately that he has blossomed out as a press humorist. Quite the richest joke of the campaign, so far, appeared in his paper, the Grass Valley Union, of the 25th ultimo. It was to the effect that if the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League finds itself unable to nominate Hiram W. Johnson over Alden Anderson it will throw its strength to Charles F. Curry as the next best exponent of an independent Republicanism and the surest man to bind up the wounds of the Republican party and so present a united front to the Democrats in November. Here is where the laugh comes in. W. F. Prisk is a Democrat and the Grass Valley Union is interested in having the Republicans nominate some one who would create a political revolution in California and thereby secure the election of the Democratic candidate. Naturally he picks Mr. Curry as the candidate most likely to force the better element in the Republican party to buck like bronchos and kick like bay steers. The idea of the Lincoln-Roosevelters espousing the cause of Curry under any conceivable condition of circumstances is hilarious.

And You, Too, Nat. Ellery

It has been a fear that the direct primary might prove of little effect in heading off political rascality, for the reason that manipulators by urging out a multiplicity of favorite sons and other meritorious candidates might so divide up the vote of the honest citizenship that a mobilized and centralized "push" vote would carry the programme ticket as certainly in a direct primary as in a convention. Evidently the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company is going to test the feasibility of that plan of defeating the popular will at this election. Every man who can get a good man's vote, and so help to divide the good men of the state into such small factions that Curry will come out in the lead, will be encouraged to enter the lists for governor. Nathaniel Ellery is the latest candidate to enter the field. He is a good fellow. He fought the cement trust. To be sure he did not whip it, but he fought it. He comes from Humboldt and might get a few hundred votes up that way that otherwise would be cast for Hiram Johnson. Two out of every three votes cast for Phil Stanton would be cast for Johnson if Stanton were not in the race. Three out of every four votes cast for Anderson would be cast for Johnson if Anderson were not under the misapprehension that he is running, and all the votes cast for Nat Ellery would be cast for Johnson if Ellery's name were not on the direct primary ballot. Therefore all these men are virtual allies of Curry because Curry's vote is a known quantity. It constitutes the "push" of California, and not one of them all would go to Johnson under any conceivable condition. They are all against Right Things.

Anybody to Beat Bell

From an independent standpoint the most unfortunate aspect of affairs political in California at this hour is the apparent cocksureness of Democrats that Theodore Bell can have the Democratic nomination for governor for the asking. He can't. He will have to fight for it if he gets it. The Democratic party in this state is being combed for a safe and sane candidate for governor to enter the lists against Bell, and that man will be found. The Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company is not going to rely wholly upon Charles F. Curry without having any Democratic anchor cast to windward. The latest man mentioned for the Democratic nomination is H. A. Jastro, of Bakersfield, the smartest if not the sweetest member of the Democratic party in California. Mr. Jastro is now in Europe trying to regain his health. No man would have the "interests" nearer the heart or would more fittingly represent the "interests" than H. A. Jastro. Who next?

The Near and Narrow View

It is easy to underestimate the influence of a small country paper. It is often greater in the little field where it circulates than is the influence of any metropolitan paper in that community. Among these smaller papers in the smaller towns of the state the Anaheim Gazette ranks well, and it generally stands for Right Things. This time it does not. It is boosting the candidacy of P. A. Stanton and, strangely enough, because he "bears scars of his fight against the machine." There have been occasions when Stanton has not acted with the Herrin "organization," as he did not at the Santa Cruz convention, but none of the knocks he ever got in any such fight ever made a scar, whereas such scars as he has received, and of which he will never rid himself, he got for fighting in the ranks of the "organization" and not against it. The reason Stanton was not made speaker of the assembly three years ago is that Bob Beardslee was and Stanton had to wait. There may have been a little something disciplinary in this and, if there was, it worked a cure, for when Stanton became speaker of the assembly of 1909 he was as obedient to the Political Bureau in the making up of his committees as Bob Beardslee had been two years before, than which Mr. Herrin would not have the assurance to ask more. But Mr. Stanton has his country residence over against Anaheim and Editor Kuchel feels called upon to sustain the ambitions of the home man rather than those of a stranger, although that stranger be a bigger, a broader and a freer man. Stanton might not make a bad governor, but he would not make an anti-machine governor. He might be more independent than Anderson or Curry, but he would not be independent of Southern Pacific control.

More Interesting Than Important

There is a bit of political gossip floating about among the newspaper fraternity that has a spice of interest in it, if it is not very important. It relates to the origin and reason for the talked-of candidacy of Henry T. Gage for United States senator. According to this report, Mr. William Randolph Hearst has been down in Mexico. The fact that Alfred Henry Lewis has been taking up the Mexican side of the Mexican question in the Hearst papers suggests that Mr. Hearst may not have been averse to doing a good stroke of business while in Mexico, but that is an aside. The main point is that a telegram from Mr. Hearst came to the Hearst Examiners in San Francisco and Los Angeles instructing them to boost Henry T. Gage for the United States senate. They have hardly got a second to their motion, except from The California Weekly, which desires Mr. Gage to make the race as being the most straight-out Southern Pacific candidate of them all. So much for the source of Mr. Gage's candidacy. Now for the reason: This same report has it that this candidacy was brought forward by Mr. Hearst as a peace offering to California Catholics, many of whom have become estranged from the Hearst papers. Mr. Gage has kindly feelings for the Catholic church and many Catholics for him, which is proper and neither makes for nor against his candidacy for senatorial honors. That is emphatically not the point. The point in the rumor is that Mr. Gage is essentially a peace offering of the Hearst newspapers rather than a straight-out candidate brought forward by the Political Bureau.

Walter Parker Up Against It

Walter F. X. Parker has returned from the East, where he went to help his associate on the staff of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company, Justice Henshaw, make Flint wobbly. The Southern California polities who wear the "organization" collar have been anxiously awaiting Parker's return and as soon as he got back they demanded to know if it was not about time for him to do something. His reply was significant. It was, "What is there to do?" Sure enough, what is there to do? What but put the S. P. branding iron on a few more gentlemen, like Alden Anderson, of heretofore unblemished character, and what good can that do? As soon as the people see the brand they will put an "I. C." (inspectant condemned) over against the S. P. brand and that will settle that candidacy. The fact is that the generals and lieutenants, corporals and high privates, in the ranks of the machine, who had their training in conventions, are at sea as to how they are to manipulate a direct primary, and, to make it worse, there is a revolution on from Maine to California. But we are not to infer from this that the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau has gone out of business. On the contrary, the whole bureau is sitting up nights a-thinking and a-thinking.

Senatorial Fight to Go To the Legislature

The greeting which the senatorial candidacy of Judge John D. Works has received throughout Southern California, and the frost that overtook and blighted the Hearst boom for Henry T. Gage, make it unlikely that any particular "organization" candidate for senatorial honors will be brought out. Governor Gage has not heard that "Southern California Wants Me," and he will not hear it unless he gives out that he expects to make Los Angeles his home after the first of the year and gives a hostage to good faith by exchanging his Alaska coal lands for a Los Angeles suburban home. Indications are that as many candidates as possible will be induced to come out for the United States senate, "spontaneously," of course, and to this end the postoffice department may do an exceptional business for the next six weeks or two months. These letters will be mailed at Powell and Market streets in San Francisco and will go out to urge reliable men to urge other reliable men to enter the senatorial race. It will be a species of postal primary through which many candidates will be nominated, and any candidate who can make sure of having his own legislative delegation instructed for him at the August primaries will serve the purpose. If by this means Judge Works can be prevented from carrying a majority of the legislative districts of the state legislators will come together in the same position as though there had been no advisory vote at all and the Political Bureau will know how to deal with that situation. Therefore, from now on, we may look for new senatorial candidates to crop up almost anywhere almost any day.

Good Words For John D. Works

Our advices from the Southern end of the state indicate a fine reception on the part of the people of the senatorial candidacy of Judge John D. Works. One informant, closely allied to political affairs, declares that he will secure the advisory vote of the entire nine assembly districts of Los Angeles, and it is known that San Diego, where the Judge once resided, and where there is a feeling of personal if not possessory interest in him, will be strongly for him. In Riverside and Orange counties, where he is well known, public sentiment is strongly for him. In San Bernardino county, Redlands, Ontario and Upland have spoken for Works, and it is believed that the progressive sentiment may be made effective for him in old San Bernardino itself, where "organization" methods have been strongly entrenched. There is some talk in Los Angeles that Judge John W. McKinley, who was chairman of the Santa Cruz convention, and wears the S. P. collar as jauntily as the next one, may be brought into the fight against Works. Next to Henry T. Gage Judge McKinley would best represent the Herrinized element in the Republican party and his candidacy would make the issue so clear that no one would vote under a misapprehension as to the issue. That issue is as to whether the people or the Southern Pacific Company is to govern California. No doubt Judge Works would warmly welcome Judge McKinley's entrance into the contest. And yet Judge McKinley is a brilliant man. The only fault to be found with him is that he is, out and out, a Southern Pacific obedient servant.

Is Stanton Helping Curry or Johnson?

Stanton's candidacy for governor is confessedly an unknown quantity. The confession of Douglas White, Curry's Los Angeles manager, that Johnson will carry Los Angeles county, is being corroborated by many close observers in that county, some of whom are not affiliated with the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. This paper has believed that two out of every three votes cast for Stanton would go to Johnson if Stanton were not in the race and that it is for this reason that Stanton is in the race; but it is only fair to say that many Leaguers on the ground incline to the opinion that if Stanton were out of it his vote would be divided between Curry and Anderson. If this promises to be so we may expect Stanton to get out of the race before the primaries are held. A collapse of that boom is being looked for by many. The Los Angeles Times is booming Stanton with a fine frenzy, forgetting that upon an earlier occasion it branded him as a pin-head politician and out-and-out machine tool, but other memories are better and, at the psychological moment, the deadly parallel will do its work for Stanton and the Times. Whatever limitations Phil Stanton may have he is no chump, and he is not going to officiate as lamb at any sacrificial function if he knows himself and he generally does, not even to oblige Mr. Herrin, with whom his relations are said to be very pleasant. Something will happen as soon as Stanton finds where he is "at," and he was never found to be slow but once and that was when he went to Seattle at public expense, in September, to participate in the opening of the Alaska-Yukon exposition which took place in May. That time he was marked late.

A CLEAN SWEEP

Santa Clara Should Send Black Back

Santa Clara county sent one of the best delegations to the last legislature that entered that body from any part of the state. Its two senatorial districts, the 27th and 28th, were represented by George S. Walker and Marshall Black, respectively. Both of these men made enviable records. Senator Walker is a holdover this year, and will not be in the campaign on his own behalf, but he is in active charge of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement in Santa Clara county, and will make a hot fight on behalf of Lincoln-Roosevelt candidates. Senator Black is out for re-election in his district, and he should be earnestly supported. He stood right on the test measures at the last legislature, and he introduced and fought through such bills as the initiative amendment and Stanford anti-liquor law. He is a man who should be returned to office.

Out Generalled For Just Once

The performers have out-generalled the reformers on nearly every battlefield, and well they may, because they give their whole time to plotting and scheming, but in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and ten they appear to have been out-generalled in the manner of putting up a ticket. They were prevented following the Lincoln-Roosevelt plan because that would brand their every candidate as with a hot iron; the idea of a party convention was an absurdity and so there was nothing for it except to try the "spontaneous demand" idea, as in the case of Alden Anderson, with the result that the final "organization" ticket is likely to be about as lopsided and badly distributed as any ticket can be made. For instance, the modest city of San Bernardino has brought forward Judge Oster for the appellate bench, Walter Wagner for Secretary of State and Jeff McElvaine for member of the State Board of Equalization. If the issue were to be settled in a convention Walter Parker could say to two of these, "come off," but he can hardly do it now. His only chance to intimidate is through the tenderloin vote as stock in trade and, this time, that vote is not going to rule because as many votes will be cast at the primary as at the general election. The whole Herrin machine appears to be as wobbly as Frank Flint.

John W. Sweeney Is Senatorial Timber

John W. Sweeney, the well-known labor leader, is a potential candidate for the state senate from the 20th district, which comprises the 33rd and 34th assembly districts, in San Francisco. Sweeney has stood up for reform in San Francisco under the most trying conditions, and his ideals are right. He is a progressive Republican, honest, able, and fearless. The 20th has been misrepresented long enough—T. J. Kennedy is the latest man who has done it this ill service—and Sweeney is a good man to put forward to change that condition for the better. His well-known hostility to P. H. McCarthy and the McCarthy brand of politics is an added recommendation. His candidacy should be encouraged by the Independent Republicans of his district.

Santa Clara's Assemblymen

The Santa Clara county assembly districts are the 55th, 56th, and 57th. The 55th was represented by R. L. Telfer, of San Jose. Telfer is the editor of the union labor paper in San Jose, and is of the highest type of union labor man, able, clean, and progressive. His record as an assemblyman was A1, and his record as chairman of the assembly committee on contingent expenses was worthy of high praise. He is out for re-election, and should win. The 56th assembly district was represented by L. D. Bohnett, also of San Jose. Bohnett, two years before his election, had been clerk under Senator Walker on the committee on elections and election laws. Here he acquired a valuable training which, when he went to the assembly, made him one of the two most effective men on the floor. If he is re-elected, as he desires and as should be done, he will probably be chosen floor leader of the Lincoln-Roosevelt members of the assembly. His record also is high. The 57th assembly district was represented by Daniel R. Hayes, whose record was good as far as it went, but it might have gone farther if he were aggressively progressive, notably in the matters of the party circle bill and the judicial column bill. Hayes is a candidate for re-election, but is likely to be injured by the backing of the saloon element, which is for him and which is, just now, about the most unpopular thing in Santa Clara county.

Charles R. Detrick, For the Assembly

The man who will most likely receive the Republican nomination for assemblyman from the 57th, over Hayes, is Charles R. Detrick, of Mayfield. In 1906, Detrick was chairman of the campaign committee that shut the saloons out of Mayfield after a strenuous three-months' fight. That same year he was selected for membership on the Republican county central committee, and by that committee for membership in its executive committee. Since that time he has never missed a meeting. In 1908, when the Lincoln-Roosevelt League movement was started, Detrick was elected secretary of the county central committee, and introduced the resolution that pledged the county to the League. Later Detrick became chairman of the county central committee, and managed the campaign at the last presidential

LITTLE TALKS WITH OUR READERS

To The Editor of The California Weekly.

Sir: Mayor Hodghead of Berkeley has given The Weekly a cleverly written exposition of the commission plan of government based on the first few months of experience in his own city. It is of great importance that at least one California city should make a thorough trial of the plan, but its merits have not yet been demonstrated to the extent that all other cities should hasten to remodel their charters in order to put themselves under control of commissions exercising both legislative and executive functions. There is a suggestion of hysteria in the widespread enthusiasm for the new municipal idea.

Its keynote, according to Mayor Hodghead, is centralization, and centralization is no doubt what most of our municipal governments need. But does the commission plan really attain centralization?

Mayor Hodghead says all of the city appointments are made by the commission, or council, of which the mayor is merely a member with a few more functions than the other councilmen. Now, appointment has long been regarded as an executive function, to be performed by one man, whether president, governor or mayor, and both history and reason teach that the making of appointments by a many-headed legislative body is one of the worst principles which can be introduced into government. It divides and dissipates responsibility; it invites jobbery, because in a majority of cases the commission, or council, or school board will divide the appointments among its members in equal proportion, permitting each one to name his share of the appointees. The history of almost any city school board which appoints teachers will illustrate this.

So, in one important respect, the Berkeley charter is against centralization and a reversion to an out-worn political method. But Mayor Hodghead says the five men constituting the Berkeley council sit down together, discuss in harmony and reach decisions which represent the joint judgment of all of them. That is a fortunate state of affairs, which will probably last until the next election, when two new members will be elected and will be found to have different ideas, if not a different bias, from their hold-over associates.

By all means, let the Berkeley plan be tried, and let other cities watch the trial; but in the end it will probably be found that the tendency of the Berkeley plan is away from centralization instead of toward it.

Los Angeles, March 27, 1910.

D. E. E.

We are inclined to the opinion that our correspondent's point is well taken and that the Berkeley charter would have been better if it had vested the appointing power in the mayor, by and with the advice and consent of the trustees, it may be. As long as the government of Berkeley remains in the hands of its first-class citizens little difficulty may be experienced on account of this distribution of the appointive power, but when politics enters the city hall door, as it is certain to do, sooner or later, it will be a miracle if the uncentralized power of appointment does not develop a division of the spoils of victory and lead to a foreknowledge on the part of those inside as to which councilman, when elected, is to be assigned to which place. When that comes to be foreknown special interests will begin to prick up their ears with the idea that there is something doing at Berkeley. The Berkeley charter is good. In this particular it could have been made better.

Editor California Weekly.

Your Deeper Significance of Living for March 4th is worth a year's subscription to me. Your publication is one of force. Good luck to you and it.

IDA RAYNOR SPENCER.

Oakland, Cal.

People generally do not like to be preached to, and our Deeper Significance has been objected to on the ground that it is preaching. Sometimes it turns out to be so, but the writer of it tries to avoid just that thing, and yet there are facts in everyday experience that preach in spite of themselves and it were well if they somehow got into the inner consciousness of men. Stones have been known to have sermons in them. To many our Deeper Significance of Living means little, but there are those who assure us that they turn to it first of all. Anyhow, such words of commendation as those above make one feel that the little column may be well worth while.

The California Weekly, San Francisco, Cal.

Dear Sirs:—Let the good work go on. I would not do without your weekly visits to my study table.

Very gratefully yours,

W. E. ECKLES.

Pastor Congregational Church, Loomis, Cal.

The paper that helps to keep the pastor of a church in touch with the world as it is helps him in his pastorate, and when that paper is also striving to uphold high standards of public institutions it becomes an ally of the pastor in the work to which he has given his life. Press and pulpit should co-operate more than they do. The California Weekly is ready and willing to do its part, and if pastors will take the trouble to commend the paper to their parishioners they will be doing theirs.

California Weekly, San Francisco.

I have just received your notice that my subscription is out, and I am glad of it, for I can show my appreciation of the Weekly by promptly renewing. I inclose check herewith, wishing you the most unbounded prosperity. Sincerely yours,

CHAS. BURCKHALTER.

Oakland, Cal.

It is not often that a subscriber is anxious to have his subscription to a paper fall due that he may show his appreciation of it by a prompt renewal. Generally the year rolls around all too soon. We find much encouragement in that little comment.

The California Weekly.

Gentlemen:—I beg to acknowledge your notice that my subscription has expired, and take great pleasure in sending you the inclosed check for $2.50 for renewal, which is to include La Follette's Weekly, which I trust is correct.

I cordially agree with all the complimentary things your friends are saying, and curiously enough I have not found a single enemy of the thing you stand for to offer any adverse criticism, and I have added a few of these to your subscription list.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM BURD.

We hope to command the respect of those whose policies we oppose as well as of those whose cause we champion. On debatable issues our purpose is to be dispassionate, but between honesty and lying, integrity and theft, free government and government by and through great selfish interests, there is not room for two opinions. On such issues as these we neither give nor take quarter.

Editor The California Weekly.

Dear Sir:—The missing copies of the 4th and 11th received, for which I tender thanks.

When your readers cannot content themselves with missing a single number of The California Weekly and rave when they miss two, it should be good evidence that the Weekly is highly appreciated. Long may you live to continue the good work.

Yours sincerely,

G. E. KENNEDY.

Livermore, Cal., Mar. 16, 1910.

We make every effort to see to it that each subscriber's paper gets into the mail, but when a failure brings a letter like the foregoing regret for the slip between the press and the subscriber is much mitigated. Such incidents cheer us on our way and give us the assurance that The California Weekly is taking hold. When it was started there was no certain assurance that there would be a field for any such paper. Now we know that there is if it can be cultivated thoroughly enough, a field that will yield an increasing harvest the longer it is tilled.

election, carrying every county office for the Republican candidates for the first time in its history. Detrick has also had a training in legislative work that is really better than membership in the legislature itself. This was as assistant journal clerk of the assembly in 1907 and as journal clerk of the senate last year, positions in which a man can keep in closer touch with all the activities of the legislature than a busy legislator can. And there is no doubt of Detrick's political ideals. There is not a cleaner man in politics in California today. He is a thoroughly progressive Republican, and would make an ideal member of the assembly, where he could always be counted on to know the right side of things and to stand on it to the last gun.

Harmony in the Thirty-ninth The thirty-ninth assembly district, in San Francisco, has an Independent Republican club that usually carries the district elections. That club has an unwritten motto which says, in substance, "Fight as much as you please in this club, but present a united front at election day." Once again the motto has been justified. E. J. Callan, who represented the district in the assembly at the last legislature—and made one of the best records in it—is a candidate for state senator from the twenty-second senatorial district, which

NEEDED CHANGES IN THE CHARTER

NOW UNDER DISCUSSION IN THE MERCHANTS' ASSOCIATION AND ELSEWHERE IN SAN FRANCISCO

By ALLEN G. WRIGHT

One of the very important amendments necessary to the charter is that providing for ten-year local street assessment bonds. This amendment has the support of the Merchants' Association, and is to be actively urged by it for adoption at the election next fall.

In brief outline this amendment provides that assessments for street improvements, street openings and street grading on change of grade, may be paid in installments running over a term of years at the option of the owner of the property assessed, when the supervisors so provide. The amendment in the main follows the state laws providing for such bonds to represent street assessments, but as the state law has no application to San Francisco, it is necessary to amend the charter to give the people of San Francisco the benefit of such a scheme. The bonds cannot run for more than ten years nor bear interest in excess of 7 per cent. per annum. An effort has been made to make the bonds saleable by requiring the property owner who desires bonds to issue against his assessment to waive in writing any objection growing out of technicalities or irregularities in the proceedings leading up to the bond issue and to agree that the bonds issued shall constitute a valid lien upon his property. The desirability of such an amendment must be apparent. The cost of street assessments is often so high as either to be prohibitive or put a great burden on the small property owner. And yet the small property owner needs and desires street improvements as much as his wealthier and more fortunate neighbor. In the outlying districts the cost of street improvements alone has doubtless stood in the way of many improvements that otherwise would have been made. This amendment dividing the street assessments into a number of annual installments and thus spreading out the cost over a term of years will make possible many improvements now beyond the reach of small property owners. And instead of opposing street work, under this amendment, it is confidently believed that street improvements will be stimulated and encouraged by the property owners themselves. They will be glad to add to the value of their property and the convenience of its use so long as a way is provided enabling them to meet the cost on the installment plan. I have not space to give the details of this amendment, which will occupy eighteen pages of the charter. The complete text of this amendment with a full synopsis has been prepared in pamphlet form by the Merchants' Association and any one desiring a copy will be gladly furnished with one at the office of the association.

Tunnel Construction By Assessment.

Perhaps one of the most important steps that can be taken for the advancement and improvement of San Francisco, is the construction of tunnels under some of our hills. With them, the various districts now populated or available for population can be connected with the heart of the city over lines that will be direct and afford facilities for rapid transit. The cost of these tunnels cannot be met from the annual revenues of the city. They must be raised, therefore, either by bond issues or by assessments levied upon the property benefited by the tunnel construction. In some aspects of the case tunnel construction would appear to be of so much value to the city as a whole that the more equitable way to defray the costs would seem to be by a bond issue, which taxes all property in the city. On the other hand, however, tunnel construction in certain sections might be regarded by the people of other sections of the city as of more particularly local than general benefit. However shortsighted such a view might be it would probably be reflected in the election returns on any bond election for the construction of such a tunnel. And then, too, there is some merit in the contention that tunnel construction does benefit the property immediately adjacent in greater proportion than benefits are derived to property more remote. So that from the practical point of view as well as from the point of view of economic justice as it will operate in certain cases, some procedure should exist whereby the cost of such tunnels can be raised by assessing the property therefor which is benefited thereby, just as property is now assessed for street work on unaccepted streets. The assessment district in the case of tunnel construction of course would be much larger than in the case of ordinary street improvements. After a careful study of the charter it would appear that the cost of tunnel construction cannot be raised by assessments levied upon property. I understand that an attorney in this city by an ingenious construction which he gives to certain sections of the charter providing for an assessment district upon the change of the official grades of streets, has reached the conclusion that even as the charter now reads the cost of tunnel construction can be raised by the assessment plan—and he may be right. But in a matter so important to the welfare and development of the city as the construction of tunnels, all proper ways of accomplishment should be freed of obstacles in advance. And it is the intention of the Merchants' Association to prepare a charter amendment (which need consist of only a few brief lines) that will definitely dispel any doubt as to the power of the city to construct tunnels and defray the cost out of assessments on the real property benefited. Such an amendment, if adopted this fall, could be ratified by the legislature next January, so that by this time next year the work of tunnel construction could be started on any plan that might seem best.

Special Tax for Garbage Disposal

For the purpose of limiting the tax rate our charter contains a provision limiting the taxes that can be assessed for city and county purposes to one dollar for every one hundred dollars of assessed valuation. But this limitation has a string to it. Taxes in excess of one dollar can be levied to pay the interest and maintain the sinking funds of the city's bonded indebtedness and to a limited amount to pay the cost of maintaining and improving the parks, squares, and public grounds of the city. And in case of great necessity or emergency the board of supervisors by a unanimous vote and with the approval of the mayor may suspend the dollar limit to provide for such necessity or emergency. It is now proposed to add another string to the dollar limit, allowing an additional tax of a few cents upon each hundred dollars of assessed valuation, to provide for the maintenance and improvement of garbage incinerators and the collection and disposal of all garbage and refuse at the city's expense. The percentage remains to be determined by estimates to be made. Such a tax ought not to be objected to, as it will relieve the property owner from paying, as he now does, for the removal of his garbage. Under the plan of garbage removal now in operation, the garbage man removes garbage from the property of the householder at a fixed charge, and is supposed to deliver it to the garbage incinerator for destruction. But as he has to pay for this destruction, it is money in his pocket for him to dump his collection of disease spreading refuse on vacant lots, especially when the owners pay him for the service, as they sometimes do where land is to be filled in. The only way to prevent such an unhealthful disposition of garbage is for the city to collect and destroy the garbage itself, and instead of charging a householder for the service, it is thought best that the city pay the cost out of funds derived from a special tax that will be devoted exclusively to such a purpose. The advantage of a special tax is that it can only be used for the specific purpose, and so funds for that purpose will always be available. The necessity of making this special tax an addition to the dollar limit is due to the fact that the general taxes raised under the dollar limit are no more than are necessary to meet the general existing expenses of the city government. And the value of removing garbage at the city's expense is that all garbage will then be destroyed and there will be no inducement to the householder to economize on the amount of garbage he delivers up for removal.

Increase of Police Force

The charter now limits the police force to one for every five hundred inhabitants. The present force consists of seven hundred and forty-eight men, which is the limit on the basis of a population of three hundred and seventy-four thousand. It is clear that our police force has not reached the limit which the charter permits, but it is probably not so very far from it. If our city were congested into a small space, one police officer for every five hundred population might be sufficient. But our city is spread out over a broad field. The result is that the regular beat of many a police officer covers a territory that it is impossible for one man to patrol properly. And in this connection in estimating the police force necessary it must be taken into consideration that each officer is entitled to some part of each day for meals, for rest and for recreation. If the charter be amended by allowing the police force to be increased to one officer for each four hundred and fifty population this would permit the increasing of the force to one thousand men on the basis of a population of four hundred and fifty thousand. These figures, of course, are only tentative and on a more careful and thorough investigation may have to be revised. But the necessity of the increase of our police force remains, if such outbreaks of crime and lawlessness are to be suppressed, as, particularly in the form of highway robbery and accompanying assault, have so recently disgraced our city. And to the increase of the police force to a point of efficiency, an amendment of the charter along the lines suggested is doubtless necessary.

Uniform System of Public Accounts

Another amendment to the charter which must bear fruitful results is one requiring all the officers of the city and county government to keep their books upon a uniform or some system of accounting, so that intelligent comparisons can be made of the fiscal conditions of the various departments. The details of such an amendment, and indeed its general outline, is one which our friends, the public accountants, are best qualified to supply, and I understand that some of our best-known public accountants have been requested by the Merchants' Association to prepare such amendments as may be necessary.

So far, I imagine, the suggestions made are not likely to develop any decided opposition or adverse criticism. But the further suggestions which are to be offered to you, while not new in the sense that they have never been tried anywhere, may at first, at least to the more conservative, appear radical. Perhaps here or there a detail may be objectionable or seem inadvisable or susceptible of improvement, but in the main the suggestions may contain a principle for the solution of some of our difficulties. If there is any merit in the principle the detail of its application can be modified as may seem best.

Factors Affecting City Government

We are probably all aware that throughout America our municipal governments are, if not yet a failure, at least usually inefficient, often incompetent, and frequently dishonest, and this without regard to the political party in control. And perhaps some of the causes may be found in these three factors:

First: The practice of having too many elective officers;

Second: The framework of the city government itself, which is on political instead of business lines; and

Third: The relation between the city government and public service corporations, with the attendant friction.

Will the elimination of these factors or any of them in any way relieve the situation?

Reduction in Number of Elective Officers

At the last municipal election we elected a mayor, 18 supervisors, an auditor, a treasurer, a tax collector, a coroner, a recorder, a city attorney, a district attorney, a public administrator, a county clerk, a sheriff, and two police court judges, or 31 officials in all. Multiply this number by the number of parties in the field, and have you any right to expect intelligent selection? The cause of wonder is rather that sometimes the system works as well as it does. Suppose, instead, that we had a mayor elected every four years, a board of supervisors reduced to six members, two of whom were elected every two years, but holding office for six years, and so classified that only one-third of the board changed every two years, and a district attorney and a city attorney elected every four years whose terms of office, however, did not coincide with that of the mayor; and that the other officers now elected were appointed by the mayor with the consent of four out of the six supervisors. Then as now we should have a municipal election every two years, but at one election we should elect a mayor and two supervisors, and at the following election a district attorney, a city attorney and two supervisors. Instead of 31 candidates to be selected at the primaries and at the following election, we should have three and at most four names to select. The other officers now elected could be appointed for four-year terms, but originally so classified that one-half would have their terms expiring every second year. The principal officers of the city government, the mayor, the supervisors, the district attorney and the city attorney would still be elected by the people. The other officers who would be appointed are, with the exception of the police court judges, purely administrative officers. Such a plan, commonly called the short ballot, would eliminate the first factor referred to, the presence on the municipal ballot of too many elective officers. So far as a six-year term for the supervisors is concerned, it would require an amendment of the section of the constitution, which limits the term of all officers to four years where the constitution does not otherwise provide. The 1906 amendment of this section of the constitution is hardly broad enough to cover the plan proposed.

Supervisors to Give Entire Time to the City

To meet the second factor and put the government on a business basis, the charter might be amended by requiring the supervisors to devote their entire time to the city, and by obliging them to supervise the various departments of the city government in an active and thorough manner, and by increasing their compensation for this increased service, raising their salaries from one hundred dollars to at least five hundred dollars per month. The increase in cost over our present system would be only $1,200 per month. The board of supervisors by reason of their control of the purse strings and the appropriations can prove themselves valuable and efficient guardians of the various departments of the city government, and given the time for investigation they would be in possession of the necessary knowledge. It is too much to expect a man's entire time in the city's service on a salary of one hundred dollars per month. Furthermore, the management of the city's affairs is more a matter of business than of legislation and a small board would be more effective than a large one.

Non-Partisan Elections; Direct Nominations

Two further steps which might be taken that would tend to eliminate partisan politics from the city government would be to provide for non-partisan elections and for what is termed the direct nomination plan. The authority to do this in a city charter is conferred by the state constitution, which expressly permits a charter for a consolidated city and county government to provide for the manner in which and the times at which the county officers shall be elected or appointed, and of course properly permits the charter to provide along the same lines with reference to what might be called strictly municipal officers. In providing for non-partisan elections the rule could be laid down that neither at a primary election nor at a general municipal election following, could the name of any candidate for office be tagged with a party designation. This would be a very important step of progress. The difference between the policies of national parties has nothing to do with municipal affairs, save and except as through patronage opportunities are afforded for building up a political machine. And as the hope of municipal government lies in the development of a spirit of efficiency in its public service which is necessarily and thoroughly incompatible with the principle of political patronage, the divorce between national parties and municipal elections must be complete.

The direct nomination plan is worked out as follows: at the primary election names of candidates for various offices are presented on the primary election ballot provided nomination petitions nominating the candidate have been signed by a certain number or percentage of the registered voters. Under each office on the primary ballot would appear the names of the candidates for that office. In case there is but one person to be elected to the office, the candidate receiving a majority of the votes cast for all the candidates for that office would be declared elected. In case there are two or more persons to be elected to an office, as that of the supervisors, then those candidates equal in number to the number to be elected who received the highest number of votes for such office would be declared elected. It is usual to provide, however, that no person shall be declared elected to any office at the first election unless he has received more than one-half the number of ballots cast at the election. In the event that at the first election, the election is not complete, then a second election is held to fill the offices not disposed of at the first election. The plan is that at the second election there be only two candidates for an office, and the two candidates are those who received the highest votes at the first election. Thus in San Francisco if we were electing only two supervisors and no one received one-half of the vote at the first election, the four candidates receiving the highest votes at the first

MARY opened the mail for the great firm of Burkes & Cameron, dealers in druggists' sundries. Mary sat all day in a cage made of wire netting and roofed with the same material, locked in with a door and a spring lock, and opened the leathern sacks of "U. S. Mail" that were brought to her hourly by the office boys. Rapidly she sorted the personal mail from the general, swiftly she ripped open the letters, and deftly she extracted the checks, bills, orders, currency and complaints, sorting them into baskets for the cashier and the department heads and "the firm." Overhead, even on the brightest days, glowed the shaded yellow electric lights, for Mary's cage was in the center of the second floor of Burkes & Cameron's eight-story building, and little enough light ever penetrated so far in from Broadway. Mary's eyes were shaded by a piece of cardboard bound around her temples with thread. Mary's sleeves were protected by removable calico "cuffs." Mary's once full and rosy cheeks were getting a bit hollowed out and rather pale from several years' work under those unlively incandescent globes. Mary's figure was still as well moulded as ever, and her face retained its interest. It never was pretty, but it still was charming—in spite of its loss of color and the deepening shadows below the eyes.

Mary worked from half-past eight in the morning until six at night. She had two assistants, one a cherubic little Irish girl who had never lost her convent manner of complete and submissive innocence, the other a rather "fresh" and very callow youth who owed his job to his father's acquaintance with a member of "the firm." This young man had tried some of his guileful arts, which he learned at midnight revels in forbidden cafes where he was told he was "real devilish," on both the young ladies with whom he worked. These blandishments had rebounded from the Irish cherub in the dazed incomprehension and security of ignorant innocence, and from Mary with one fiery tongue lashing that he never forgot and that taught him some new ideas about his own peculiar charms.

But Mary was responsible for the work of both the cherub and the youth. Every day a stream of money flowed through her nimble fingers, thousands of dollars of real money, which paid the salaries of five hundred employees and the rather liberal dividends which "the firm" complacently declared every three months. Mary had often thought of things that even one hour's toll of that mail would buy. No wonder she should, for Mary lived in a hall bedroom, six feet by ten, an hour's walk from the office, and Mary received for her skilful and faithful handling of these great sums of money a weekly pay envelope containing one five-dollar bill and one two-dollar bill.

Now, seven dollars a week does not go very far in New York, as anyone who has ever tried it knows. Mary spent five of it on the hall bedroom and two meals in her cheap boarding house, and out of the other two dollars she bought those simple dresses and very plain, heavy shoes and more than plain hats with which she covered her person and, on occasions of violent extravagance, a ribbon or two to adorn that person withal. We forgot to mention that she also bought her luncheons out of the two dollars.

The reader may guess that Mary's trips to Coney Island were few and her visits to the theater fewer. And that Mary did most of her own washing—the landlady kindly lent her the use of tubs in the basement—after she had walked the two miles and something over every evening from the office to save carfare.

So Mary was entitled to her golden dreams of the things that one hour's toll of the mail would buy. The Irish cherub was one of a family in moderate circumstances, and she worked so she could buy the pleasures that those circumstances would have denied. The callow youth got a monthly check from "the old man," and daily regaled the cage with tales of the musical comedy stars he had seen the night before, and the "peaches" that hung in the chorus. Hence some, at least, of Mary's golden dreams, for she had neither family nor "old man," and she grimly resolved to stay straight and wait for—

There was the real glory of the dream. Mary had a romance. To be sure, he was a drygoods clerk in Harlem, and he had yet to reach the height or salary of a floor walker, but he was a real, live man, and he had whispered in Mary's ears the olden story that lifted seven dollars a week and the straight and narrow path into a first-class fare on the railroad to the land of dreams. The coveted station at the end of the line seemed in sight, too, for the next promotion of the drygoods clerk would make him able to ask Mary to set the day, and distressing symptoms of tuberculosis in the department head above him seemed to promise that promotion soon.

But this morning a cloud obscured the dream. An office boy handed Mary a memorandum from the head of the firm, signed with the magic initials, E. F. B., which read:

"Please see me at 10:30 this morning in my office."

"That means the carpet for you," grinned the callow youth, as Mary read the note half aloud.

"Carpet nothing!" rejoined Mary, but her heart beat faster at the thought of facing the "big chief" in his private office, whither clerks like herself were rarely summoned except to explain some dereliction of duty. She had no idea of the meaning of this call for her appearance, and she nervously watched the clock as the moment appointed drew near. At 10:25 she slipped down to Mr. Burkes' secretary and asked if she was to be admitted.

"Yes," he replied, and she noticed he looked at her with an odd expression. "You're to go right in, and he'll be in in a minute."

Mary entered the door to the private office, which he held open, and her heart sunk as it closed behind her and left her alone in its quiet luxuriousness. The heavy mahogany furniture, the choice pictures on the walls, the thick rugs deadening the sound of footsteps and the double windows shutting out the roar of the street, put upon her the spell of their suggestion of power and aloofness. She was afraid to sit down, so she stood uncomfortably in the center of the room, waiting for the head of the house.

A moment later the door from the private office of the treasurer, adjoining the president's, was opened, and the senior member of the firm entered, followed by his four associate members, all with faces very grave. Each in turn nodded mechanically to Mary. The president strode behind his desk, faced her and said, "Be seated." Mary found a chair and sank into it, only to straighten up instantly and slide forward to the edge of the seat, where she sat bolt upright. Mr. Burkes frowned as he drew from the top drawer of his desk a pile of opened letters and ran his eye over them.

"Miss Martin," he said slowly, "we have been receiving an extraordinary number of complaints lately. Perhaps you had noticed it."

"No, sir; I hadn't, but then I never pay any attention to the letters except to see what file they belong in."

"Well, we have," continued the president. "We have, and we have noticed a painful sameness in the character of the complaints. Please run your eyes over a few of these and you will see what I mean."

Mary stepped forward and took the letters from the president's hand and returned to her seat on the edge of the chair. She felt five pairs of critical eyes upon her, and her hands trembled as she turned from sheet to sheet of the papers. As she read, the consciousness of a horrible suspicion sent her cheeks first blazing red, then cold and white as marble. Every letter was to the same effect, a bitter protest against the receipt of dunning bills for small amounts and sarcastic comments on the cashier's system of keeping track of money received in currency for small items of sundries. The tears blinded Mary's eyes as she handed back the letters, and her voice was unsteady as she said:

"They are all alike, but I can't understand what has happened that their money should be missing."

The five pairs of eyes glittered more intently upon her. The president spoke.

"We hoped, Miss Martin, that you did not understand, but we have checked up all these cases and the letters containing those sums of currency never came out of the mail cage."

The suspicion became a horrible interrogation, and with such suddenness that it stunned her. She gasped for an instant, and then, by a mighty effort of will, she drove back the tears and steadied her voice, though it sounded strangely dry and harsh and distant to her own ears. She rose from the chair and clung to the back of it with her right hand as she spoke:

"You think I took that money, do you? Took it during the last four months? Me! Oh! How could you!"

The "Oh!" burst from her lips in a guttural cry of scorn and despairing indignation. Her manner changed suddenly. She laughed harshly.

"Me! You, who sit at ease in upholstered chairs and ride home at night in automobiles and spend the evening at the opera, you think I, on my seven dollars a week, in my hall bedroom, have been stealing picayune two-dollar bills from your mail. Ha! ha! Look, you, look at those shoes—clogs, rather. Do you suppose I'd be wearing those if I had any of your money to buy better with. Look at the dress, three years old, and the patches under the elbows. Would I buy patches if I had your money?"

"Money? Look at me. I'm not such a bad figure, I'm not so old. Do you think I'm blind that I don't see girls older and uglier, that get no more salary than you gentlemen pay me, who wear silks and fine stockings and patent leather shoes? Do you suppose I don't know what they sell to buy those things? Do you think I haven't had chances to do what they do? Do you suppose I'd live in a hall bedroom and walk to it two miles every night if I was the sort that wanted money bad enough to get it by bad ways?"

"You gentlemen are fools. Excuse me, but it's true. You know about as much about human nature as a donkey at pasture. It's easy for you to throw this suspicion on me, who handle your thousands for seven dollars a week—seven dollars a week in New York, God of mercy, it's a wonder I haven't taken some, more than you have lost."

"But you look here. I didn't take it, not a cent of it, nor I don't know who did. You find that out, that's your business. And meantime you put a detective on me, have him follow me every hour of the day. Only you're going to leave me at my job and you're going to find out who took that money, and then you're going to apologize to me and my seven dollars a week, and then—and then, I'm going to let you find somebody to take my job and my princely salary, but not till then. I don't get out under fire."

The president had risen and strove to interrupt her, but she had hurtled on to the end of her speech. When she had finished she turned to go. The treasurer sat nearest the door. He rose to intercept her. She looked at him with a light in her eyes he had once seen at home, and spoke swiftly:

"Open that door, sir!"

He opened it and bowed as she passed out. Mary fled to the dressing room, from which she emerged an hour later with red eyes and a flushed face, but a mouth drawn in grimly straight lines. The callow youth tried some chaffing that was quickly suppressed, and the cherub some consolation that Mary endured in stony silence.

"Of course," the president said, "we'll have to call in the postal inspectors. I thought she'd confess, but they will get the evidence, all right. They're very efficient."

Walking home to her boarding house that night Mary felt subconsciously the presence near behind her of a shadowy figure. When she turned out the gas, after a supperless evening spent in her room, she raised the window blind at the foot of her bed, and made out a snow-covered man standing like a statue on the curb of the opposite walk. She lay down and tossed till past midnight, and dreamed nightmares till the gray of the morning.

For three months she stolidly went to her work. There was no comment at the office, no more interviews. She was silent now at her desk, the mouth drawn as grimly as ever. The youth was subdued and the cherub was frightened and quiet.

One morning Mary opened the cage and found only the cherub within it. At ten o'clock the callow youth was still absent. At eleven an office boy handed Mary a note, signed E. F. B. It ordered her to report at his office at once. Mary obeyed, with a heart full of bitterness. The president's secretary opened the door, with a look even odder, and Mary faced the same five pairs of eyes, and three other pairs. Two men in officers' uniforms stood at the sides of a chair, in which sat the callow youth, the debonnaire smile gone from his lips and the gleam from his eyes. The president spoke:

"Miss Martin, I have sent for you to make my apologies in the presence of these gentlemen. I have here on my desk the report of the Pinkerton bureau, whose agent has been shadowing you for three months. It completely exonerates you. These men here are postal inspectors. Their report is the same. They have, however, a different report on this young gentleman, who has shamefully abused my confidence and the honor of his family. They have absolute proof of his guilt, through marked money just found on his person. He has confessed to embezzlements extending over a year. As I said, I wish to apologize to you, and to praise your fidelity, and to beg you to reconsider your threat to leave our employ. I should feel that we had lost a most valuable service if you should leave us."

Mary's eyes burned, and she paused to control her emotions. Then she spoke, slowly and in a low tone.

"I accept your apology, sir. And I shall stay with the firm, because—because, sir, I must."

The president spoke heartily:

"That's good. And I have instructed the cashier to make a change in the weekly envelope, Miss Martin—just to show our appreciation of faithful service."

"Thank you," murmured Mary, and slipped quickly from the room. Again she fled to the dressing room, and there, for the tenth time since she had received it, she read a note that the morning's mail had brought her.

"My Dear Miss Martin: I feel that your persistent refusal to take me into your confidence during the past three months is an indication that your regard for me is not what I had supposed, and I therefore return to you, under separate cover, a package of letters, and wish you to release me from a relation which has evidently become burdensome to you."

"Yours very truly,"

"ALFRED HOYT"

That night—it was Saturday—Mary walked home more slowly than usual. She had mechanically opened the envelope that the cashier had handed her, and thrust the money, uncounted, into her purse. On the street she had bethought her to count it. The familiar five-dollar bill, the familiar two-dollar bill, and—a one-dollar bill.

She replaced them in her purse, and trudged on. The cafes were lighted, the street lamps and the store fronts glowed. A restaurant door opened, and the sounds of music from a stringed orchestra, and the laughter of the diners, floated out pleasantly to her ears. The glimpse of women in costly gowns and mountainous hats, of the wealth of color and the sparkle of glass, gleamed on her eyes. A strange man passed her, turned and lifted his opera hat:

"Why, good evening. Isn't this Miss—Miss—oh, Miss Anything will do, won't it?"

Mary looked at him and a sudden surge of emotion swept over her. He was not evil-looking, there was indeed a touch of boyish good humor and frankness in his face, he was handsome and well groomed. Her hand went out to his and she smiled as one dazed. Her voice sounded strange and far away as she answered:

"Good evening, Mr.—Mr.—"

"Oh, Mr. Someone's enough. Will you take my arm? Here's a carriage."

"Why, yes, thank you, I—I—Oh!" and Mary's hand fell at her side, and she turned and ran through the snow and was lost in the hurrying crowd.

"That's odd," commented the man, and he turned again to the driver. "Never mind, I made a mistake," he said, and slipped him a quarter.

Mary, alone on the bed in her room, sobbed through the sleepless night. At his club, the president of Burkes & Cameron told of the day with a touch of compassion.

"But I squared it for the girl the only way we could. I gave her a very substantial increase in salary."

Which he raised to nine dollars a week two years after.

election would be candidates for the two supervisorships at the second election.

This is the plan at present in force in Berkeley, and a plan somewhat similar is in use at Richmond, Los Angeles and Alameda have provisions in their charters providing for non-partisan elections by prohibiting all party designations on election ballots. The advantage of the direct nomination plan is that frequently the entire election would be concluded at the first or primary election, and no necessity would exist for holding the second election. Furthermore, this is but a logical development of the principle of direct primary. If the direct primary is to be a success at all and given a proper test, every encouragement and inducement must be offered to get out a large and representative vote at the primaries. Any plan is desirable therefore which, like that providing for direct nominations, makes it a matter of inducement to the voter to come out and vote at the first election. And the inducement is that the first election may settle the whole question and relieve him from the necessity of voting again that year.

Department of Health Out of Politics

If there is any department of the city government which ought to be freed from politics and the evils of political patronage, it is the department of public health. It has therefore been suggested that the present charter provisions on the subject be repealed and that the entire health affairs of the city, including the management and control of the city and county hospitals, almshouses, ambulance service, municipal hospitals and receiving hospitals be vested in a board of say eight members chosen, one each by such organization in the city as, for example:

- 1—Associated Charities.
- 2—The Archbishop of the Diocese of S. F.
- 3—The Hebrew Benevolent Society.
- 4—The Labor Council.
- 5—The Building Trades Council.
- 6—The Merchants' Association.
- 7—The Commonwealth Club.
- 8—The California Club.

Should any of these organizations fail to act the vacancy can be filled by appointment by the board of supervisors.

The board so organized shall so classify themselves that three go out of office at the end of six years, two at the end of seven years, and three at the end of eight years. All vacancies on the board are to be filled by the board itself, whether the vacancy occurs by death, resignation, expiration of term of office or other cause. The members of the board shall serve without compensation and must be residents of the city. The only restriction upon the filling of vacancies is that at no time shall there be upon the board more than two members whose consecutive service exceeds eight years. Thus while the board is a self-perpetuating body, its personnel must slowly change. If this be thought too extreme, an alternative is suggested which would leave the present board of health constituted as it is now, and remove from its jurisdiction only the management and control of the city and county hospital, almshouse, ambulance service, municipal hospitals and receiving hospitals, and vest the management of these institutions in a department of hospitals to be governed by a board selected in the manner and perpetuating itself after the fashion already outlined. In behalf of these changes in the charter the California Club did good service in the fall of 1907, but the opposition developed to the plan in the board of supervisors at that time seemed to proceed on the theory that this form of appointment by designated organizations was contrary to our spirit of government, though the utmost confidence was expressed in the organizations designated for the exercise of the original power of appointment. The objection that the power of appointment is contrary to our law is disposed of by our supreme court in a recent case where the court sustained an act providing for a state board of examiners whose members should be selected by designated medical societies and vested with the power to examine applicants and issue certificates of authority to practice medicine. To vest in such a board the power to regulate and control the right to follow a special calling is to give to the board a fair share of the sovereign power of the state. And yet the supreme court by a unanimous decision after a hearing in bank (Ex parte Gerino, 143 Cal. 412) approved the manner of the appointment of the board vested with such important powers. These proposed changes in the charter affecting the department of public health are therefore not open to the objections urged by the supervisors in 1907 and are worthy of your careful consideration.

Rate Fixing of Public Service Corporations

To eliminate the third factor and remove the friction between the city government and the public service corporations presents a more difficult problem in whose solution a more varied programme must be offered. The suggestions offered, like many of the others, are only tentative, and made with the idea of starting a line of thought that may perhaps bring beneficial results.

The necessity of regulating and controlling public service corporations is too apparent to admit of discussion. And as one of the features of control, the regulation of rates is the one that gives rise to the greatest friction, and for very good reason. If the corporations are inclined to overreach themselves on one side, the people on the other side are almost as greedy. And if the solution of such a strife is left to a board of officers, elected for short terms, poorly compensated, not properly equipped with the means of making that fair, temperate and intelligent investigation of fact necessary to an impartial decision, and frequently pledged and improperly prejudiced in advance by party platforms or pre-election promises to a definite and maybe confiscatory rate, how can we expect anything but friction? What would we think of the election of a judge who was pledged in advance to decide a case in a pre-determined way, then pending before the court whose judicial robes the candidate aspired to wear. If the American spirit of fair play has not been entirely swamped, we would not tolerate a judicial election on such a basis. And yet the determination of the rates that a public service corporation may charge is a judicial function, involving as it does a careful investigation of facts, the weighing of evidence and the rendition of a decision supposed to be fair, impartial and free from bias or prejudice. This is no task for a local board of supervisors. They never have the time and seldom have the temperament for such a function. The rate fixing power should be taken from the supervisors. Such a function vested in such a local tribunal, primarily organized for totally different and almost inconsistent functions has not proved a success in any municipality. The rates fixed are either too low and are then followed by long and tedious litigation which is a source of heavy expense and serious annoyance to both city and company, or they are too high, in which case the company unjustly profits and the city undeservedly suffers. The happy mean seems impossible of accomplishment in a board lacking time, facility and temperament for a judicial investigation.

But the rates must be fixed. Otherwise the public service corporations will be tempted to charge rates that will yield interest on what has been rather happily termed capitalized hope.

Public Service Commission

One solution of this vexing question has been adopted with apparent success in New York by the establishment of the public service commissions. For the purpose of this law the state is divided into two districts, the first embracing the boroughs of Manhattan, Kings, Queens and Richmond, and the second all the other counties of the state. The jurisdiction of each commission extends over railroads, street railroads, common carriers and companies manufacturing, selling or distributing gas or electricity for lighting, heating or power purposes. Water companies are probably omitted because water supply in New York is a matter of municipal ownership in that state so far as it is an important matter. The powers are those of general regulation and control, including an authority over rates. The success of such a plan depends entirely upon the personnel of the commission. Subject to a power of removal in proper cases, the commissioners should hold office for comparatively long terms, the individuals going out of office at different times so that the state might have the benefit of their accumulated experience, and the commissioners should rather be appointed than elected. An officer with such powers is useful only if he have the proper technical skill and ability, and should be selected more with the idea of the service he may render the state than with the view of conferring a good salary upon some popular favorite. The establishment of such a commission could only be provided after an amendment to the constitution, and an appropriate constitutional amendment could be presented to the legislature convening next January. This amendment would come before the people of the state for their ratification in the fall election of 1912. And the appointment of such a commission could immediately follow a favorable vote of the people. But the success of such a plan will always depend upon the personnel of the commission.

Automatic Rate Fixing

To escape the personal equation, if that be thought proper, another plan is suggested. And, as this, too, will require an amendment of the constitution, the plan will only be outlined in brief. Let a maximum rate per unit of service be established in the charter. Within this limit permit the company to fix its own rate, but as a check on this require the company to pay the city a fixed percentage of its income arranged on a sliding scale, that is, lowering the percentage to be paid to the city as the company lowers its rate to the consumer per unit of service. If the fixed percentage that the company is to pay is based on its gross annual income, there is an advantage in that the gross income can always be easily determined. If the fixed percentage that the company is to pay is based on its net income, it may be a matter of considerable difficulty to arrive at the net income properly. The latter plan in its general outlines, however, is the one now in use between Boston and its gas company. If the charter defined the manner in which net income was to be determined somewhat after the manner in which the federal corporation tax law determines it, a practical solution might be reached. The federal corporation tax law in this regard, however, is far from perfect, but that merely involves a matter of detail, which with careful study might be satisfactorily worked out.

Purchase of Plant at Expiration of Franchise

Such public service corporations as have franchises that run for limited periods are apt to allow their plants to depreciate to the detriment of the public service as the time draws near for the expiration of their franchises. But it is but natural that public service corporations should be just as human in such a matter as the rest of mankind, which is not very prone to spend money upon which it sees no fair prospect of an adequate return. An inducement might be held out to such companies to keep up their plants to a high state of efficiency by a provision in the law, which would work injury to no one, providing that upon the expiration of their franchises the city must do one of three things:

1. Sell a renewal of the franchise to the highest bidder, who if other than the original company must agree to buy the plant of the former company at a fair valuation to be fixed by appraisers, or

2. Lease a renewal of the franchise upon the same terms, or

3. The city should operate the expired franchise itself and buy the plant of the old company at a valuation similarly determined.

With such a provision in the law, the city might be properly authorized to compel the company to keep and maintain its plant at a high state of efficiency and improve it from time to time with the most modern appliances.

Conclusion

The solution of the difficulties arising out of the relations existing between municipalities and public service corporations is one of the most important political questions. If the suggestions made are of any service, your patient attention to this long paper may have been worth while. I regret that lack of time to prepare for you as fully as I could wish and lack of opportunity for that careful consideration which the subject demands, has made it impossible to incorporate more detail into these suggestions. As they stand they are far from being perfect or complete, but they are submitted in the hope that they may form the basis at least of something practical.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

comprises the thirty-ninth and fortieth assembly districts. E. T. McMurray, who has heretofore been a Callan supporter, suddenly appeared against him as a rival candidate. The fur flew and the air was full of charges of bad faith. The fortieth, meanwhile, endorsed Callan. Then the thirty-ninth club met and the excitement is indicated by the fact that Burrill G. White, McMurray's sponsor, got a black eye. The vote sustained Callan. Now for the motto: White is supporting Callan, everybody else is supporting Callan, McMurray will not oppose him. The majority rule idea works in the thirty-ninth. And, without prejudice to the virtues of the retired candidate, McMurray, Callan is one of the best possible men in California for the state senate. He has been through the mill once and has come out with a clean record.

Nominations for Assemblyman in 39th

The nomination for assemblyman from the thirty-ninth, left vacant by Callan's race for the senate, is being sought in the Independent Republican club by J. E. White, Alex. Russell, and Arthur Kennedy. They are all good men. The gossip of the club is to the effect that, as the senatorship has gone to the part of the district lying north of the park, it seems likely that the assemblyman will be chosen from the southern end. If this comes true it will eliminate Kennedy, for purely strategic reasons. Of the other two, White seems to have a little the better chance, if gossip can be trusted.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't. —

The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street, running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.

{Seal of Superior Court}

H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.

Memoranda.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:

The City and County of San Francisco, whose address is at the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Who May Vote at the Primary

Any person qualified to vote at a general election has a right to vote at a direct primary election, if there is any political party in the field with which he can affiliate, a question for each voter to settle with his own conscience. It becomes necessary, then, to ascertain who has a right to vote at a general election.

The fundamental authority for voting is the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside, and

"No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, also

"The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color or previous condition of servitude."

The authority next in rank to deal with this subject is the Constitution of California, which confers the right of suffrage, within the above limitations, only upon those who are:

1. Native born citizens of the United States.
2. Male persons who shall have acquired the right of citizenship in the United States by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro.

3. Male, naturalized citizens of the United States who shall have been naturalized ninety days prior to any election.

But there are the following limitations upon the exercise of the right of suffrage on the part of all those who are protected by the constitutional guarantees above given, having been held as not inconsistent with such guarantees. They are:

1. They must be male citizens.
2. They must be twenty-one years of age or upward.

3. Must have resided in California for at least one year next preceding the date of election, in the county ninety days and in the precinct thirty.

4. One must be able to read the constitution of California in the English language and write his name, unless he was a voter or was sixty years of age in 1894 when the educational qualification for voting was adopted.

5. One must not be a native of China, nor an idiot, nor insane, nor a person convicted of an infamous crime, or of misappropriation of public money.

If citizenship, as above set forth, has been gained it can not be lost by being absent while in the service of the United States; engaged in navigating the waters of the state, or of the United States or the high seas, nor while a resident at a university or seminary of learning, nor while kept in an almshouse, asylum or prison.

Finally, in order to be permitted to vote at any primary election the elector, otherwise qualified, must have caused his name to be placed on the great register of the county in which he resides at least twenty days prior to the holding of the primary election. The state primary election will be held this year August 16, and the last day upon which one may register to vote at that primary will be July 26. Good citizens should be willing to help their candidate friends prepare their nomination papers and therefore should register at once.

The burden of registration has been forced upon the state by scoundrelism. Before registration was required voters controlled by perfidious interests voted in as many precincts as they could reach on election day, and were often "colonized" in districts where elections were wanted to be carried for injurious purposes. The only remedy was to require each voter to register his full name, age, occupation, height, visible marks or scars, his place of birth, his place of residence, giving ward and precinct and, if in a municipality, his number and street. If the elector is not the head of a household, the fact must be disclosed. If he be a naturalized citizen he must give the place of his naturalization. The paper must contain the date of entry and the postoffice address of the elector; whether or not he is able to read the constitution in the English language and write his name; whether or not he has any physical disability that will prevent his marking his ballot.

The county clerk can not enter a name on the great register except:

1. By certified copy of judgment of a superior court.

2. If the applicant be a naturalized person, then upon presentation of the certificate of naturalization, or, if it has been lost, a proper affidavit covering all the facts, unless he has registered lawfully within the preceding eight years.

3. If born in a foreign country an affidavit showing that he was naturalized by the naturalization of his father.

4. If the elector is otherwise qualified, but is out of the county, he can fill out the registration blanks and acknowledge them before any one authorized to take such acknowledgment and forward the same to the county clerk, together with an affidavit showing that he will be unavoidably absent after the registration closes.

The affidavits and registration blanks, when properly filled out, sworn to and filed with the county clerk, constitute the great register of such county.

Reports from all over California indicate that the fruit crop in general probably will be exceptionally good.

By a majority vote of the citizens immediately interested in the proposition, the closer suburbs of Fresno will be annexed to that city.

Let Him Take Warning

WE SHALL ALL BE GLAD to have Theodore Roosevelt at home again safe and sound, and we shall all be curious to know what he will have to say about political conditions at home, but, fair warning, we shall not pay a particle of attention to what he says after the first outburst of disappointment is over, unless he comes out squarely for the destruction of the Aldrich oligarchy and the reestablishment of free government in house and senate, state and nation. This insurgent movement is bigger than the biggest man in the world.

Miserable Young Man

OF ALL MISERABLE YOUNG MEN there is none so miserable as one who, having at last found the woman he truly loves, and whom he would take to wife, is haunted with the fear that germs of malignant disease, contracted through licentious living, may sometime, without making themselves palpably manifest, be communicated to the being he loves above all others and, through her, to their children to be born blind, misshapen or tainted, a source of bitter sorrow through all their lives, or, mayhap, to bring her to the operating table under the surgeon's knife. In vain may he appeal to science for guaranty against such an eventuality. It does not lie within the province of science to give it. Except a brutish indifference forbend, flesh is not heir to a deeper misery than this.

Their Last Census

WHAT PATHOS IS THERE NOT in the announcement that the forthcoming census of California Indians will be the last taken under tribal relations, that henceforth these children of the forest and mountain, these wards of Uncle Sam, must take their places as individual citizens, to shift as they may, amenable to the laws, to live the white man's life or die the death of a race! A century hence some delver in the lore of this period, stumbling upon this announcement, will scan the horizon to see if perchance some vestige of Digger and Pitt River, Klamath and Tulare Indians yet remains to justify the termination of their racial minority, only to find that they have gone leaving not a wrack behind. The vices of the white man, together with the relentless-ness of his competition, will swallow them as remorselessly as if the earth had opened under their feet.

Call Out the Militia

IT MAY BE WELL ENOUGH to handle the high school frat issue with gloves, but let there be an iron hand under the glove. If there be no other way to secure immediate and unconditional compliance with the anti-frat law then call out the militia armed with paddles to move immediately upon sorority and fraternal works. If there be one lesson more than another that young America in general, and in California in particular, need to learn it is the lesson of obedience, a realizing sense of a power that transcends their own sweet wills. Whether the law driving youthful snobbery from secondary schools be good or bad is apart from the issue. To obey or not to obey is the question. It is the law.

The Dividing Line

HARRIS WEINSTOCK IS A PROPER PERSON to head the charter revision work in this city, but no charter can give San Francisco good government without good men in office, and good men cannot be elected to office in this city, or any other, without the votes of men who toil with their hands for a livelihood. Any line of division that puts all such men on one side of any issue will predetermine the fate of that issue. The only issue that can cut straight across divisions of kith and clan, fraternity and class, party and no party, is the issue of right and wrong, justice and injustice, to which all public issues are finally resolvable. That the reformed charter may give free play for this line of division is San Francisco's only hope for better government.

Kitchener

A GRIM, TACITURN, RELENTLESS MAN who swept like a tornado across the wide reaches of barbarism to make clean a way for the advance of a more beneficent civilization. He crushed the Mahdi, brought the Boer to his sober second thinking and, over the turbaned heads of the Hindus, he has hung the retributive power of thunderbolts. He has done all these things without malice and in the name of liberty regulated by law. A severe schoolmaster, his pupils learn their lessons well, and when he has once swept a field little children may safely frolic over it.

Mutual Forbearance

REPUBLICANS OF INDIANA, in convention assembled, forebore to say, "Payne-Aldrich," to the President, although they betrayed their insurgent sympathies without equivocation. The President is to reciprocate by refraining from saying anything, in Indiana, in defense of the existing tariff law. A better tariff schedule than any of its predecessors in fifty years, the Payne-Aldrich law is hated more heartily than any of them because the product of methods no longer tolerable, inspired by a spirit of atheistic materialism infidel to our new national spirit. It was of the old order. The old order had changed and the makers of that tariff, from President down, knew it not. That is the whole difficulty. As Indiana has spoken so say we all.

To Let

IN THE NEW YORK TIMES WE FIND an apartment house or, as it is there called, a "residential building," Alwyn Court, near Central Park, thus advertised: "The suites include fourteen rooms and five baths to thirty-four rooms and nine baths, yearly rentals from $6,500 upwards." No doubt these suites are comfortable. Their existence indicates prosperity, but not that wide and equitable distribution of the common wealth for which advocates of free institutions have vainly hoped. The demand for them is more a subject for regret than for envy, inasmuch as they give inspiration to that spirit of socialism that is spawned of luxury and nourished by ostentatious display.

Its Humble Housing

IF ANY FURTHER ARGUMENT WERE needed to justify the President's idea of a national incorporation law it should be supplied by the spectacle of the Southern Pacific of Kentucky housing its "principal place of business" in a $700 cottage in an unincorporated suburb of Louisville that it may command "full faith and credit" for its charter in all the states of the union, however much particular states may dislike the special privileges extended to the incorporation by Kentucky. If the rights of the states are to be invaded let it be by the nation and not by states, like Kentucky and New Jersey, that make bids for doing an incorporating business to the disadvantage of other states. Those laws which are national in their operation should be national in their origin.

Government by Brewery

Guy W. Eddie, city prosecutor at Los Angeles, lately stated that 150 Los Angeles saloons were under fast-binding contracts to breweries; that saloon men confessed to him that they were mulcted by the brewing interests at every election, but had no voice in the expenditure of the funds raised; that those of them who had manifested political independence had been informed by representatives from the breweries that they would be put out of business if they did not stand pat. Is it any wonder that Mr. Eddie declared this form of political power as being very real, and a menace to a democratic form of government? Yes, upon second thought, it is a wonder that he referred to it at all. Very few public prosecutors have the grit to face that power and tell the truth about it. And, be it remembered, this political power, so derived and so used, will at no time be used for the uplift of human society, the betterment of government, the reformation of the laws, the punishment of crime, the maintenance of free government. Always and ever it will have to be whipped to a standstill before any of these good things can be accomplished. It was for McCarthy and his "Paris of America" in the recent election in San Francisco, and it is for the nomination and election of Charles F. Curry to be governor of this state.

Those Hetch Hetchy Papers

So it was the President who had placed the ban of secrecy upon the reports of the government's engineers regarding Hetch Hetchy! Our lawyer President is giving us an administration that takes the lawyer's view of every proceeding as being a battle instead of an inquiry, a conflict in which it were a perfidy to suffer the enemy to know of the resources at command or the strategy to be employed. The Hetch Hetchy issue is one of fact and whoever knows one fact that bears upon that issue, either for or against, be he president or private citizen, is less than patriotic if he hesitates to divulge it, let it aid or hinder which party it may. The protuberance of secretiveness on the presidential cranium must have suffered an exaggerated development.

May Make Some Money

Theodore Roosevelt's income from the family fortune is said to be only about $8,000 a year, and he did not add to it materially while president. He may surprise the American public, when he gets home, by posting, "This is my busy day," on his front door at Oyster Bay, refusing all calls and devoting himself to writing his book on Africa and preparing lectures to be delivered, for pay, after the manner of William J. Bryan, letting politics severely alone. By this method he could scrape half a million or a million together, by way of making provision for his family, in a year or two and be on Easy street ever after. He may do it.

Stop That Fight

The brute in man will never be civilized out of him. If it ever is he will be a dead man. He will die of inanition. Nevertheless, there is no need that brutality be cultivated in order that the race may be perpetuated. The God who made us looked out for that from the beginning. When the end of the world comes the last man of the race will raise himself painfully upon his elbow, and with his latest breath, whisperingly inquire of the winds, "Which whipped?" There are in this world, and always will be, enough unavoidable conflicts to keep our pugnacity in trim. There is no need that men should be hired to maul each other in the sight of thousands in order that combativeness may be stimulated among the people, and that American youth may be led falsely to believe that the most puissant bruiser is the best man.

It is true that a waiting world wants to know which can whip, the white expert at fisticuffs or the black, the ivory or the ebony. Somewhere that issue will be tried. Were the return of Theodore Roosevelt to his native land timed for the same day, it would not create a ripple of interest. The sailing of another Dewey into a Manila bay, or the destruction of another Cervera fleet, would hardly be given a scare head in any American daily, and the newsboys would not cry the event in the streets of any city until it had first been announced which had whipped, Jeffries or Johnson. Mayor McCarthy was not in the wrong when he referred to the expectant sparring contest as an intellectual event of pre-eminent interest.

Nevertheless, suffer the event to be "pulled off" in some state and near some city that has not a reputation to gain if not one to lose. California is not such a state and San Francisco is not such a city. The reputation abroad of this commonwealth and its metropolis is not so high that it can suffer lowering without harm. Let Nevada have the fight. Suffer it to go to Pennsylvania that glories in its infamy, to Washington that feels itself honored in the possession of a Ballinger or to Little "Rhody," that inflicts an Aldrich upon the nation. It would befit the Wigwam of Tammany Hall, the "Jungle" in Denver, the Wheat Pit in Chicago, the bad lands of the Dakotas. There are fitting places enough without inciting eighty-odd millions of American citizens to bite their thumbs at California and its chief city. If there be law enough to prevent the demoralizing spectacle, let it be put to the test.

Roosevelt and the Pope

We could wish that the recent incident at Rome had not transpired, but it was probably unavoidable. As the first citizen of this republic Theodore Roosevelt did right to insist that no discriminating limitations should be put upon his coming and going, receiving or not receiving; and yet there doubtless are proprieties and punctilios surrounding the head of a great church that must restrain that head from doing many things that another may do freely. To the Protestant mind the keeping up of certain old and outworn pretensions of sovereignty on the part of the Vatican seems fallacious if not foolish, but that is no concern of Protestantism. If it seems important to Catholics it is their affair and they should be suffered to deal with it as they may. For some reason certain Methodists in Rome appear to have made themselves especially obnoxious to the Vatican. We, in this country, are not unacquainted with well meaning clerical marplots who, lacking tact and the saving grace of common sense, make trouble wherever they go. Some of these may have strayed to Rome for aught we know, and yet we do not know that the fault is theirs, that the strained relations may not have sprung from an overweening Papal sensitiveness as to what takes place in that, to the papist mind, city of all cities. It is not for The California Weekly to pass judgment as to that. It is sufficient to say that a controversy does exist and that Colonel Roosevelt could not avoid being touched by it without avoiding Rome, which no one would have him do. He is not given to either running away from, or side-stepping, the disagreeable. Fault has been found with him for giving the whole correspondence to the public. It has been claimed that his penchant for publicity has led him into error. We think not. Had he passed through Rome without visiting, or offering to visit, His Holiness the Pope, giving no explanation for his conduct, the Catholic world would have felt aggrieved and the Protestant world would not have ceased to wonder at the apparent slight. Some explanation would sooner or later have to be given on pain of having a thousand injurious and unfounded suspicions become current in place of the truth, so it was infinitely better that the truth should be set before the world at once and so have the incident over with as soon as possible. Two courses are open to us here in America. We can make the incident the occasion for sectarian bitterness and rancor among those who would follow the same Christ, although by differing paths, or we can forget it. Colonel Roosevelt asks us to do the latter. Let's do it.

Men Rather Than Money

The second congressional district of California is not much represented at Washington, but it has been ably represented throughout the Middle West where the Republican congressional committee has sought to help stand-pat congressmen hold insurgent districts in line for the policies of Aldrich and Cannon. While the late insurrection was in progress in the House of Representatives Duncan E. McKinlay was stumping the fifth district of Kansas, represented by W. A. Calderhead, so much the favorite of Cannon that he was preferred over our own Needham, who ranked him in time of service, as member of the conference committee that settled differences between House and Senate on the tariff bill. Judge Rees of Salina has resigned his place on the district bench in order to try the larger and more important issue with Calderhead at the bar of public opinion.

In his two-hour speech McKinlay devoted himself almost wholly to a defense of Taft and the tariff, emphasizing the revenue producing qualities of the tariff bill and enlarging upon the prosperity that had followed its enactment into law; but he said nothing of the deeper issues of insurgency and made his appeal to party patriotism and the pocket rather than to the Rights of Man and that spirit of revolt against government by oligarchy that is profoundly stirring the hearts of the Men of the West. And therein Duncan McKinlay showed that he was not sensitive to the spirit of the Kansan. He talked against, and not with, the current of feeling and he made few converts for Calderhead.

The fundamental truth is that the issue now dividing the people is not one of dollars. There are Republicans, hundreds of thousands of them, who are determined that the dollar sign shall no longer be the symbol of what Republicanism stands for, and this is a hard thing for the Aldriches, Cannons, Hales, Lodges, and their hired apologists, to comprehend. Word has gone out through all the rank and file of that great political organization that the Republican party can not endure half slave and half free and the sons of the fathers who organized that party are responding with a vow that it shall not; that they will free it from the oligarchy that has dominated it all too long or they will tear the heart out of it and leave to its captors nothing but the inert outward semblance.

We may well concede all that the President and his apologists claim for the new tariff, that it is a better tariff than any that has gone before; that it is a good revenue producer; that it has opened a way whereby a better tariff still may be made hereafter; that it is a technical if not substantial redemption of party pledges. We may do all this and yet denounce it for being a product of greed and unrighteousness, the handiwork of a mercenary and Bourbonistic oligarchy, an oppressor of the poor and a fosterer and subsidizer of special privilege, an iniquity that should have been strangled at its birth by executive veto.

And the second congressional district of California may well consider whether or not it be profitable for it to return to congress a man who neglects his congressional duties to lend ability and voice to the service of an oligarchy that is not fit to live. "Under which banner?" is an issue to be put up to every public servant from President to candidate for the assembly. Do you stand for government by and through a close corporation of corporations, a self-constituted oligarchy retained by huge financial interests that recognize no good but the financial, no symbol but the dollar sign, no incentive but selfishness, no use for government except that it may quell the mob and confer special privilege upon a purse proud feudal baronage? This is a question that Mr. McKinlay will have to answer and he will not be permitted to give a different answer to it in California than that he gave in Kansas. There his answer was "Stand pat."

Would Want Five Anchors

Judge Curtis D. Wilbur, endorsed by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League for a place on the supreme bench, and now presiding judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, lately delivered an address before the City Club at Los Angeles on "Selection of the Judiciary With Reference to Partisan Politics," a most important theme for public discussion and legislative action. Some of Judge Wilbur's declarations were tremendously significant and go to show how far we have come toward corporation domination of the most sacred institution of the state.

"If I were a corrupt boss," declared Judge Wilbur, "making my living by an organized system of plundering the people and extorting money from wrongdoers, I should want to have five anchors, each equipped with plenty of chain. The one usually used would be the police and justice courts, where ninety-nine out of the hundred crimes are prosecuted. For another anchor I should want the superior court, so that if my first anchor failed to hold my second would catch. A third anchor would be the court of appeals, where the mistakes of the superior court could be corrected if that anchor slipped. A fourth anchor would be the supreme court, and the fifth, an emergency anchor, would be the governor of the state with his power to pardon."

Is there a doubt that the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company holds these anchor chains in its hands? If there be the following excerpts from Judge Wilbur's address should tend to dispel that doubt.

"A judge of our own superior court, now deceased, once said to me, after an experience in the state convention, that he never again would submit his name to a state convention unless he knew that he was on the slate.

"Another judge, then and now on the bench, told me that he went to San Francisco to see Mr. Herrin to inquire whether his candidacy for higher position was acceptable. He declared that a man can not get on the supreme bench unless he is satisfactory to Mr. Herrin."

Of the Santa Cruz convention he said, in brief: "It was presided over by an attorney of the Southern Pacific; the Los Angeles delegation, 200 strong, marched under the avowed leadership of Walter Parker, a paid agent of the Southern Pacific; the Los Angeles delegates were tendered one-way passes, though some refused to take them; all dined at the Hotel Potter at Santa Barbara and, with few exceptions, found their bills paid; Walter Parker engaged 200 rooms at the Sea Bright Hotel at Santa Cruz, though I have never been informed as to who paid for those rooms; the judges who were rumored to be on the slate from the beginning of the convention were the ones nominated; when asked by Abe Ruef how many delegates I had to trade with, and I told him none, he said I might as well go home as I had no business there. Judge Wheaton A. Gray, a deserving man, whose re-election had been almost universally conceded, was dropped because he could not get his home delegation to trade on."

In concluding, Judge Wilbur declared that if the only way to secure a judicial position was to solicit the support of a political boss, then he would hoe weeds or do something respectable for a living. And well he might. There is many a judge in California who would leave a more honorable reputation to his children if he were a proficient gardener rather than a subservient judge. It is to be doubted if there be a man on the supreme bench of California, not there by appointment, who did not get there either through the sufferance or the assistance of William F. Herrin. This condition of affairs should be intolerable to any free people. If we are to have a free judiciary it must be non-partisanly elected.

Likely to Get It

A new trial will be demanded for Murderer Conboy on the ground that Judge Dunne said to the jury, "I see no reason why twelve honest men should not arrive at a decision if they be guided by the evidence in the case." Neither will the public see any reason why the verdict should be disturbed. Conboy was drunk, he fired the shot, his victim is in his grave, he has been tried by his peers, found guilty and sentenced. What more except to serve his sentence? In what other country would such a criminal not thank his fortunate stars for being let off so easily? And yet it will occasion no surprise if a new trial be granted. There will be surprise if it is not. We have become so used to the law's failure that we anticipate little else.

Legislative Timber

The movement for the emancipation and reformation of government in California will be productive of little of permanent value unless a legislature in sympathy with that movement can be elected this fall. This paper knows no better way of predetermining what a legislator will do if elected than by making a careful study of the records of those who have served one or more terms in the legislature. A. E. Boynton is reluctant to make the campaign for serving a second term in the senate from the sixth district because of press of a growing legal practice, but he is needed there. That his path may be made the easier for being returned we are this week giving our readers a carefully prepared and sincerely appreciative resume of his legislative record as one who has made good. We shall follow this up with other articles on other legislators who have made good to the end that the next legislature may not be made up of raw recruits with few veterans of tried integrity to lead them. The sixth district should return Boynton to the senate without imposing upon him an onerous and costly campaign to that end. The state has need for him, and others like him. In fine, it needs the best legislative timber the state affords, and nothing but the best will serve the purpose at all.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

They were gardeners putting in a lawn and, as the writer passed, he caught only a little of what they said, but they seemed to be talking of a school. One said, "I like a uniform, for then they are all equal. No one can tell a poor man's boy from a rich man's son."

There was a bit of unconscious class consciousness as unmistakable as though asserted with deliberation. Why should the child of the poor man be spoken of as a "boy" and that of the rich man as being his "son?" And why should this digger in the ground instinctively recognize a difference which he, himself, might have found it difficult to explain? In our sober moments we may affirm, and believe, that, "For a' that and a' that a man's a man," but here in this free America of ours a class consciousness is growing up that is belieing the truth of the pretty poem.

We Americans are inclined to laugh at that pride of ancestry which stratifies Europe, and well we may. Suppose that some ancestor really did do some great thing, how soon his strain peters out the making of a few figures quickly tells. Two, four, eight, sixteen, thirty-two, sixty-four, one hundred twenty-eight, two hundred fifty-six, five hundred twelve, a thousand twenty-four! In ten generations there is in the descendant from that immortal but one one-thousand-twenty-fourth of his strain to one thousand and twenty-three parts something else. Is that not a rather diluted infiltration to cause the heart of the tenth generation to swell with pride over the achievements, however glorious, of an ancestor ten generations back? Surely the patrician's "son" and the plebeian's "boy," that far removed, will have little to distinguish them, whether in uniform or out of it. Nevertheless, no matter how perfectly a little figuring may take the substance out of pride of ancestry that line of classification still remains to curse the world and retard the cause of brotherhood.

But what shall we say of our American nobility that is based, not upon great deeds, but great wealth? Europe scorns it, theoretically at least, while recognizing its marital value as desirable. Frankly, is not the prosperous man, as a rule, more of a man than the unprosperous? Reference is not here made to moral values, for, in the domain of morals, there may be substantial equality in all walks of life, and yet having neither poverty nor riches is a distinct advantage in that domain.

There are mere money-grubbers whom society may rightfully despise, but the man of affairs is a man of power and power will be honored while the world stands. Moreover, the poor owe their poverty mainly to their incapacity, and incapacity will be pitied if not despised (and one is not much easier to bear than the other) until all things pass away. At least we may defend our American aristocracy as having as sure a foundation as that of Europe.

And yet there looms above the horizon of our national life no other evil so sinister as that of class consciousness. With it comes either obsequiousness or effrontery and a social stratification that shuts out that equality of opportunity without which our republic must prove a failure. The founders of this republic abhorred that privilege that ran with the blood and dared to hope that, on this continent, there might be a civilization in which there would be equality of opportunity, equality before the law and where the poor man would have as good a right to think of his children as being sons and daughters as boys and girls. The realization of such a civilization is well worth fighting for and if compulsory education of all children in the common schools and compulsory dressing of the school children of rich and poor in uniform will contribute to that end, then suffer these devices to be enforced with power. It is to our schools that we must look for the assimilation of stranger peoples to our national life. Where else shall we look for a breaking down of class distinction?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Will the Senate Remain Republican?

In a little less than eleven months the terms of 24 Republican United States senators will expire. These are Aldrich, Rhode Island; Lodge, Massachusetts; Page, Vermont; Hale, Maine; Bulkeley, Connecticut; Depew, New York; Kean, New Jersey; DuPont, Delaware; Oliver, Pennsylvania; Dick, Ohio; Beveridge, Indiana; Scott, West Virginia; Burrows, Michigan; LaFollette, Wisconsin; Clapp, Minnesota; McCumber, North Dakota; Warner, Missouri; Burkett, Nebraska; Carter, Montana; Clark, Wyoming; Sutherland, Utah; Flint, California; Nixon, Nevada, and Piles, Washington. As between insurgent Republicans and Democrats, on the one side, and reactionary Republicans, on the other, so nearly equal are the senate forces that the reactionaries need lose but a half dozen votes or so to go out of power in the next congress, and, in the present state of popular dissatisfaction, there is at least a fair possibility, if not more, that the six votes will be lost. Senator Depew may have a Democratic successor, and so may Senators Dick, Burkett, Warner and Nixon, while Senators Kean, DuPont, McCumber and Flint are not unlikely to be succeeded by insurgent Republicans. Besides these, there are others whose seats are by no means stable. Of course, these possible changes would favor both insurgent Republicans and Democrats, and these by no means are the same thing, but for house-cleaning purposes the distinction is not very noticeable. It is quite within possibility that the next senate will cut the Wall street wire and do things for itself.

Money the Poor Do Not Get

A strikingly unhappy illustration of perversion of money intended for charitable purposes is in evidence in Italy, and one Professor Trevisonno is attempting to remedy the condition. According to him, there is at the present time the sum of $441,200,000 invested in charitable institutions of various kinds. This investment returns an annual income of $10,600,000, which, of course, is very small interest on the investment, and yet of this small income the poor, for whom it is intended, get less than a fourth, the remaining $8,000,000, and more, being absorbed by administrative expenses. To state the case in another way, less than three-fifths of one per cent on the investment reaches the poor for whom it is intended. On the face of it, it appears that it would be difficult to find a more glaring instance of maladministration; and maladministration where it must hurt the most, at that. Professor Trevisonno is urging legislation which would make such a condition impossible, and evidently he has begun his excellent labor none too soon.

What We May Have Bought With Alaska

On the strength of opinions entertained by Alfred H. Brooks, of the United States geological survey, Hampton's Magazine indulges in some spectacular guess work concerning the wealth of Alaska. When the guesses take the form of figures they become lurid and confessedly uncertain, as the following quotation indicates: "A table of statistics shows Alaska's wealth to be anywhere from fifteen billion dollars to a trillion and a half." There should be latitude enough to suit anybody—anywhere from 1 to 100, it will be perceived—but as our comprehension of either fifteen billion or a trillion and a half is about equally confused, perhaps it makes no difference. Hampton's (or Mr. Brooks') estimate of the details of Alaska's wealth make rather interesting reading because of the largeness and looseness of their outlook. Here are a few choice samples: Placer gold, $500,000,000 worth, and "there may be a hundred or a thousand times that amount;" lode gold, "there may be at least $625,000,000 lode gold in Alaska;" coal, 15,104,500,000 tons, and "it would be conservative to multiply this figure by ten, or even a hundred." So it goes. Note the pleasing liberality and scope of the figures concerning riches which still are under ground and mostly in undiscovered places. The beauty of such figures is that one may multiply or divide them exactly as one pleases, and at the end just as much is known as was known at the beginning. But, vast, vague and wonderful as the figures are, the fact looms clear that we made a great investment when we paid $7,200,000 for Alaska.

Back to the New England Farms

New England promotion bureaus are beginning to announce, with signs of jubilation, that the farmers of that country who abandoned their farms and trekked westward years ago, are showing symptoms of a tendency to return. To be sure, if Californians noted no more such symptoms here than the New Englanders note there, they would look on this as a particularly dull season, but a few drops of rain are sufficient to produce happiness in a land of drouth, and the Easterners have noticed several drops. For instance, the Boston and Maine railroad has received 32 inquiries concerning abandoned New England farms from points west of Chicago. Doubtless the Southern Pacific receives more inquiries concerning California lands in any one day that might be mentioned, and thinks nothing of it, but this is not a land of farming immigration drouth, and so it can not understand what 32 drops of rain mean in a dry country. Even New Hampshire is said to be likely to tip some of its farms over and try them again. On the whole, this seems to be as good a time as any for congratulations to the New Englanders.

German Insurance Against Strike Losses

In recent years insurance against strike losses has become a feature of note among German institutions. A recent government report shows that 48 companies over there now engage in this line of business. Of these thirteen are distinctly strike-indemnity insurance companies, twenty-six are employers' associations for strike insurance, and nine deal in such insurance in a more or less limited degree. These companies grant financial assistance in all cases of strikes, while it is granted in most cases of lockouts, the latter assistance is subject to the condition that the lockout was not due to the fault of the employer. The institution still is young, but it already has shown a tendency to diminish the number of strikes—a tendency which is excellent if no righteous strike is nipped in the bud by the employer's immunity from financial hardships which the employees can not escape.

What Royalty Pays Its Labor

To labor on a royal farm in England may be, and doubtless is, honorable, but that it may be one road leading to a poorhouse was strikingly illustrated by a case which recently came before the Windsor guardians of the poor. An aged woman applied to the guardians for relief. Investigation revealed the fact that her 23-year-old son had done his best to support her, but was unable to do so, although he had regular employment on one of the royal farms. His wages there were ten shillings a week, or about $2.50 in our money—say, 36 cents a day, which, it must be admitted, is a limited allowance for two people. The guardians reported that the young man's wage recently was raised to twelve shillings a week, which, with tips, amounted to fifteen shillings—$3.75—a week, but they granted the relief, which apparently was a righteous thing to do. Are not a king's laborers worthy of their hire, and living hire, at that?

Our Erroneous Idea of the Chinese

If you have an idea that Chinese generally are physically small people, it is a notion of the Mongolians that you share with most Americans; naturally, too, for most of the Chinese that we see in this country are dwarfish of stature. Nevertheless, the idea is erroneous. Most of the Chinese that come to this country are from Hongkong, Canton, or vicinity; southern Chinese, in short, and the people of southern China are small. But farther north the Mongolians are about as large as Europeans. The Chinese of Shanghai, for instance, probably average as tall as do people of most European or American cities.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF

Milton's Shorter Poems

Heaven deliver us from us from the multitudinous din and infinitely wearying labyrinths of "Paradise Lost" and its companion poetic juggernauts, wherein Milton was at his nearly worst. An approach to oblivion has released us from the perusal of those sulphurous prose pamphlets in which he mixed the vocabulary of the fishwife with the theology of the Puritan and the politics of the Roundhead.

But in his purely poetic moods, when he gave free play to his native love for beauty, when he followed his own formula of poetry (that it be simple, sensuous and passionate), when he strayed gladly in the cool groves and over dappled lawns and by singing streams, then is Milton wholly delectable, a master of sonorous rhythms, guided by a most choice and fastidious taste, abounding in life and sensitive to the most delicate shades of beauty. In these moods he is wholly pagan, and we think it just to say—though it is not an orthodox opinion—that Wordsworth, the high priest of Nature, never reflected so joyously nor so vividly those noblest, unclouded pictures of smiling natural beauty as Milton has done in L'Allegro, Il Penseroso, and Comus.

In these he has the Shakespearean reach and power, unmuddled by Shakespeare's raging passion. In these he is the strong, untroubled youth, faring forth through a glorious world, alive to every clean appeal to the senses, with an eye for bright colors and fitly moulded forms, a heart with the tenderness and generosity of early manhood, glad just to live and feel the current of life tingling through his veins.

And one thing he has that no other English poet has ever revealed, a high and noble purity of mind that sets him somewhat apart, on a lofty but not lonely hill, whence he pipes to us strains sweet as the sound of the wind in spring amongst the rushes, when the meadow lark sings from a neighboring field.

JACK LONDON'S LATEST BOOK

Out of that land of bitter cold which is Alaska have come many things of much value to mankind, and far from least among these are Jack London's books, in which the manners, customs and characteristics in and of that frozen world are vividly portrayed. California should be proud of Jack London, and it is. Even when it damns him with something louder than faint praise, it is glad that this, her potent son, was born on California soil. It may as well be said in passing, too, that London deserves both much praise and, if not condemnation, at least regret. Indubitably he is among the strongest and most virile writers of our time, but, just as indubitably, that virility sometimes too closely approximates brutality.

Both the strength and the weakness of the man are in evidence in his latest book of short stories, "Lost Face." Vivid, realistic to the limit of realism, the reader can not escape the spell of their intensity, and yet as he reads he shudders, for a great part of them are cruelly brutal, and it is difficult to escape the conviction that the author delights in the brutality. For example, in "To Build a Fire" the slow torture of freezing to death, as portrayed, becomes almost unbearable to a reader of fine sensibility. Probably this is exactly what Mr. London intended, but the pity is that he did not intend something else, something that would employ his splendid strength to better purpose. In "Trust," there is that rare thing in Jack London, a gleam of humor, and the gleam is intensified by contrast with the tense vigor of the sketch. It is regrettable to lay down a book of such genius with a shudder, but that is what most readers will do.

(The Macmillan Co., New York, $1.50.)

The name of the author of "Chantecler," Edward Rostand, is composed of thirteen letters. When he was invited to take his place among the Immortals of the French Academy he became the thirteenth occupant of the thirteenth chair.

DEMOCRACY

By Arthur Bardwell Patten

(Written for The California Weekly.)

Hail to Democracy, the final rule!
Where each for all his larger life doth live,
And all for each themselves do freely give,
And no one is another's pawn or tool;
Where work and worth a just abundance win;
Where merit only can have right to power,
While freedom is the least man's ample dower,
And greed is the unpardonable sin.

All hail, Democracy: thy day has dawned!
Fierce be thy sun to blast rapacious eyes;
Fair be thy light to cheer benignant hearts,
That welcome thee with passion deep and fond,
And bid the coming brotherhood arise
To fill with song our councils, courts and marts.

DE MORTUIS

By Richard Realf

In 1878 the talented and unfortunate Richard Realf was living in San Francisco and was employed in the United States Mint. In an hour of discouragement he killed himself, and when his room was entered and his body found next morning, this poem, composed just before his suicide, was revealed as the only explanation of his rash act.

"De Mortuis nil nisi bonum." When
For me the end has come and I am dead,
And little voluble, chattering daws of men
Peck at me curiously, let it then be said
By some one brave enough to speak the truth:
Here lies a great soul killed by cruel wrong.
Down all the balmy days of his fresh youth
To his bleak, desolate noon, with sword and song,
And speech that rushed up hotly from the heart,
He wrought for liberty, till his own wound
(He had been stabbed), concealed with painful art
Through wasting years, mastered him and he swooned,
And sank there where you see him lying now
With the word "Failure" written on his brow.

But say that he succeeded. If he missed
World's honors, and world's plaudits, and the wage
Of the world's deft lackeys, still his lips were kissed
Daily by those high angels who assuage
The thirstings of the poets—for he was Born unto singing, and a burthen lay Mightily on him, and he moaned because
He could not rightly utter to the day
What God taught him in the night. Sometimes,
Power fell upon him, and bright tongues of flame,
And blessings reached him from poor souls in stress;
And benedictions from the black pits of shame,
And little children's love, and old men's prayers,
And a Great Hand that led him unawares.

So he died rich. And if his eyes were blurred
With thick films—silence! he is in his grave.
Greatly he suffered; greatly, too, he erred;
Yet broke his heart in trying to be brave,
Nor did he wait till Freedom had become,
The popular shibboleth of courtier's lips;
He smote for her when God himself seemed dumb
And all His arching skies were in eclipse.
He was a-weary, but he fought his fight,
And stood for simple manhood; and was joyed
To see the august broadening of the light
And new earths heaving heavenward from the void.
He loved his fellows, and their love was sweet.
Plant daisies at his head and at his feet.

METCHNIKOFF ON LONG LIFE

This review is quoted from the Springfield Republican:

Elie Metchnikoff, the celebrated Russian biologist, sub-doctor of the Pasteur institute in Paris, who is known to the world at large chiefly by his theory that the age of man may be very greatly increased by science, has complained that his teachings have been misrepresented. An authoritative statement of his views may be found in the popular edition of his volume of "optimistic studies," "The Prolongation of Life," published by G. P. Putnam's Sons in a translation by P. Chalmers Mitchell, with an introduction by Prof. Charles S. Minot of the Harvard medical school. This introduction is largely biographical, but a page is given to correcting the exaggerated version of the author's results which has gained currency: "It will be well for the unscientific reader to understand distinctly that Prof. Metchnikoff does not offer a cure for old age. Old age is not a disease and can not be cured; it is an accumulation of changes which begin during earliest youth. * * * On the other hand, we may reasonably hope, by improving the health of the individual, to prolong life." There are other topics of scientific interest discussed in the present volume, but of course none of them is interesting to so many people as the prospect of an extended lease of life—even though not one person in a hundred takes even ordinary precautions against premature decay.

Professor Metchnikoff still hopes for much from the systematic prevention of intestinal putrefaction, and explains the operation of his milk preparations. As to "Fletcherism," he is a skeptic. But he stirs curiosity by the statement: "In America, where Fletcher's theory took its origin, there has already been described under the name of Bradyfagy a disease arising from the habit of eating too slowly. Dr. Einhorn, a well-known specialist in the diseases of the digestive system, has found that several cases of this disease were rapidly cured when the patients made up their minds to eat more rapidly again." The world ought to be more thoroughly informed about the horrors of Bradyfagy. Luckily, with so many quick-lunch restaurants, the remedy is at hand. Professor Metchnikoff's book is one of much scientific interest, and students of literature will be attracted to the physiological study of Goethe, a notable example of remarkable powers retained to an advanced age in spite of excesses.

NEW POEMS BY ALFRED NOYES

The announcement of a new book of poems by Alfred Noyes is now an important event to lovers of English poetry. "The Enchanted Island and Other Poems," is the title of his latest volume, issued by Frederick A. Stokes company in the latter part of March. It will be remembered that both Kipling and Swinburne spoke in high terms of "Drake," an English epic, which was published in this country last fall. Now, after reading "The Enchanted Island," Edmund Gosse and Theodore Watts-Dunton, perhaps the two greatest living English critics (the latter having been a close friend of Swinburne), unite in calling Noyes the greatest living English poet. Mr. Watts-Dunton wrote to him: "To me, who believe that the singing quality of poetry is the first quality, it seems that you are right away (now that Swinburne is gone) the first of our living poets."

Mr. Edward Gosse wrote: "The whole book is full of beauty and confirms me in my belief that you are the leader among the English poets of the last generation." The volume contains a very versatile product, ranging from light lyrics and rollicking ballads to longer odes and powerful songs of stern simplicity and grace, many showing a distinctly mature genius and inspired thought. Among the poems are "In Memory of Swinburne," "On George Meredith's Eightieth Birthday," "In Memory of Meredith," "Lucifer's Feast," other poems hitherto unpublished in book form and some which the public have never seen at all.

WHAT THE FOREST SERVICE IS

AND DOES TO MAKE THE FORESTS USEFUL TO ALL THE PEOPLE

What is this forest service we have been hearing so much about while our friend R. A. Ballinger, Esq., is declining to testify in Washington, and one Gifford Pinchot is treading softly toward the man with the big stick? We have been hearing a deal about conservation, and more to the effect that said forest service is the original and simon-pure conservator. So, we repeat, what is the forest service? How does it act? What does it do? And who is in it?

Take the elevator to the top floor of the First National bank building in San Francisco, walk five paces east by south and thirty paces west again, and you are in the lair of the headquarters officers of District 5, Forest Service, Department of Agriculture. This office is suggestive of the pine-clad slopes in more ways than one. In the first place, it is one of the highest offices in town, and looks out on the cliff-like face of several other skyscrapers. In the second place, it is the working place of a lot of men who look unlike any other office force in town. These men are clear-eyed, athletic looking fellows, mostly young, with tanned skins that are not acquired in everyday offices. They have the suggestion of the open air about them, as, indeed, they should, for these men all spend one month in the office and the next in the woods. That keeps them the fit-looking specimens you see, but, and more important to the public, it keeps them close to their job, which is, after all, managing Uncle Sam's forests instead of growing near-sighted over books. District 5 is a matter of thirty million acres of land, more or less, and the job of guarding against forest fires, watching out for violation of grazing permits and checking up the lumber jacks who are cutting timber on the public domain is something for a large number of active men to put their time and attention upon.

The Forest Service is pretty well organized now; you can sit down with a pencil and paper and chart off a descending scale of authorities and responsibilities all the way from Uncle Tama Jim Wilson, who is the Secretary of Agriculture and the grand high boss of things, down through The Forester—lately Gifford Pinchot and now one Henry S. Graves, who graduated from the Yale School of Forestry which Gifford Pinchot's father founded—and on down through the district foresters (six in all), past the forest supervisors to the rangers, deputy rangers, assistant rangers and the lowly but ambitious guards. By the time you strike the district forester's office your chart begins to spread out like a fan. His understudies, advisors, and associates group into departments: Of Operation, of Silviculture, of Grazing, of Products, and of Law.

These department names do not sound entertaining until you want to do business with the Forest Service; then they are entertaining and business both. For instance, if you are in the Forest Service and want a raise—you think about the Operation department. If you owe the Forest Service anything, Operation checks the account. If you run up against the act of June 11, '06, Operation department will get you if you don't watch out.

Silviculture department is technical, but it is the real life blood of the service. This is where the man who knows a eucalyptus globulus from a cant hook, figures out how many trees to the square rod ought to grow in a particular part of a forest, how to nurse a tree with the summer complaint, how to reforest denuded slopes, which trees to cut when the lumberman wants some timber. In short, silviculture is the science of forestry, the Silviculture department handles all the technical and scientific work of the service, and the silviculturists are the men who will one day run the Forest Service.

The Grazing department handles the questions of the number and kinds of horses, cattle, sheep, pigs, or whatnot, that may graze, and when, in the national forests, and how much their owners, heirs or assigns shall pay for the privilege.

The Products department handles the problems of extending the uses of forest products in commerce. It experiments with creosoted telegraph poles, and investigates the possibilities of scrub oak for making floor lumber, and tries to prove that redwood will make as good paper pulp as Oregon spruce. If the Products man can make a piece of timber do something useful where it used to loaf around and do nothing, he is happy. Also, he is a very useful citizen and earns the salary a grateful people pay him.

The Law department—but no, we refrain.

But let's get out into the woods, where the service belongs. Here we meet the forest supervisors. Understand, first, that District 5 embraces California and southwestern Nevada, and when we say embraces we mean that nearly all the timbered area of California that was not in private ownership five years ago is now in the National Forests. But District 5 is divided geographically, and for administrative purposes, into seventeen "forests," of a million and a quarter to two million acres apiece. They have appropriate names, too: Angeles, California, Cleveland, Inyo, Klamath, Lassen, Modoc, Mono, Monterey, Plumas, Santa Barbara, Sequoia, Shasta, Sierra, Stanislaus, Tahoe, and Trinity—not only appropriate but, generally, indicative of location as well.

Each forest is managed locally by a forest supervisor. He does not have to be a technical man, but he must be a good executive. He is a better supervisor if he is technically trained too, but it is his job to handle rangers and deal with cowboys and cattlemen and ranchers and sheepherders and power magnates and other people, and keep things in order and see that the district forester's office doesn't hear "trouble" murmuring up from his forest too often. He is assisted by a deputy; same qualifications. He is further assisted by a forest assistant, who must be highly technical in skill, and a civil service appointee. Another assistant may be a "planting assistant," also a technical man and in the civil service.

Then come the enlisted men, so to speak, the rangers. These are the high privates who get little glory and do the work. That is, they do all the unskilled, or non-technical and non-executive work. They own a horse or horses, get $1.100 a year (until January 1st it was $900 and, as now, find your own horse, fodder, and grub and kit), fight forest fires, prevent violations of law, build cabins and trails, and do anything else they are told. They are civil service employees, whether they rank as rangers, deputy rangers, or assistant rangers. But below them are non-civil service men called guards, who are hired in emergencies and for not more than six months, who do much the same work for less pay and a chance to take the service examination.

Now comes the crux of this article. Every man, from the district forester down, has a little book that is his Bible. It is called "The Use Book," and he knows it from cover to back, and without thumbing the pages to find the place. What "The Use Book" says goes.

Now notice the title. Read it this way, "the USE book." That is the philosophy of the Forest Service: Use. The forests are to be conserved that they may be used: interpretation—used now, next year, next generation, next century. A lot of lumbermen said "use," but they meant "use up," right now, for personal profit, and God help posterity (polite variation) which never did anything for us. To quote a piquant phrase originated in the service, use means, use them so the timber "keeps coming," instead of being used up once and for all time.

Again notice the idea: Use the forests as grazing grounds, but in such a way that there will be a forest left for next year's flocks to graze in. A lot of sheepmen used to use them to such purpose that John Muir called the sheep "hoofed locusts," veritable devastators of forests, ruining all hope of a second growth of trees. The sheep industry is too valuable, and the forests are too nearly essential to that industry, to permit one generation of sheepmen to ruin the business for the next.

So, the creed of the Forest Service is this. The national forests are a national asset and the common property of all the people for all time; unrestricted private enterprise tends to mine all the value out of this common property in one generation; our job is not merely to permit, but enthusiastically to encourage and abet, the largest possible use of this asset consistent with keeping its principal, as distinguished from its current annual yield, intact for all time. The foolish, though pleasantly tinkling phrase of carpers, that the Forest Service wishes to "bottle up" the natural resources and keep them as a profitless curiosity, finds no sympathy in the service. And, as the proof of the pudding is in the eating, under Forest Service administration of the national forests (which are not by any means all the forests in the United States) in the year 1906, some 700 million board feet of lumber were sold under terms that made big profits to the lumbermen who logged it out, and some 75 million board feet were given away to people who needed it and were entitled to get it. And some million and a half head of horses and cattle, and some six million sheep manage to get grazing in the national forests, in spite of the talk about "bottling up curiosities." Not to mention the fact that agricultural lands are open to homestead in the forests, mines are as free as they are anywhere, water power may be had under reasonable restrictions, and municipal water supplies for nothing.

Some more about use. The old, individualistic, unrestricted use of the forests resulted in fire losses that would appal a German or a Swiss. Timber enough used to go up in smoke in one fire to build a half dozen cities. The Forest service stopped that. Since the fire patrol was originated by the service, some years ago, less than one-third of 1 per cent. of the total area of the forests has been burned over, a tremendous saving to the public.

If anyone thinks the restrictions imposed by the Forest Service are severe, he should investigate personally the lands that have been logged out by the older lumber companies in California before the days of the service. After seeing the blasted hillsides that will never grow anything but boulders in the next hundred years he would be more inclined to suggest a bath in boiling oil for some of the lumbermen and less inclined to cavil at a scientific plan of lumbering that is profitable to the lumbermen without letting them be worse than hoggish.

Limitations of space forbid an elaboration of the forest policy here, but copies of "The Use Book" can be had of the Secretary of Agriculture for the asking, and the reader will find it not only instructive but a really entertaining treatise on the theory and practice of a public service that was recognized as indispensable in Germany a hundred years ago.

There is room here for a quotation from "The Use Book," that gives a concise history of the origin of the Forest service:

"In 1876, $2,000 was appropriated to employ a competent man to investigate timber conditions in the United States, and on June 30, 1886, an act was approved creating a division of forestry in the Department of Agriculture. On July 1, 1901, this division became the Bureau of Forestry (now the Forest Service, since the act of March 3, 1905), employing practically all the trained foresters in the United States.

"In the meantime, with the increasing realization that the nation's timber supply must be protected, and with the immense growth of irrigation interests in the West, the necessity for retaining permanent federal control over selected forest areas was recognized by a brief section inserted in the act of March 3, 1891, which authorized the President to establish forest reserves, now called national forests. The first exercise of this power was in the creation of the Yellowstone Park timber land reserve, proclaimed by President Harrison March 30, 1891.

"The mere creation of national forests, however, without provision for their administration, was both ineffectual and annoying to local interests dependent upon their resources. Consequently, the Secretary of the Interior, in 1896, requested the National Academy of Sciences to recommend a national forest policy. This resulted in the passage of the act of June 4, 1897, under which, with several subsequent amendments, national forests are now administered."

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Men for Right, and God for All

Men who hold that Duty's more
Than the gleam of Pleasure's eyes;
Men who hold the Right before
Life's supremest tinsel prize,
Now the "still voice" summons you;
List, and heed that highest call.
Stand ye straight, and be ye true,
Men for Right, and God for all.

Men have made a monster grim,
Head of guilt and feet of clay,
And, the while they worship him,
Foul corruption holds its sway.
Bribed and bribers, these accursed
Breed and fatten in the land—
Men who hold your duty first,
Stand for Right, and straightly stand.

Say ye not, "Lo, I am small, Lacking might to throttle ill."
Nay, we are but pigmies, all.
Only strong to do His will.
See, the crisis draweth near!
Are we, then, to knavery thrall?
Draw the sword and poise the spear,
Men for Right, and God for all.

They, our fathers, founded here
Freedom's home, the people's trust.
Shall its glory disappear,
Humbled, lowered in the dust?
Nay, by God, whose name we praise;
Nay, by Him on whom we call,
We will turn from halting ways,
Men for Right, and God for all.

When You Stub Your Toe

You started out for a walk, Bartholomew, and your dear Leonora was by your side. The day was fair, the sunlight caressing, the little birds were chattering and whistling their secrets, the fragrance of the blossoms was most grateful—in short, Nature evidently had arranged everything with the express purpose of giving you and Leonora a most delightful stroll. You sauntered along, and joy was in your heart and the divine song of peace in your soul; and then—

Well, then was when you stubbed your toe against the malicious stone some sinful small boy had left on the walk. Then you rose in your wrath, seized your toe in both hands, hopped madly about on one foot, and, in order to express your maltreated feelings, used language which curdled Leonora's gentle blood and made her wish she had married almost anything except a man. All because of a stone, Bartholomew, your delightful stroll was twisted, warped and all but knocked out in the first round.

But it is so with life, dear boy. We start out in the morning with the best and highest of intentions. "To-day," we say to ourselves, "you bet I am going to do something fine and noble." And just as we are saying it, we run full force into some stone, which as likely as not the Evil One, himself, placed in our way, and we stub our toe, and probably fall flat, and use lurid language, and—oh, we ought to be ashamed of ourselves, but we would be more so if we did not know that nobody—no, not one—fails to have a similar experience.

But haven't you noticed, Bartholomew, that, after you have stubbed the toe and have worked off the first natural ebullition, you can continue the stroll and both Leonora and you can have a most enjoyable time if you are so minded? And, again, it is so in all life. If you stub your toe—as you will, dear boy—pick yourself up, and go ahead. That's the way to win.

The Kind of Poetry He Wrote

"You know part of one of Coleridge's poems came to him in a dream, don't you?"

"Yes, I've heard so."

"Well, Poeticus dreamed one of his poems the other night, and now his wife won't sleep with him."

"Why not?"

"She says she doesn't consider it safe to sleep with a man who has the nightmare."

The Opinions of Rufus

It's all right to advise folks to seize opportunity 'fore it flies, but I've known fellers so blame onlucky that if they did they'd git it by the tail feathers an' they'd pull out.

They's sech a thing es bein' too prosperous fer one's own good. An' extry fat hen don't lay any eggs.

I dunno es I could wish fer anything much more comfortin' than ter be es able to carry my own troubles es I am my neighbor's.

If there was es much brains under some women's hats es there is acreage on top of 'em I should feel that the outlook fer the race is improvin' considerable.

Shakespeare said, "Who steals my purse steals trash," but Josh Bings says he'd be wil'in' to take a chance on tradin' purses unsight an' unseen with him any day.

I don't know of but one thing that's more uncertain than the weather, an' that's prophecies 'bout it.

It's said that women have the privilege of changin' their mind, an' I know some that I should think would take advantage of the chance to change it fer most anything that was offered.

If some folks' stummicks could be fed on the amount they feed their souls I'll bet they'd be s'prised at the savin' in their board bill.

I don't see what's the use of some people announcin' on Sunday that they're "miserable offenders," when anybody'd know it jest by watchin' them the rest of the week.

Did you ever reflect, brethern an' sisters, how much some children would be improved by bein' consider'ble less like their pas an' mas?

Jane Esmeralda Perkins

Jane Esmeralda Perkins is dwarfish as to size;

Jane Esmeralda Perkins has features that are flat;

Jane Esmeralda Perkins has somewhat glassy eyes

That seem forever querying, "I wonder where I'm at;"

But when the even creepeth on her mama, clad in white,

Wee mama of the sleepy eyes, her child for bed prepares;

"Jane Esmeralda Perkins, to Dod now be per-lite,

An' don't forget to say to him oor Now-I-lay-me pwayers."

Jane Esmeralda Perkins and her mama then kneel down,

(I think perhaps the angels say, "See, what a funny pair!")

And the baby mama whispers words to One in Beulah Town,

But all Jane Esmeralda does is merely stare, and stare;

And then another mama bends to kiss a bonnie head,

With prayer unspoke that o'er her bairn the angels guard will keep,

And the baby mama whispers, when the two are tucked in bed,

"Jane Esmeralda Perkins, it is time to go to seep."

While ever, through the livelong night, the angels, kind and wise,

Keep watch above the sleeping one and hold her in their care,

Jane Esmeralda Perkins, with her dull, un-blinking eyes,

Looks out into the darkened room to merely stare, and stare.

Oh, I know the little mama is as safe as safe can be,

For the perfect love protects her while of Lethe's stream she drinks,

But I often pause to wonder—for it's natural, you see—

What it is, while she is staring, that Jane Esmeralda thinks.

It's No Use, Jim

Somewhere or other, in some way or other, the Santa Cruz Sentinel secured an article villifying Hiram W. Johnson, the gubernatorial candidate of the decent element of the Republican party, and republished it, at the same time crediting it to the San Francisco Star—and it might just as well have credited it to the Sunday School Times, which righteous paper had as much to do with the original publication as did "Jim" Barry's Star.

Thereupon Barry came out with an article disavowing the publication, expressing the high esteem in which he holds Mr. Johnson, and pouring several vials of deserved wrath and scorn on the head of Editor "Dunc" McPherson of the Sentinel. It was rich, rare and racy reading, but—

It's no use, Jim. You can't get beneath that hide; numbers of the newspaper men of this state have tried it, and always in vain. We begin with comparatively mild treatment, and we end by rubbing in verbal carbohic acid. It is no use; Duncan likes it. He says to himself, "There appears to be a popular impression that I am an ass, but I have made money, and so it must be erroneous. Rub in some more carbohic acid."

Once, I remember, I published some near-poetry, and after a while it appeared in the Sentinel without my name and under the explanatory line, "Contributed to the Sentinel." Thereupon I publicly announced that I had not contributed it to the Sentinel, and Duncan explained that it was very bum poetry, anyway (which it was), and therefore he had felt no hesitancy about capturing it as a Sentinel gem. What was a man to say after that?

Give it up, Jim. It "can't be did." The man doesn't live who can get beneath that pachydermatous hide. Neither barb of ridicule nor shaft of satire can pierce it. We know you didn't do it, and it will have to go with that.

In the Political Menagerie

"And now, ladies and gentlemen," said the gentlemanly attendant in the Political Menagerie, "permit me to call your attention to the most phenomenally awe-inspiring creature now on exhibition, the fiery, untamed, rainbow-tinted, chameleon-hued Pan-partisan Googoo, more frequently mentioned as The Machine. Approach, ladies and gentlemen; do not be afraid, for, while its roar is fierce and resounding, it is perfectly harmless and is so tame that it will eat from the dirtiest hand; in fact, it has received all its food from the people, and at their expense, for the last thirty years.

"But the particular astounding characteristic of the celebrated Pan-partisan Googoo to which I wish to call your pleased attention, ladies and gentlemen, is its unexampled capacity for changing its color to suit the taste of all spectators. Are you a Republican in these troublous times? Note that to you its coat appears the solemn, sepulchral Republican black. Are you a believer in the principles of the glorious, never-dying, never-living Democracy? Observe the dead, dun and undun hue which its coat assumes. Are you an apostle of the uncharted heaven of Socialism? Behold, it is of a vivid, regal, pulsating red. Are you a meek and lowly Prohibitionist? The color is that of watered milk in an insufficient bottle.

"Ladies and gentlemen, this is the wonder and the glory of the unparalleled Pan-partisan Googoo. It is the only animal now on exhibition which is absolutely guaranteed to be all things to all men, all colors to all partisans and all creeds to all believers. Let the people feed it, as they constantly have done, and the beautiful S. P. brand which it proudly wears is sufficient indication that its political colors will be displayed to suit anybody and everybody.

"We will now, ladies and gentlemen, move on to the next page, in which are displayed the Curry lion and the Anderson lamb lying down together, the lamb at present on the outside of the lion, the time not having yet arrived for the latter's dinner."

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Our Big President And His Gauntlet It has been given out at Washington that, on Saturday of this week, President Taft will throw his gauntlet at the feet of his critics and give them a trouncing if he can. There is no foreknowing what this course may result in, but the effect is likely to be of first importance. He will stand pat. He will not only justify his policies, but the methods by which he has undertaken to incorporate them into legislation. He will say, in substance, "The policies I favor are embodied in the political platform upon which I was elected. This made them party measures one and all, and, for their enactment into law, the Republican party is responsible. I have held that party to that responsibility and, in pursuance of this idea, I have made appeal to the party organization as I found it. Our government is by party and as long as it is so I know of no other way of bringing important legislation to pass. Therefore, I call upon all Republicans to rally to the support of their party as the best way to support these party measures. Those who do not do so can make small claim to being Republicans and should be read out of the party." Whether the President says just these things or not, these are the things he is thinking and, from Maine to California, Republican "organizations" are anxiously waiting to stand behind the President if the President stands behind the party organization throughout the country, as he undoubtedly will. The "organizations" do not care a fig for the President's policies, but they do care a great deal for the party organizations as now constituted, for it is through these organizations that they keep their grip on state and nation.

Issue Both False And Perplexing In spite of the sincerest efforts of the President the issue that will go to the public as a result of tomorrow's meeting at Washington will be both false and perplexing. Progressive Republicanism, the country over, is loyal to the President's policies. They are the Roosevelt policies, the policies that brought progressive, insurgent, Lincoln-Roosevelt Republicanism into being. Why should they not be loyal to them? Per contra, the Republican "organizations," national and state, from California to Maine, are opposed to those policies and will bring them to naught if they can, but they are for the "grand old party" with a whoop, a hurrah and a tiger. They will not openly oppose the President's policies, preferring to lie low and watch an opportunity to emasculate them when the President is not looking. What the insurrection is about is the domination of the Republican party by the predatory monetary interests of the country. It is against "Cannons" in the house and "Aldrichism" in the senate, casting sinister shadows over the White House, that Progressive Republicanism is in revolt, and the fate of Taft will hang upon which banner he hoists tomorrow. If he bids the party march under the leadership of Aldrich and Cannon it will not do it and, despite all that the program-takers may say and do, he and his faction of the party will be overwhelmed. If, on the other hand, he justifies and pleads for his policies only and makes his plea to public sentiment for those policies and not for the party organization as it is, he may find the Republican party pulled together and ready to do battle for the maintenance of itself in power. By Sunday morning we shall know.

Court House Rings Lined Up for Curry Nearly every county has its courthouse ring. It is natural that it should. Sometimes these rings are Democratic, sometimes they are Republican, but more often they are, underneath the surface, strictly non-partisan. On the surface they are as partisan as possible but contrive to hold the balance of power for the benefit of the "ins" of whatever party. And nearly all of them sustain a cooperative relation with the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. With few exceptions these rings have lined up for Charles F. Curry for governor. It is so in Alameda, openly and notoriously. Word comes from Ukiah to the same effect, although in Mendocino the fact is kept a little shady. It is true of San Bernardino, where a stout anti-machine organization has been effected with the hope of throwing out the Kelly-Kendall combination. Kelly is postmaster and, united with the courthouse ring, is so well able to use the county patronage as to whip the local press into somnolence if not into line, and even the press of the adjacent city of Redlands. Riverside county is progressively Republican, but the courthouse push at Riverside is out and out for Curry. It is not yet clear that the insurrection at San Bernardino will be communicated to Riverside, but that is not unlikely, as the insurgents there are doing active work, with strong men identified with them and it is scarcely possible that Riverside should hear the cannonading and not be enough interested to ask what it is all about. Those who question that Curry is, at bottom, the "organization" candidate will do well to associate in their minds these two facts. The courthouse rings are for Curry. The courthouse rings are "organization." Ipso facto the "organization" is for Curry. All others are stalking horses.

Just Two Camps In San Diego Of the four men in the race (the Nat Ellery joke not having reached San Diego yet) only two have any following. These are Johnson and Curry. Anderson's name is practically never spoken and Phil Stanton is not taken seriously, but the Johnson-Curry issue is drawn distinctly. Johnson bids fair to sweep things clean, but Curry will get practically every vote that Johnson does not. The rest will only be scattering and the line-up is so pronounced that the five months which intervene between now and the ides of August will hardly break the ranks of either Johnson or Curry to the advantage of any other candidate.

Stanton's Boom Big End First The enthusiasm for P. A. Stanton appears to be confined to Los Angeles county. As stated above, he cuts no figure in San Diego, and in Riverside it is all either Johnson or Curry. In San Bernardino there is some Stanton sentiment, and there would be a good deal in Orange county but for a lame chicken which has come home to the Stanton roost. Stanton could not get the Orange county officials to make the improvements he wanted in the vicinity of his Orange county ranch and so he slipped a bill into the legislature to cut off a piece of Orange and put it over into Los Angeles county, taking his ranch with it. Consequently there is no dearth of Stanton talk in Orange county, but it is the kind of talk that Stanton and his friends enthusiastically despise. Stanton's boom started big end first, does not extend beyond Los Angeles county and unbiased observers agree that Johnson will carry Los Angeles county.

Frank Flint Will Run There you have a straight tip and here is the reason why: The "organization" can not find another candidate south of Tehachapi who can face Judge John D. Works with any hope of winning against him. Frank Flint is popular throughout the citrus districts. We can not say it isn't so, because it is, although for a reason that human nature has its right to acknowledge and then to apologise for. He "got things" for them. To be sure he swallowed the Aldrich program whole and did the bidding of the Rhode Island senator from start to finish, but he held the duty on the fruits that California produces and got an advance on lemons, partly for the advantage of growers and partly for the advantage of the transportation companies, both interests being served with impartiality and zeal. Frank Flint will run. The Gage boom died abornin' and Governor Gillett's motion for his own nomination has not received a second. J. W. McKinley wears the S. P. collar too conspicuously and it is Frank Flint or nobody worth mentioning to take the field against Judge Works, and so Frank Flint will be in the running. Mark that down as a sure prophecy. John D. Works is not popular with that crowd. They have been searching his record and are beginning to whisper around bar-rooms that they have "got it on him," to use the language of bar-rooms. Of course they haven't, but they are going to make a hard fight against Works for the very palpable reason that he is not the kind of man the "interests" want in the American House of Lords. He will be fought with the weapons formerly employed by Chinese pirates.

The Deadly Parallel Back in 1904 the Los Angeles Times still had something of a reputation for independence if not for fairness. On August 7th of that year it had this to say of P. A. Stanton: "P. A. Stanton is the machine candidate for the assembly, a politician who is the creature of the Espee machine, who takes his orders from its bosses, a programmer in every political sense of the word, who represented not his district, but his political makers at the last session of the legislature." That is how Stanton looked to the Times before it got into the same corral with Stanton. After that it was different, as the following excerpts from the Times of March 14, 1910, clearly show: "There is no excuse whatever for a Republican, a genuine Republican in Southern California, to withhold his support from Mr. Stanton. He has been a careful, conscientious and efficient legislator, serving his constituency valiantly and fruitfully." Thus the lion and the lamb lie down together in peace inside the Southern Pacific's ample stock yards. A little investigation would disclose a whole menagerie of the same ilk, spitting at each other a little once in a while, but injuring not a hair of any head set off with an Espee collar. A mighty interesting family!

W. D. Stephens For Congress At home Representative McLachlan of the seventh district has sometimes talked like an insurgent, but he has tramped habitually in the Cannon ranks at Washington. When the late insurrection took place, that almost amounted to a revolution, McLachlan stood pat. The issue thus raised has reached home ahead of him and the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has found a candidate to take the field against him. This man is W. D. Stephens, a retired wholesale grocer, a man who stands as high as the highest in his city and district, a sound man, a good speaker and, as to age, in his early fifties. If nominated and elected Mr. Stephens can be counted on to stand for a progressive and not a corporation-dominated Republicanism. He should have the support of all who really want this to be a free country in fact and not an oligarchy masquerading in the habiliments of a republic.

Eshleman's Candidacy Formally Announced John M. Eshleman has been talked of for the Lincoln-Roosevelt endorsement for railroad commissioner from the third district, but, until lately, there has been no certainty that he would make the race if endorsed. That uncertainty has been cleared up and Eshleman will make the race if endorsed by the League, and the League is pretty certain to endorse him. With Alexander Gordon and John M. Eshleman on the commission it will do good work whoever the third man may be, but it will be well to have a strong man in the third place also.

Lee C. Gates for State Senator Lee C. Gates, of Los Angeles, has been loth to stand for office this year, but we have it on good authority that he will make the race for state senator from the thirty-fourth district. This is the district now represented by Senator Savage, an "organization man" of whom the organization itself is not especially proud. In fact the "organization" is supposed to be behind Assemblyman Leeds for the nomination to succeed Savage. Leeds has more ability than Savage, while being equally obedient. They may both run, in which event the nomination of Gates may be looked upon as a foregone conclusion. The district takes in San Pedro, which, politically speaking, is not the good end. Savage or Leeds may carry that, but the heavy end of the district is in southwestern Los Angeles where, at the last city election, Mayor Alexander received 6,628 votes to 3,775 for Smith. That vote should make it easy for Gates, in fact a walkover. The state senate has need for just such men.

competences, they are very far from being in the millionaire class. Mr. Anderson has announced that his expenditures will be small and to help Stanton make his campaign his friends have raised a subscription. Neither are the millionaires seeking the election to the United States senate under the direct primary, although they used to be candidates occasionally in the days of the nominating convention. Judge Works is not rich, and Frank Flint, the only organization candidate in view, thinks himself too poor to run, although it is said he is worth $100,000 or more. As for the candidates for less important offices, they are nearly all of such small means that they will be very glad to get the salaries attached to the offices they are seeking. In short, it is not a millionaire campaign, but more nearly a poor man's campaign.

this law originated in a suggestion made in his retiring message by Governor Pardee, which was taken up and worked into shape by Governor Gillett. The legislator who makes the claim to its authorship received the bill from Governor Gillett and introduced it, but that is all he did. It was known to every member as "the governor's bill," and it needed no other influence to put it through the legislature. The fly on the chariot wheel hardly exercised less influence on the outcome of the race than was exerted by the statesman who claims to be the author of this piece of constructive legislation simply because of the accident that his name happened to be connected with it. His name was indeed printed on the top of the bill when it was introduced, but that circumstance was in no way important, because he neither conceived, nor composed nor passed the measure.

"THE GOD FROM THE MACHINE"

Poor Men Are Not Shut Out Although the cry has been raised that under the direct primary law poor men can not afford to run for office, and the finger has been pointed at the Stephenson case in Wisconsin and the Bourne instance in Oregon to prove the advantage which wealth gives, it can not be said that money is playing any conspicuous part in the campaign now on in California. As a matter of fact, the men running for office are generally poor, and the few exceptions to the rule are not millionaires. Three of the candidates for governor, Johnson, Curry and Ellery, are without fortunes, and although Anderson and Stanton are supposed to possess

The Gentleman's Tire Will Get Punctured Some of the candidates now before the people are good claimers. Without mentioning names, which might be unpleasant, it is sufficient to say that several gentlemen who have served in the legislature, and who are aspirants for various positions of trust and profit, are pluming themselves upon accomplishments to which their title will not be generally conceded. To mention just one instance, a prominent candidate includes in his long list of "claims" the law establishing the state engineering department and giving it control over all constructional work. Now, every one ought to know that

A Little Unpleasantness In the Organization Camp

In the list of "those present" at the banquet of the Stanton boosters in Los Angeles the other evening appeared the names of Mott Flint, Brader Lee and W. J. Jeffries, known in local political circles as "the Flint bunch." Mott Flint is a brother of Senator Frank P. Flint, and his presence at the banquet, together with other members of the "bunch," indicates clearly that the Flint influences are behind Stanton in his gubernatorial candidacy. Naturally this feature of the banquet has not escaped the attention of the supporters of Charles F. Curry, nor of the friends of Alden Anderson, and there is an unsheathing of knives all the way down the line in order to have them ready for use in case Senator Flint wobbles back into the race for the United States senate. The Curry supporters in the south are said to be indignant over the Flint-Stanton alliance. Until the lining up of the Flint forces behind Stanton, the latter's candidacy was not taken seriously, and there were persistent rumors that his nominating petition would never be filed. Now, however, Stanton's candidacy wears a more substantial look, at least in Los Angeles.

They Will Have to Face Their Records

The People's Lobby, established at the opening of the legislative session of 1909, under the auspices of the Direct Legislation League of California, for the purpose of furnishing to the people a faithful record of the attitude of the members of each house on vital issues, is beginning to receive from various sections of the state requests for detailed information regarding the quality of service rendered by members of one house or the other during the late session. This fact may be taken as evidence that the people are becoming more and more interested in the work of their chosen representatives at Sacramento. It is an encouraging sign of the times. Last winter, for the first time in the history of the state, the whole people, regardless of party or special interests of any character, found at the state capital an organization prepared to watch and report upon the actions of the makers of laws. That the work performed will be appreciated by the people as the information compiled is drawn upon by the editors of the state can not be doubted.

They Are Bound To Have the Best

Down in Los Angeles the Good Government forces always stand prepared to go to any length to secure the very best candidate for public office. Recently they have gone to Egypt to find the right man to stand as candidate for nomination as supervisor of Los Angeles county, Sidney A. Butler, who, as president of the Good Roads' Association, rendered magnificent service to the county, was intercepted at the base of Cheops with a message from the leading citizens of the southern town asking him to enter the supervisory race. Encouraged by the consent of such men as Judge John D. Works and W. J. Washburn, one of the big bankers of Los Angeles, to enter the council, and by the promise of a number of influential men of affairs to look after the details of his campaign, Mr. Butler, though in no sense an aspirant for office, gave his consent to make the run, and preparations for the contest in his behalf are well under way. The good government leaders in Los Angeles are not content to accept just fair timber. They are bound to have the best. When such men as Judge Works, William J. Washburn, George H. Stewart (formerly president of the Los Angeles chamber of commerce), and Sidney A. Butler consent to make the sacrifices entailed by their acceptance of responsible public posts, good citizens look forward with great hope and the camp of the machine becomes enshrouded with gloom.

Nye Unopposed By Democrats?

The Los Angeles Herald (Dem.), says: "Mr. Norton (chairman of the Democratic county central committee of Los Angeles county) and other Democratic authorities believe the Democrats will place no candidate in the field against Controller A. B. Nye, who has announced his candidacy for re-election on the regular Republican ticket. Therefore, it is said, Mr. Nye, at least, if not one or two others, may receive what to all intents and purposes will be the Democratic indorsement. There are reasons for this. Mr. Nye's record, say many political leaders of all parties, has been exceptionally clean and commendable. In Southern California there is no candidate whose announcement has elicited more favorable comment than that of Controller Nye, whose re-election is deemed important. Regardless of partisanship, he is liked generally because of his work. Mr. Nye was born in Stockton in 1853, and was for a number of years editor of the Oakland Enquirer. As secretary to Governor Pardee he devised the present plan of state taxation, which has been highly indorsed as the most practical and satisfactory yet known. When he took hold of the treasury he found the public money of the state lying useless in the vaults, earning nothing. He devised a system by which these state funds were put out on deposit and made to yield hundreds of thousands of dollars to enrich the state's treasury. He devised the inheritance tax plan, and through its later becoming a law, California became inestimably richer. He also developed the present system of reporting the revenues and expenditures of the various counties, whereby the state controller's office keeps its hand directly on the pulse of every public treasury and money channel in the state."

B. G. Taylor Likely Clerk of Supreme Court

It looks likely that B. Grant Taylor, of Saratoga, Santa Clara county, will be the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican candidate for clerk of the supreme court. B. Grant Taylor was born on a farm in the town of Collins, Erie county, New York, December 27, 1872, and lived the farmer boy life until his sixteenth year, when he entered the service of the Erie railway as telegraph operator, and four years later became a stenographer and held a position under the New York civil service in one of the State Hospitals for the Insane. In 1899 he came to California to make his home, and soon thereafter was married to Miss Lucretia Watson of Cupertino, Santa Clara county. Locating in San Jose, he was employed as stenographer in the law office of Hon. S. F. Leib, where he pursued the study of law, which he had commenced while in the hospital service in New York, and was admitted to the California bar in 1902. When Governor Pardee appointed Judge Leib to a position on the superior bench of Santa Clara county, made vacant by the promotion of Judge Lorigan to the supreme bench, Mr. Taylor became official court reporter of Department No. 1 of the superior court, and has continued in that position up to the present time. Soon after coming to the state, Mr. Taylor interested himself in political affairs, and has continued that interest, and performed what he conceived to be a citizen's duty by advancing the principles of the Republican party and clean politics at every opportunity. He has been a member of the county central committee for a number of years. During the last presidential campaign Mr. Taylor was secretary of the county convention and treasurer of the county central committee and one of the chief workers and speakers in that campaign, which elected every man on the Republican ticket. Mr. Taylor is also secretary-treasurer of the Santa Clara County Republican club, that is to include all active Republicans for organized effort in the coming elections. No man stands higher than Mr. Taylor in the esteem of all who know him. He has the absolute confidence of all the judges, lawyers and good citizens of Santa Clara county and is an ideal man for the position of clerk of the supreme court of the state of California.

Mayor Davidson to Fight "Red" Hayes

Mayor Davidson, of San Jose, is the man who is going up against Congressman E. A. (Red) Hayes. Insurgency in Congress is to get a squelching if Davidson can do it. And in a sense he has a fair chance, as things stand now, to make good. "Black" Hayes has angered the Curry supporters by coming out for Hiram Johnson, and Davidson will get the Curry votes for congressman. "Black" Hayes also angered another block of voters by beginning a campaign against the Lincoln-Roosevelt League some time ago, and going to the length of putting up a city ticket in San Jose. When he went over to the League that ticket was abandoned by Hayes, and the ticket's friends will also be after brother "Red's" scalp. Davidson will probably be re-elected mayor of San Jose. He will then resign, to run for congress, and, as the Labor Union party controls the city council, Walter G. Mathewson, Labor Union councilman, will be elected mayor by the council, with Davidson's approval, and Davidson will get the Union Labor vote for congress. Things look pretty dark for "Red" Hayes, unless the voters of his district rise up and support him en masse because of his record on Cannonism and insurgency.

Coggins a Poor Choice For Surveyor-General

The name of Clifford Coggins continues to be mentioned for surveyor-general, and if the organization should decide to pick a man to beat Kingsbury it would be as likely to take Coggins as any one else. He is a more plausible personage than Frank Wright of Sacramento or Victor Woods of San Luis Obispo, the two others who are talked about. Wright's father was surveyor-general, and Woods was Kingsbury's predecessor, but neither name suggests pleasant associations. Coggins was senator from Siskiyou and Shasta before old Elmer Weed got the job, and he is good-looking and ingratiating. He used to be a lumber-mill owner and judging from the energy he formerly expended in denouncing Secretary Hitchcock and Gifford Pinchot, he has some of the attributes of a Ballinger.

"Organization" Against Incumbents Endorsed

Since the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has endorsed for reelection four incumbents of state offices—Attorney-general Webb, Controller Nye, Surveyor-General Kingsbury and Treasurer Williams—organization newspapers are asking sarcastically whether it is reform to keep these office-holders in, and are saying that three of them owe their present positions to the Santa Cruz convention. True enough they do, but if the Santa Cruz convention, in all of its elements and influences, could be reassembled today it would not renominate any one of the four men. The railroad political bureau is openly or secretly against all of them, because it has discovered that it does not control them. The affected indignation of the organization press over the assumed inconsistency of the reformers is as nothing in comparison with the accusations it would be venting if the same men had failed of endorsement after the record of independence they have made.

A. H. Hewitt of Sutter Should Be Reelected

Assemblyman A. H. Hewitt of Sutter county is a candidate for reelection and nobody doubts that he will be chosen by an overwhelming vote. His record insures that, for he was one of the soundest men in the last two legislatures and also one of the ablest. He is never radical, in talk at least, but he is on the right side, and he is stable. It is understood that he will be a candidate for speaker if the anti-organization men control the assembly, and he would make

A MODEL NEW-TYPE LEGISLATOR

ALBERT E. BOYNTON, WHOM THE SIXTH DISTRICT SHOULD FORCE BACK INTO THE SENATE

By GEORGE D. LESLIE

Senator Albert E. Boynton, born and reared at Oroville, is a man of whom all Butte county may feel justly proud. He has served California well, being one of the best men in the state legislature, measured either by the standard of his record on important "test" votes or of his individual work in accomplishing results for the public good. Young in years but sage in counsel, and withal a mighty fine fighter, he has come to be recognized as a real leader among the men who stand for Right Things.

Career Began Early

Like the English statesman, Pitt, our Californian, Boynton, at the outset had to face the charge of being too young for official responsibility. This objection was raised despite the fact that Attorney Boynton was already recognized as one of the ablest lawyers, young or old, in Butte county, having worked his way through the law school at Ann Arbor, Mich., by reporting lectures in shorthand. Moreover, he was then rendering efficient service as city trustee of Oroville, having led a successful fight against police corruption in the local Chinatown. Yet to some he was still only the late Editor S. S. Boynton's son Albert, a member of the pioneer class of the Union high school and the boy who, on a dare from a schoolmate, took the examination for a high school teacher's certificate at the age of 19, passing with the highest percentage in the history of Butte county.

A Popular Candidate

Just as bravely now he entered the contest for state senator. After the Republicans nominated Albert Boynton, the Democrats had trouble in finding an opposing candidate. One Butte county man who had been mentioned (W. P. Lynch of Sterling City) refused to run against his personal friend, Albert Boynton. Others feared Attorney Boynton as too formidable an opponent. The Democrats actually nominated the late Jo. D. Sproul of Chico without permission, but he immediately declined to accept the nomination. As a last resort, the Democrats turned to Joseph Craig of Woodland, a much older man than Boynton and a former state senator from a San Francisco district. After first refusing the honor, he finally consented to make the sacrifice.

It was indeed a sacrifice. Craig barely held his own in Democratic Yolo and was literally swamped by the heavy majorities Boynton rolled up in Butte, Yuba and Sutter counties. Young Boynton had made such a vigorous campaign and had impressed people so favorably that he won a splendid victory. In fact, as a vote-getter he is truly a wonder.

He (Rep.) was elected state senator by a plurality of 2,718, or clear majority of 2,289 in a district that gave Bell (Dem.) for governor a plurality of 1,699, or majority over all of 603. Boynton ran far ahead of the most popular candidates on the Republican state ticket, his vote for senator totaling 7,015 against district totals of only 6,348 for Colgan (state controller), and 6,205 for Curry (secretary of state). Boynton likewise ran far ahead of popular candidates for county offices. In both Sutter and Yuba counties he received a greater plurality than any Republican candidate having party opposition. In Butte his plurality was greater by over 400 than that for any other winner.

Record on Test Votes

Inspired perhaps by his high vote, Senator Boynton proceeded to make a good record at the sessions of 1907 and 1909. The first session rather than the second gives the better test of the mettle of the man, because it takes more moral courage to stand for right things almost alone without popular support than to so stand with several others backed by strong public opinion.

His record in test votes on important measures has been splendid, especially in pioneer work for reform at the session of 1907. The brave few like Senator Boynton at this session had the satisfaction of finding their forces augmented at the next session after the people had been heard from at the intervening election. There were indeed marked increases in test votes on issues presented at both sessions. Thus, for the admission of Senator Bell (elected independently) to the Republican caucus there were in 1907 only 5 votes, but in 1909, under Senator Boynton's leadership, as many as 14. The senate vote for the anti-racetrack gambling bill rose from 11 to 33 and for an effective direct primary law from 11 to 27. In 1907 there was a vote of 17 for a state wide directory vote on United States senator (by the Oregon plan), as compared with the vote of 19 in 1909 against the advisory vote provided by assembly amendments to the senate's direct primary bill. The vote for an initiative constitutional amendment rose from 12 at the former session to 20 at the succeeding session. Against the change of venue bill there were 16 votes recorded in 1907 against 16 and 18, respectively, on two test votes in 1909. The vote for the railroad demurrage law rose from 9 at the former session to 30 at the next, and for the repeal of the special verdict act increased from 13 on the final test in 1907 to no less than 33 in 1909.

SENATOR ALBERT E. BOYNTON Of Butte County

Senator Boynton was also with the progressives on certain measures considered in 1907 alone. He was among the eight fighting the four-track railroad bill, the eleven opposing the press-gag bill, the seven against expelling newspaperman Lovernash for criticising legislators, and the nine voting against capital removal. Affirmatively, he was one of 25 voting for a bill against political contributions by corporations and his was one of the 21 sure votes for the anti-trust law duly enacted at this session after barely passing the senate. All these votes in 1907 show Senator Boynton's political foresight, or power in the present to read the future aright.

In his "Story of the California Legislature of 1909," Franklin Hichborn presents tables showing the stand of legislators on selected test votes. The record of Senator Boynton on the 16 votes chosen is given in the tables, as follows: For reform, 13; against, 1; absent, 2. The two votes he missed were on the Stanford mile-limit law, which was voted on twice successively one evening when there was a small attendance, ten senators missing the first vote and six the second. The single case where the tables in the appendix make Senator Boynton seem to have been against reform, in his vote on the motion to send the local option bill to the judiciary committee, is explained away by Mr. Hichborn himself in the following foot note in the body of his book.

"Senator Boynton was a consistent supporter of the Local Option bill from the beginning to the end of the session. He held, however, that the bill as originally drawn was not in proper form, and explained that he voted to have the bill returned to the committee that amendments, which he deemed necessary, could be made."

Besides being clear of blame in the apparent exceptions, Senator Boynton has the credit of having stood firmly for the cause of reform in 13 test votes on the following important matters: To admit Senator Bell to Republican caucus; direct primary bill (two separate occasions); anti-racetrack gambling bill; bill to abolish party circle on ballots (two separate occasions); railroad regulation bill; initiative constitutional amendment; local option bill (final vote); railroad commission constitutional amendment; change of venue bill (two separate occasions), and investigation of freight rates.

Individual Work

Besides voting right on all measures of general importance, Senator Boynton has also done much individual work in accomplishing results for the public good. In 1907, in co-operation with Assemblyman McConnell, he secured the enactment of a law providing explicitly for the sale of jute bags by the prison commissioners only after due public notice of intended sales at fixed prices and only to bona fide purchasers for individual use and in limited numbers. Senator Boynton also got a tie vote of 17 to 17 on a resolution of his own directing the prison commissioners to cancel certain sales by which single individuals had received very large numbers of these bags. After the session he caused suit to be successfully brought against the commissioners in this matter, paying all the costs himself, and thus eventually secured a fair distribution of jute bags to grain growers throughout the state.

In 1907 he also took charge in the senate of Assemblyman Devlin's bill to repeal the special verdict act of 1905. He did manage to secure the passage of the bill late one night, though it was defeated on reconsideration next day, heavy pressure being brought to bear to prevent the passage of the repealing bill. In 1909, on the opening day, Senator Boynton introduced the same measure as his own bill and this time finally secured its enactment. The repealing act wipes out an iniquitous provision through which juries in damage suits, by being compelled to render various special verdicts, could be tricked by shrewd lawyers into making inconsistent findings on which judgments were easily reversed on appeal. The repeal of the special verdict act is considered by union labor men one of the most important reforms effected at the session of 1909.

For Non-Partisan Judiciary

In 1909 Senator Boynton had charge of the bill providing for the arrangement of judicial candidates on the ballot without designation of party affiliations. He secured the passage of the bill through the senate and also defeated a motion to reconsider its passage there. The bill was fought hard in the assembly and by a combination of untoward circumstances was finally defeated there on the very last business day by being brought to a vote at an hour when a full attendance of assemblymen could not be obtained, the "aye" vote falling a few short of the necessary 41. The non-partisan judiciary bill is a measure for which Senator Boynton should lead a fully successful fight at the next session.

At the last session, with Assemblyman Hewitt, he took charge of the bill appropriating $400,000 to be spent in cooperation between federal and state officials in accomplishing the work of direct enforcement of the navigation of the Sacramento, San Joaquin and Feather rivers as recommended in the special report of the California debris commission and of federal government engineers of June 30, 1907. The bill was duly enacted into law and thus provides sufficient funds for important public improvements.

Gets District Appropriations

With all his zeal for general measures he does not forget local interests. Nor does his political independence prevent him from getting plenty of appropriations for his district. Those who would punish him for independence may be afraid to rouse his fighting spirit. The "machine" that set out to crush him would be shattered by his resistance.

Senator Boynton was the author of the act passed early in the session of 1907, appropriating $132,000 to provide for the erection of buildings, the construction of improvements, etc., at the University farm established at Davisville. This large appropriation ended all talk of moving the state farm away from Yolo county. Again in 1909 he was the author of a series of bills making further appropriations for the state farm, for additional buildings and furnishings and for the purchase of livestock, farm machinery, etc., these appropriations totaling $137,000.

He has also watched out well for the state normal school at Chico. In 1907 he secured an appropriation for furniture and equipment for this school, making a fight on the floor of the senate to raise the amount from a committee recommendation of only $5,000 to the sum of $7,000. In 1909, in co-operation with Assemblyman Costar, he got an appropriation of $30,000 for the erection of a training school building at the Chico state normal school.

Senator Boynton and Assemblyman Hewitt, working together, secured appropriations of $125,000 in 1907 and $150,000 in 1909 for immediate work in improving the navigation of the Sacramento, San Joaquin and Feather rivers. Senator Boynton in 1909 got an appropriation of $15,000 for the investigation and control of destructive plant diseases of cultivated plants in portions of the state not benefited by the Southern California pathological laboratory, this appropriation being a boon to his district. With Assemblyman Hewitt he also secured an appropriation of $12,000 for the improvement of cereal crops in California.

Senator Boynton has even performed the difficult legislative feat of securing the adoption of amendments to the general appropriation act. Of the mere $39,500 added to this budget bill by the senate in 1909, no less than $36,500 (or all except $3,000) was obtained by Senator Boynton for the Davis state farm. Moreover, of about $4,000,000 in special appropriations in 1909 for state institutions and local improvements no less than $744,000 (including the $400,000 for river improvements), or between one-fifth and one-sixth of all, was obtained by Senator Boynton and his assembly colleagues for the sixth senatorial district.

His Personal Attributes

Senator Boynton's great worth as a legislator, like his success as lawyer and business man, is due to certain admirable qualities that are no less meritorious in him because they happen to be simple and attainable by others. In literature and art, after all, whatever is truly great is also simple and plain. The noblest human characters may likewise be built on the simplest, humblest virtues.

Albert Boynton, to begin with, is a good, hard worker, making up by industry whatever he may lack in genius. As a legislator he is prompt and regular in attending sessions of the state senate. Moreover, he is always present not only in body but also in mind, being well primed with knowledge from faithful attendance at his own committee meetings or well posted on other matters from his intimate acquaintance with colleagues on all committees. Knowing both measures and men and watching all things closely and systematically, he is pretty sure not to be misled on any legislative action.

At the session of 1907, his first, Senator Boynton was a member of the following committees: Agriculture and dairying; elections and election laws; fruit and vine interests; irrigation; judiciary; mines and mining (chairman), and municipal corporations. His committees at the session of 1909 were as follows: Finance; irrigation; judiciary; labor; capital and immigration; mines and mining (chairman), and municipal corporations. The promotion to the important, hard-working finance or "budget" committee at the second session was won by Senator Boynton's industrious service at the former session on the judiciary committee, the other leading senate committee.

His Persistency

To Senator Boynton's indomitable persistency is due the final repeal of the special verdict act of 1905 at the session of 1909. Nothing daunted by his failure to secure the repeal in 1907, Senator Boynton renewed the fight in 1909, and overcoming all opposition, won a signal victory at last. This quality of hanging on with bulldog tenacity augurs well for the enactment of the non-partisan judiciary bill at the coming session of 1911, if the measure is again entrusted to Senator Boynton. He put it through the senate all right in 1909 and almost secured its safe passage through the assembly, the bill being defeated there at the very end of the session by sharp manipulation.

Without being a natural-born genius, Albert Boynton does possess marked powers of application and concentration. He can throw himself wholly into a subject, becoming oblivious to surroundings. When he is watching out for a measure committed to his care or when he is following the debate on an important measure, his face begins to flush from the excitement of the quickened brain action and his eyes take on a sparkle. When he has his spirits roused he fights like a lion.

HE CAME to them in a snow storm out of the darkness and cold. There was a sound of shuffling feet at the door and above the rattling of shutters and driving of the wind a piping voice was heard calling, "Monsieur, open. Open, or I perish."

Abner Hardy, startled from his accustomed dozing by the fire after tea, sprang to the door, and, throwing it open wide, caught in his arms the stiffening form of a half-grown boy too much exhausted to stand upon his feet.

The lad was brought before the great fireplace, the snow brushed off him and his benumbed feet and limbs speedily chafed into normal circulation. This, supplemented by not stimulants and a hearty supper, so far revived the youth that he was able to tell who he was and where he came from.

"I am from Stanstead over the border," he said, brokenly. "My father is long ago dead, so long I can not remember, and now my mother, she, too, is gone, last fall, to my father; and my stepfather, he beat me because I take for myself this ring which my mother gave. He say I did steal it, but it was not so. It is not to steal if I take only what my mother gave with commandment, saying, 'Keep it always, my son. It was your father's. I have no other thing to give you.' And then she did die. My stepfather will be punished for his cruelty to my mother and to me. It can not be otherwise."

"See," he said holding up to view a massive gold ring, "It has my father's name on the inside. Gaspar Gautier; that was my father's name and it is mine. You see I have the ring again. I watched my chance to take it and came away forever into another country where my stepfather can not find me to beat me. I must find another home and work to do. Now you know all. I wish that I could stay here always, it is so pleasant and so warm. Ah! how the wind wails and cries. It has no pity. Nothing in the world has pity. The snow was so deep and I had come so far without food that I could not go farther. I should have perished."

The lad was thinly clad and meanly, and there was that about him which told of underfeeding long continued and blood impoverishment. His features were small and complexion swarthy, and his hair and eyes were black as the night out of which he had come.

Annabel, tearful and timid, yet quick to perform any helpful act which opportunity afforded, had been hovering near the dark little stranger ever since his coming, and when he artlessly expressed the wish that he might live with them always, their home being so pleasant and warm, she threw discretion to the winds and unhesitatingly championed the proposition; but her mother, drawing her gently to her side and stroking her temples tenderly, checked her childish enthusiasm by saying, "We shall see what is best, my dear. It is your bedtime now."

When the child had gone to her alcove and weary Gaspar had been tucked into a warm bed over the kitchen, Isabel could not refrain from saying, "If he only should prove to be the right kind of a boy, Abner. You do so need help about the chores, you know," but she, in turn, suffered a checking of her castle-building, for Abner, having covered the embers, rose and taking the candle said, "We shall see what is best, my dear. It is bedtime now."

Abner and Isabel, with overmuch of worldly prudence, had not married until late in life, so that Annabel was at once their only child and child of their old age. The hundred daily errands of her willing feet were most acceptable to both father and mother, and yet as the cares of life took on the weight of added years they wished the more fervently that a son had also been born to them. Now that this waif had come to their door, providentially as it seemed, Abner himself entertained more than half a hope that they might see their way clear to make him a member of the family, but Abner Hardy was not a man to take a step of any importance without first seeing his way clear. He had lived a life more prudent than eventful, more just than sympathetic or charitable. He had been thrifty without being covetous and was now well-to-do, according to the measure of his time and neighborhood, without being exempt from hard toil every working day in the year.

On the morning after the coming of Gaspar, as soon as breakfast was over and the dishes done, Annabel put on her cap and cloak and ran through the snow to tell "Our Hiram" the wonderful news. Deacon Mitchell's farm was the very next one down the valley and the house was not above half a mile from Abner Hardy's, but the snow was deep and the drifts were high and Annabel was quite out of breath by the time she had gotten there.

"Oh, Hiram!" she exclaimed, as soon as she had gotten within hearing distance of the lad who had come to meet her, "You can not guess what we've got at our house. You couldn't guess if you were to try all winter long. I've got a little brother only just a bit bigger than I am, but he must be ever so much older. He came to us last night in the storm and was almost dead from hunger and cold, but he is all right this morning and is the funniest little fellow you ever saw in all your life. He calls papa 'mo-she' and mamma 'ma-dam,' and me, he calls me 'mam-zell.' Mamma says that's because he is French and that all French people talk that way."

Our Hiram quite agreed with Annabel that so unusual an occurrence deserved investigation at once, and hand in hand they dashed away through the snow to enable Our Hiram to pay his respects to the newcomer.

Gaspar was found just emerging from the barn, having put his shovel away after clearing a wide path through the snow from the barn to the house.

"This is Our Hiram, Gaspar," Annabel called, coming up to him. "I told you all about him this morning, you remember. I have told him all about you, too. He is a big, strong fellow, isn't he? But he is awfully good to me. How old are you, Gaspar?"

"I was fifteen last fall, Mademoiselle," Gaspar replied, doffing his cap and bowing respectfully, yet looking askance at Our Hiram.

"Fifteen! Oh you little runt!" Hiram cried, stepping to the side of the diminutive stranger and stretching forth his arm above the other's head. "Why, I will not be fifteen for more than a month and your head don't come up to my shoulder. O, you little runt!" And the big fellow, stooping suddenly, caught the lesser one by the waist and tossed him sprawling into the bank of snow.

When Gaspar emerged from the drift it was with snapping eyes and sullen looks. "Oh! Hiram, you ought not to have done that," Annabel cried, and yet she could not help laughing at the little visitor's crestfallen appearance.

Our Hiram, seeing that his boisterous introduction had not been taken in good part, and the better to make a jest out of the affair, caught up Annabel and, tossing her into the drift, turned a somersault and, himself, landed in the midst of the heap so hard that scarcely more than his boots were observable sticking out. At this prank Annabel laughed immoderately and even Gaspar was provoked into a passable state of humor. At all events the young people were mutually acquainted now and any further formality of introduction could well be dispensed with.

Of four children born to good Deacon Mitchell and his wife only Hiram had survived, and all the world beside was not so dear to them as he. "Well now, our Hiram," the Deacon was wont to begin by way of preface to telling of something the lad had said or done, and the mother, too, never wearied of talking of "Our Hiram."

At first the people in the neighborhood, who, usually, had been blessed with more children than they could adequately clothe and feed, were inclined to smile at the doting parents' simple mindedness, but as the lad grew toward manhood, light hearted, athletic and strong, winning his way to the hearts of all, the neighbors fell into the ways of the old folks and spoke of him as "Our Hiram," too.

"What do you think of Our Hiram, Gaspar?" Annabel asked as the stalwart youth went bounding homeward, like a greyhound, through the snow.

"Ah! he is very grand, Mademoiselle," Gaspar said, rather bitterly, Annabel thought. "Is it good to be what he did call me a r-r-runt? I do not know r-r-runt. It can not be good, whatever to be a r-r-runt. Many times my stepfather did say that God did not make me to be any good thing, and I think it must be very bad in this country to be a r-r-runt."

For the first time in her life Annabel felt an influence about her that was not wholesome, and she went into the house with moistened eyes and a heavy heart, but when her mother asked her what the trouble was for the life of her she could not tell, only that Our Hiram had playfully called Gaspar a little runt and Gaspar did not know what it meant and thought it must be a very bad thing to be a runt.

Gaspar fell readily enough into the routine of chore work for Abner and his family and soon made himself so nearly indispensable that Abner wondered how he had ever gotten on without him. He was respectful in rendering service and forgot not the smallest detail. He attended the district school with Our Hiram and Annabel and struggled hard to learn, although to poor advantage, for he understood English imperfectly, had been to school little and was far behind the other children of his age. Thus handicapped, he seemed to the other children to be stupid, often blundered and was laughed at unmercifully by the hearty young barbarians who, without a trace of malice, made life almost a burden to him.

There was something about the youth that teacher nor pupils, Abner nor Isabel, could quite make out. He was much alone and, while neither sulky nor ill tempered, either brooded or dreamed a very great deal, but whether it was brooding or dreaming no one could feel quite certain.

The winter wore away, the snow began to melt on the hillsides and the ice to break up in the little river preparatory to going out when the water should get a little higher. Then came the last snowfall of the season, a warm, wet snow that packed easily and afforded manifestly the last chance for coasting for that winter. It being Saturday afternoon, and the Sunday school lessons having been learned, a number of school children gathered upon the hill above the river for a final coasting frolic.

Our Hiram came by for Annabel with his big sled and, seeing Gaspar standing listlessly by the barn door, called to him to join them, but Gaspar was having one of his brooding days and seemed reluctant to join them. "Oh, come along, you little black beast," cried Hiram, joyously. "why mope like an owl this beautiful day? Come along, I say, and let's have some fun."

"Oh, yes, do," Annabel called, and he went.

The hill road down which the merry coasters went was long and winding and, at one point, came dangerously near to the river's brink, but with a skilful turning of the sled by a careful steerer all would go gaily to the foot of the hill. In colder weather, when the ice on the river was firm, the braver ones were wont to plunge over the steep river bank and glide out upon the bosom of the river, but few girls dared attempt a feat so perilous.

"You take me down first," Annabel called to Gaspar, with a childish desire to brighten up the boy's heavy looks, "and I want to go on Our Hiram's sled, too." The boy's eyes brightened at the invitation and he looked eagerly into Our Hiram's eyes for an approving look. The big fellow, whirling his sled into position, cried back, "Why, of course, pile on, both of you, down you go, but, you runt, look out that you make the turn right at the bend or you'll get a ducking sure."

It was a bigger sled than any of the others, for there was no one else so strong as Our Hiram to draw it up the hill again, and Gaspar, at home as he was on the snow, had never undertaken to manage it. Perhaps he was not quite himself that afternoon. Gliding with the swiftness of the wind, he and his precious freight drew near to the turn of the road, he threw out his foot to make the turn, hitched, twisted, turned, almost made it, then over the brink the big sled bounded and on out upon the spongy, rotten, snow-covered ice. There was a scream, a crash and a smash, and girl, boy and sled were floundering in the chill water.

Gaspar grasped the upturned sled, drew Annabel to it and struggled to get her out of the water, but to no avail, for he was over his depth and not strong enough to lift her upon it and she was too badly frightened to help herself. It must have gone hard with Gaspar and Annabel, for the river was beginning to rise, the current was swift and threatened momentarily to sweep them under the ice, had not Our Hiram taken in the situation at a glance, grasped the sled nearest him and plunged down the hillside and over the river bank aiming directly for the struggling children. In a moment he was by their side and in the water to his arm pits. He was strong and soon had Annabel out of the water lying flat upon the ice, and then the sled, bottom up with Annabel crouching in the middle of it.

Then he turned his attention to Gaspar, who, struggling with the current, was trying to lift himself upon the ice and yet keep himself from being drawn under it. "Oh! you little black beast," Our Hiram cried, "I'll have to give you a good sousing for that mischief." Suiting the action to the word he ducked the sputtering lad again and again over head and ears and then tossed him out upon the ice with a hearty spank, to crawl, sprawling and dripping, to the shore the best way he could, while Our Hiram carefully drew Annabel to safety on the upturned sled.

Now that the danger was over the other children gathered about Our Hiram and cheered him lustily, but Gaspar they taunted with being a sissy and vowed that Uncle Abner ought to take him across his knee for his carelessness, showing no mercy for his crestfallen appearance nor caring for the humiliation which the mishap had caused him to suffer.

The three were hurried home, thoroughly soaked, but not much the worse, so far as Our Hiram and Annabel were concerned, for their ducking; but with Gaspar it was different. This little misadventure was the pivot upon which turned the needle that pointed to the path his feet were to tread the rest of his life.

(To the Reader: This little story is a double-ender. Having brought the principal character to the parting of the ways, next week I shall conclude the story on the hypothesis that he takes the right hand road. The week following I shall attempt a solution of the problem on the hypothesis that he takes the left. The reader will be at liberty to choose the ending that seems to him to be the more reasonable and fitting, all the probabilities of the case being considered.)

session of 1909 the lines were drawn so closely between the reformers and so-called performers that each side could check the other to some extent. The performers had not enough votes in the senate to secure concurrence in assembly amendments which were objectionable, on principle, to the reformers. There were other assembly amendments, however, which were generally conceded to be necessary for the technical correctness of the proposed law. This situation gave the performers a chance to turn a clever trick on the reformers, which eventually led to the enactment of the direct primary law in a form unsatisfactory to the reform senators. The first disclosure of this trick came as the vote was being taken in the senate on the minor assembly amendments, the performers voting against concurrence where concurrence had been expected as a matter of course. As the roll call proceeded and the first few senators had their votes recorded, one could observe even from back in the gallery the look of deep chagrin or sheer disgust that began to spread over Senator Boynton's flushed face. For he saw through the trick at once, though powerless to prevent its execution.

Albert Boynton's industry and other powers might count for less were it not for his personal charm. He is a man of pleasing personality who gets along well with all sorts and conditions of men.

His popularity with others is due largely to his friendliness to others. He does not point out the faults of an opponent but is content to let his own virtues speak for themselves. He is generous, too, in allowing others to share in credit for good legislative work. It never matters to him if a district appropriation is based on his own senate bill or that of an assembly colleague. He has stood aside with an important measure rather than imperil public interests by seeking personal credit. At the 1909 session he introduced a stringent bill on railroad car demurrage but as Senator Miller, three days later, introduced a bill on the same subject Boynton let his own bill die in committee and helped his colleague pass the less stringent measure. Senator Miller having led the fight on this issue at the prior session.

In Direct Primary Debate

To be liked for friendly ways means less to a man, in the long run, than to be respected for real worth. Albert Boynton would not be popular at the expense of his integrity nor will he win favor by sacrificing honor. With all his personal charm he is still a man of fire and force.

In the first senate debate on the first primary bill, the proponents of the direct primary idea had advanced weighty constitutional arguments fully justifying their contentions, while the opponents of the pending measure urged mainly that it be referred back to the committee, pleading that this would cause only the slight delay of a day or so. In closing the discussion for the advocates of the original direct primary bill, Senator Boynton replied to this coaxing plea for only a little more time in a manner so forcible as to be almost unkind. Throwing into his remarks the force of righteous indignation, he frankly denounced the request for slight delay as merely a cunning effort to secure a postponement that might prove fatal to the pending measure. Continuing, he explained that, as all present well knew, arrangements had already been made for senate committees to visit state institutions at remote points and that, in fact, some senators had actually planned to begin their journeys that very afternoon or evening. Consequently, unless the direct primary bill was voted on within the present hour it would be impossible within a fortnight or more to muster together enough votes to pass the measure at all. Moreover, if the one day's delay, which would inevitably mean a fortnight's postponement, should be used for further pressure to be brought to bear upon senators to violate their pledges, the direct primary idea might be defeated altogether by the amendment of the bill in objectionable ways. In short, Senator Boynton scornfully denounced the coaxing plea for only a little delay as nothing else than an artful device to secure a fatal postponement. There was no answer to this argument. In fact, when the vote was thereupon taken with Senator Boynton's stirring words still echoing through the chamber, some opponents of the direct primary idea were actually shamed by his scorn into voting for it at this time, the division being instead of the expected 22 to 18 no less than 27 to 13.

An Admirable Character

All things considered, Albert Boynton's greatest attribute is not industry, natural ability, personal charm, nor fire and force but simply an inborn nobility of character. He abhors whatever is wrong just as a pure woman abhors all that is tainted. Similarly, he takes his stand for Right Things naturally. He would be out of his element were he on any but the righteous side of public questions.

Having sound judgment and a sharp conscience he can not be cajoled, nor persuaded, nor driven into any wrong action. Starting right he stays right. As a matter of personal pride he always keeps faith with colleagues as with constituents. With him, campaign speeches are serious utterances. As a candidate in 1906 he declared himself in favor of a direct primary law and of the popular election of United States senators. As state senator in 1907 he voted in committee to force the Stetson direct primary bill to a vote on the floor of the senate and there, of course, stood among the few supporting the measure. At the opening of the session of 1909 he attended a coalition caucus at which certain Republican and Democratic senators agreed to stand together in support of the Wright direct primary bill in its original form. However it may have been with anyone else along toward the end of the session, there was never any wavering in adherence to the understanding reached at this conference on the part of Senator Boynton. It would have been contrary to the nature of the man for him to have broken the word he gave colleagues at the opening of the 1909 session or to have violated his pledges to constituents away back in 1906.

a very good one. If the California legislature is to be reformed, the next assembly must have a speaker who does not belong to the type of the Prescotts, the Beardslees and the Stantons. To have a first-class man for speaker will be a full half of the victory. There may be other candidates deserving consideration, but the list is well started with the name of Mr. Hewitt.

Democrats in a Big Conference The Democratic conference at Los Angeles, next Tuesday and Wednesday, will be a representative gathering of several hundred of the Unterrified from all parts of the state. It will probably do nothing but get acquainted all around, give each delegate an accurate idea of the strength of the various candidates for Democratic nominations, and help to unify Democratic campaign efforts from then to the primaries. A platform will not be adopted, but probably a Democratic battle-cry to the public will be issued that will form a tentative expression of the Democratic plan of campaign.

Theo. A. Bell Likely To Have Clear Field Theodore A. Bell will probably not be opposed at the primary and his nomination seems a foregone conclusion. This is as it should be. The better men who have been mentioned as his opponents have not cared to run against him. The S. P. machine has hawked its support to a dozen, in hopes of getting anybody to beat Bell, but the offer has been turned down by every man so far, E. O. Miller, of Visalia, being the latest to decline the proffered gold-brick. Bell represents the best ideals of the party, and, in the now most unlikely event of the defeat of Hiram Johnson at the primary, would receive the support of thousands of independent Republicans. In the same way, if Bell should lose out at the primary, Johnson would get a goodly percentage of his adherents in November.

Democrats Claim Four Congressmen The Democrats hope to win four of the congressional districts this year:

the first, second, fifth and sixth. They believe that the stand-pat stand of Republican congressmen on the issue of Cannonism, and the insurgent unrest in the country, will swing the sentiment for Democratic congressman. It should not be forgotten by the Democrats, however, that this same insurgent unrest is giving lots of Democrats the conviction that they will find themselves at home as insurgent Republicans, with the result that many of them are registering as Republicans in order to be on hand for the fighting where they think they can do the most good.

Suggestions for Club Organization In politics, without organization nothing, with nothing but organization mischief. There is something despicable in the prevailing custom of referring to such and such districts as being the property of such and such politicians. Those districts should belong to the voters in those districts and to no one else, and the need is for a system of club organization in such districts that will enable the voters within each party to assert themselves. Mr. H. S. Allen has worked out a plan that should commend itself to club organizers all over the state and especially in the cities. Briefly it consists in, first, a monthly executive committee meeting at the lunch hour for general conferences; a committee of workers in each precinct; annual banquets for the whole membership with election of officers for the ensuing year; the initiative by which 10 per cent. of the club membership may institute any proceeding deemed advisable without relying wholly upon the executive committee to do things; a referendum whereby a postal card vote of the entire membership may be had on any important issue rather than to leave the decision to a majority vote of those who chance to be present at a meeting; the signatures on the postal cards to be compared with the signatures on the roll for verification. This would, in the opinion of Mr. Allen, develop a fine and wide-spread interest in the club, provide adequate funds, inaugurate broad politics, stimulate active precinct work, bring the membership into personal touch, secure cooperation among the officers and furnish a safety valve to prevent dissatisfaction where snap action may be thought to have been taken by referring important matters to the whole membership. These suggestions are fine. That sort of organization affords opportunity for leadership without bossism, for efficiency without giving any man a title to a district in fee simple to have and to hold. It is Democratic in that the common man may have both the power to initiate and the power finally to determine. It is Republican in that it is representative as far as the representative factor is safe. It is heartily commended as a proper club organization system to be followed throughout the state.

Judge Lennon Endorsed For Appellate Court Judge Thomas J. Lennon, of Marin county, was endorsed by the executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, as candidate for justice of the district court of appeals for the first district, to succeed the presiding justice, J. A. Cooper. Judge Lennon's record in Marin county has been excellent, and he has earned this call to a wider sphere of usefulness. He has, besides a sound preparation in the law and a long experience on the bench, a human quality that is reflected in a most engaging personality and that is part of a commonsense idea of the relation of the law to everyday life which is much needed on the bench. Judge Cooper, whom Judge Lennon will probably succeed, has made a not too enviable record in the appellate court. Judge Lennon offers a refreshing opportunity to change that court's personnel for the better.

MAJORITY VERDICTS BY JURIES

Editor The California Weekly.

The grand jury which has just completed its labors in Alameda county closes its report with the following:

"In the prosecution of criminal cases in the county of Alameda, every person interested in good government cannot help but feel that splendid results are being attained, yet, from a close observation, we are of the opinion that the criminal law of the state of California, which requires a unanimous verdict in a criminal case, is not in keeping with the progress of the present age. In civil cases a three-fourths verdict is all that is necessary and we are of the opinion that in criminal cases the law should be so amended that a unanimous verdict should not be necessary."

The present system of trial by twelve men of parties indicted for crime, and an unanimous verdict by the entire panel, is a remnant of ancient jurisprudence, when the rights of the commonalty were so little respected by their social superiors, as to require the strongest safeguards possible.

Times and conditions have changed since then, especially in this country; and the absurdity of the system at the present day is exposed by a simple illustration.

At any fair and honest election a majority of a single vote will elect a Governor of the State, who for any, or no reason, can pardon any man whom twelve men have with one consent declared guilty of a crime which deserves capital punishment.

If it requires a unanimous verdict of the men trying the case and affixing the penalty, why should it not require a like unanimity on the part of the voters to elect a man with power to set aside their verdict?

Our entire government is based upon the principles of the majority rule, and with the proper application the rule is a good one; and as conditions now are, were it applied to the findings of verdicts in our courts, it would reduce to a minimum the number of "hung" juries, in a larger degree lessen the labors of high-priced attorneys in their efforts to get their men on the jury, and of the prosecuting attorney in trying to keep them off.

If the lawyers for the "higher-ups" (say for instance in Pittsburg) were compelled to get five of the jurymen of their kind on the jury to try their clients, in order to effect a disagreement, they would hardly think it worth their while to make the attempt, while it may for a price be possible to secure one.

If the statute should be changed to enable a majority to find a verdict in civil suits; of two-thirds in criminal cases, and three-quarters when the life of the accused is at stake, the action of the court, council, and jurors would be very much expedited, and justice more generally awarded than is the case under the present system.

The fight just now is to get the government back into the hands of the people; when this is done, and we have a legislature nominated and elected by "we, the people," then we will have the opportunity, and I trust the wisdom to enact such regulations for our courts and juries as will make it easier to punish the wrong-doer than it is at present, even though the offender be a "higher-up" or even a transportation company.

Yours for good government,
E. C. WILLIAMS.

It is reported that within the next ninety days work will be begun on an extension of the Northern Electric from Sacramento to Vallejo, whence a fast steamer will carry passengers to San Francisco.

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.
ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof. Defendants.
No. 20,137. Dept. —
The People of the State of California:
To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:
You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:
Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.
Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).
And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:
That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.
WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.
[Seal of Superior Court] H. I. MULCREVY, Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE, Deputy Clerk.
Memoranda.
The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.
The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:
The City and County of San Francisco, whose address is at the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Holding the Primary Election

The initial step in holding a state primary election is taken by the Secretary of State, who, at least sixty days prior to the third Tuesday in August, must prepare and transmit to each county clerk a notice designating the offices for which candidates are to be nominated. The next step consists in the county clerk publishing, within ten days after receipt of notice, so much of the notice received from the Secretary of State as applies to his county, and this publication must continue once a week for six weeks in not more than two papers in the county.

In preceding lessons we have covered all the steps from this initial proceeding through the preparation and filing of nomination papers, preparing the ballot and setting forth who may and who may not vote at a primary. This lesson has to do with the physical holding of the election itself.

There must first be a place legally designated for holding such elections and it is made the duty of the Board of Supervisors to designate the polling places and arrange for them at least twenty-five days before the day of the election, in default of which the justice of the peace of the township must designate such place.

There must be officers to conduct the election. These are designated by the Board of Supervisors, and there must be two inspectors, two judges and two clerks, and they must be apportioned equally between the two parties casting the two highest votes at the last general election.

The polls must be opened at 6 o'clock in the morning and must not be closed until six o'clock in the evening, but before they are opened the election officers must post four copies of the index to the voting list of that precinct where access may be had to them by the voters and the county clerk must have provided the election officers with a complete set of the original affidavits of registration. There must also be needful voting booths with desk room, inking pad and stamp for marking the ballots. Thus equipped the voting may begin.

The voter goes to the index and ascertains his index number and, having obtained it, advances to the bar of the election board and asks for a ballot, giving his name and index number. While the clerks are looking up his registration blank he takes his seat at the table provided for that purpose and writes his name and address on the precinct roster. Meantime one of the ballot clerks finds his original registration blank and announces the name in an audible tone of voice, the other ballot clerk having likewise announced it as soon as written on the roster. Here is the time when the voter's right to vote is to be challenged, if at all.

The only grounds upon which his right to vote can be challenged are: That he is not the person whose name appears on the registration affidavit; that he has not resided in the state a year, the county ninety days or the precinct thirty; that he has not been naturalized as required by law; that he has voted before on that day; that he has been convicted of an infamous crime; that he has been convicted of the misappropriation or embezzlement of public money.

If there be no challenge of the elector's right to vote, the ballot clerk in charge of the ballots gives him the ballot of the party with which he declared his intention to affiliate when he registered and shows him how to fold it. The voter then takes the ballot of his party to a vacant polling booth and there, alone with his conscience and his God, stamps the little "X" opposite the names of those for whom he wishes to vote. He then goes to the inspector in charge of the ballot box, hands him his ballot and the inspector calls out the name of the voters and the number of his ballot as printed on the margin of the back side of the ballot. The ballot clerk in charge of the roster looks to see if the ballot number called corresponds with the number on the roster and, if it does, he calls back the name and number and the inspector slips the ballot into the box and one more elector has voted.

When the polls have closed the election officers must proceed to canvass the ballots in full public view. They first take the ballots from the box and count them unopened to see that the number corresponds with the number of names registered as having voted. If there are too many ballots enough are drawn from the ballot box without looking at them to make the number correspond, and these are destroyed in the presence of all.

The next step is to separate the ballots of each political party, count and string them separately. Then the ballots belonging to each party are separately canvassed and the results separately recorded on tally sheets, and the totals posted. The ballots, tally sheets, poll lists, and all other paraphernalia of the election, are then properly sealed up and sent to the county seat and delivered to the clerk of the Board of Supervisors and, on Thursday of the week in which the election was held, the Board of Supervisors must meet to canvass the returns of all the precincts of the county. As soon as this count is completed, and the results are tabulated, the clerk of the board must transmit the results, regarding other than candidates for county officers, to the Secretary of State.

Within twenty-five days after holding the primary election the Secretary of State must compile the results of the returns from all the counties of the state and make a record of the same in his own office.

The final step is to issue certificates of nomination to all who are nominated and, not less than twenty-five days before the holding of the general election in November, to notify the county clerks as to all those whose names are entitled to go upon the ballot to be voted at the general election.

Which ends this lesson.

Is It a Scheme?

IN HIS ADDRESS AT WASHINGTON Saturday last the President declared that if the Democrats should secure control of the House it would last only two years and then result in another long lease of power for the Republicans. Is that the scheme? Many utterances of the "organization" press give color to the suspicion. If so it is a long headed bit of political strategy not unattended by risk of disappointment. The Democrats might not prove greater blunderers or more sorry Bourbons than the standpatters. Would it not be better to try to fill the House with up-to-date Republicans, such a type of Republican as the President was believed to be when he was elected?

Why Gird at McCarthy?

THE CALIFORNIA WEEKLY RISES to protest against the assaults made upon Mayor McCarthy for having extended the redlight district of San Francisco and devoted its night life to tawdry gaiety and its day time to superabundant beer and booze. The gentleman is only redeeming his platform and other pre-election pledges to make San Francisco just as nasty as a liberal construction of lax laws, reenforced by barred doors, will permit. Moreover, 29,455 adult, male citizens voted that this is the kind of city they want to live in and rear their families in, while 33,070 men, who abhor such a city, divided their votes between two men, neither of them very good nor very bad. Wherein their culpability was not greatly less, and their imbecility more exaggerated, than in the case of the men of the McCarthy party. As San Francisco made its bed so must it lie in it unless, indeed, it resolutely kick McCarthy out of it, through the recall, and make it up over again, alleging as cause that he is redeeming his pre-election pledges whereas it was not suspected that he would—a breach of faith on his part. Such a procedure might be undertaken with advantage.

The New Conciliation

MAYOR MCCARTHY'S GOVERNMENT does not desire to go on strike against the domination of lower Market street until it has tried out the virtue of negotiation and conciliation in the hope of persuading, instead of forcing, the United Railroads to go down the inside tracks from Sansome to the ferry. If McCarthy has as much influence with the United Railroads as the United Railroads has with McCarthy that policy ought to work out splendidly.

The Fifth Anchor

THE PARDONING OF DUNCAN B. COOPER, one of the slayers of the late Senator Carmack of Tennessee, emphasizes the advantage of possessing what Judge Wilbur so aptly described as the fifth anchor to windward in the event that the other four, committing magistrate, trial court, court of appeal and supreme court, fail of setting an influential culprit free. Thank heaven, though, there is a tribunal before which those Coopers must one day stand that will pay as little regard to Governor Patterson's pardon as to the wind that bloweth where it listeth. "Thou shalt not kill."

Where Was the Other One?

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE TENDER by John Temple Graves of the affiliation of the Independence League to the Democracy of America, made at the Jefferson day banquet given at Washington, would have been more impressive if the whole Doodle-Dee contingent had been in evidence. John Temple Graves was on the spot, William Randolph Hearst was in Mexico, if not in New York, but where was the other one?

A Straight Tip

IF OUR SUFFRAGETTE FRIENDS WISH to know why it is that suffrage reform makes so little headway among men let them sit up in the gallery where they can look down upon any mixed audience in America and they will get a straight tip. Is it to be supposed that men, in their right minds, will deliberately vote to share the responsibilities of government with beings whose heads are covered with such carousals of form and color? Not while the world stands! A hat three foot one way and two foot 'tother is an unanswerable argument. There is no getting around it.

Mark Twain Ill

SAMUEL CLEMENS WAS SEVENTY-TWO years old last November and he is ill. As all men must die so must he and, very likely, very soon. Grim and taciturn, he is nevertheless the greatest humorist this country, perhaps the world, has produced and the light he will leave behind him will long shine upon the paths of men. Not living joyously, he has helped enough others to hours of healthful and helpful mirth to have outfitted a thousand careers for a thousand years, and he has proven himself a true philosopher as well as a friend to his race. May his passing-in be gentle and painless, not so swift as to dispense with need for courage or so long drawn out as to make him hope that each sunrise will be his last. Best California-Missourian of them all!

Anybody Can Do That

IT IS ANNOUNCED from the nation's capital that Hon. William Jennings Bryan has definitely retired from politics in order that he may the fuller devote his time and talents to morality and religion. It is sadly true that men in politics find little time, and less encouragement, for working at morality and religion, but no human activity needs that stimulus more or furnishes better opportunity for testing the strength of the materials. No man knows what his moral character will stand until he is subjected to pressure and nothing but a hydraulic cotton compress is comparable to the pressure politics can put a man under when the public interest is on one side and the interest of a great, rich corporation is on the other. God give us more men who will devote themselves to morality and religion in politics instead of out of politics! Anybody can do that.

Congratulations to Sacramento

SACRAMENTO has a beautiful and beautifully kept plaza in the heart of the city. It had no city hall. One portion of the people wished to build a city hall in the plaza, and so save the cost of buying a proper site for the city hall. Another portion wisely wished to save the plaza for the people forever and buy a site fronting the plaza. It was a case of penny wisdom and pound foolishness arrayed against a far-seeing public spirit and, congratulations to Sacramento, the far-seeing side won the day, the new city hall is now being occupied and everybody in Sacramento is feeling proud. "Once a plaza always a plaza," was as good an inheritance as California received from her Spanish predecessors. May other California cities profit by Sacramento's wise forbearance!

JUSTICE AS SHE IS ADMINISTERED

The San Francisco Call has stirred up an interesting discussion of the administration of criminal justice in this state in which a prison director charges that the superior court judges use little discretion in inflicting penalties; an appellate justice characterizes superior judges as mainly fools; superior judges retort that the appellate bench work rank injustice through narrow and technical decisions and that the board of prison directors would do well to look to their own system of paroling prisoners, a prolific source of criminality, as now conducted.

The worst these gentlemen say of each other falls short of the adequate except that superior judges are not mainly fools, being merely inadequately equipped for the performance of their high function.

If this discussion shall result in turning public attention to a crying need for reform it will prove well worth all the venom and printers' ink that can be spilled over it, for there can be no adequate remedying of a disgraceful evil until the public mind is more enlightened regarding the administration of justice than it now is. Let us look into the subject.

The attitude of the public mind toward the public offender of low degree is one of antipathy and vengefulness, whereas, in nine cases out of ten a clear unfolding of the life history of that criminal would show him as much sinned against as sinning, the victim of irresponsible parental nurture, of inadequate social provision for his adolescence or of pitfalls which society permits to entrap him. The superior judge who declared the first requisite of justice to be the infliction of punishment did not know what he was talking about. Justice should be redemptive first, preventive second and retributive only when all else has failed of restraining the culprit to good citizenship.

Most of those charged with crime are guilty. The reputation of a district attorney in his profession is proportionate to the number of convictions he secures. If guilty the accused ought to be convicted, and yet there are thousands abroad in the land who have reason to thank their fortunate stars that they were not brought to book for all the things they did between twelve and twenty-two. Their futures were hair-hung and breeze-shaken over the pit, yet they escaped where others were less fortunate. Society exaggerates the criminality even of serious offenses committed during adolescence, and many a fine career owes its success to a wise forbearance on the part of some officer of the law. No official stands in greater need of a sound discretion than the district attorney.

The jury is looked upon by the law as an assemblage of twelve imbeciles, and certain it is that law and custom have done their best to exclude from the panel all except imbeciles. It ill becomes an appellate court to criticize a superior judge when that court has so recently sent back for retrial a she-wolf convicted at great cost of an awful atrocity on the ground that the jury was incapable of distinguishing material evidence from immaterial, relevant from irrelevant, when the chances are even that the panel would compare favorably for sanity of judgment, sincerity of purpose and freedom from influence with the appellate bench itself. It too frequently happens that higher courts are not presided over by higher judges.

At the bar of the superior court the accused has more chances in his favor than against him and he is rarely pronounced guilty unless he is; but the fundamental fault is that neither judge, law nor public opinion knows what to do with a criminal when one has been caught and convicted. The state affords no proper provision for the convicted criminal, boy, woman or man. The judge has no adequate training in penology, psychology or the nature of the institutions to which he sends those who are convicted, and the result is that California metes out as many kinds of justice as there are judges sitting in the trial of criminal cases in the state. At the prison end of the travesty the product is grotesque. Malefactors get either hard "jolts" or soft "jolts" as the dice may have rattled out of the judicial box and all remedial effects, nearly, are eliminated when, in the freedom of prison mismanagement, "jolt" is compared with "jolt."

But the superior judge has had a chance to look the prisoner in the eye, to observe his facial expression, to hear the evidence and watch the witnesses while they testify, to hear the arguments from an attorney on one side determined to convict if possible, on the other to acquit if by hook or crook he can, and he stands a hundred times better chance to judge of the degree of criminality than any one else. A few superior judges are demagogues and pamper popular prejudices by "handling years as some folks do days," but these are men who were put on the bench by political intrigue rather than by popular choice, and the non-partisan selection of the judiciary will eliminate most of them.

Then, too, the superior judge performs his task under the baneful shadow of courts of appeal composed of men no more learned in the law than he, too often put where they are through sinister influences, cloistered, given to fine discrimination and wedded to an artificial and moribund body of law that bears as much relation to human needs as abstruse theological systems do to the needs of the soul, where common sense is sacrificed to bookish learning and justice to procedure.

If the prisoner reaches prison it is to become a partisan who on the one hand regards every prison officer as a common enemy and, on the other, every prisoner as a "con." and seldom or never a human soul. Human nature would have to be of stancher stuff than it is if impartial justice were meted out there.

When we come to the paroling system we find that, notoriously, ever since the system came into being, prisoners have been paroled mainly in the order of the pressure they and their friends were able to bring to bear upon the prison board, not a little of it political and social, and relatively seldom with reference to a real and proved fitness to go out.

There we have "Justice as She Is Administered," in California and most other states of the Union. Is it any wonder that President Taft declared that, of all departments of government, that of the administration of justice is the least effective and a disgrace to the nation? The trail of The Beast is over it all.

The administration of criminal justice can be bettered and it must be, but it will not be until the public understanding has been educated and our political life emancipated from untoward influences. Let the discussion proceed.

The Water Tender to Oakland

The tender by the People's Water Company of its plant to Oakland, and through Oakland to a water district to be organized comprising the East Bay cities, is important as a step toward the inevitable. True, there has been little friction between Oakland and its public service corporations since the People's Water Company succeeded the Contra Costa, but private capital is hardly to be looked to with safety for an adequate supply of water for the fast growing east side cities.

It is inevitable that municipalities shall finally perform their own public services, chiefly because human nature is what it is. There is scarcely a problem seriously affecting our municipal life that does not owe its origin to the fact that public services are generally performed by corporations. We cannot afford to have our big men made into big scoundrels because of the big temptations offered through capitalizing public needs for private advantage. Under municipal ownership we shall have speculation, but it will be petty, whereas, under a corporate public service system, we are afflicted by both grand and petty larceny, the latter on a grand scale.

There is this to be said of the corporations that have, in recent years, served the east bay cities with water, transportation and gas; they have been exceptionally free from suspicion of graft and of exerting a malevolent influence upon municipal political life, but it was not always so and may not always continue to be so. A good time to make transition from private to public ownership is while private ownership is in reputable hands. A square deal may then be hoped for. The issue of price is one for experts to determine.

And yet municipal ownership is not to be entered upon lightly. It will put the capacity of a people to a severe test, but better failure through inefficiency than being morally debauched through the machinations of what Judge Lindsey has so aptly characterized as "The Beast." San Francisco would better have suffered financial bankruptcy, through attempted municipal ownership of water plants, gas and electric service and transportation than such moral degradation as she has suffered at the hands of Spring Valley, the United Railroads, the gas and telephone companies. The first would only have touched the pocket, the second has so bedeviled us that what otherwise were good men and women have lost the power of discerning evil from good and are sending their children forth without moral chart or compass.

Reluctant though we are to undertake it it does look as though municipal ownership, with all its faults and limitations, were indispensable if we are to be saved from becoming a nation of smart rascals. It is to be hoped that the East Bay cities may see their way clear to get together and take over their water supply system if it may be done at a fair valuation. The opportunity appears to be propitious.

Johnson, the Son

It was anticipated that enemies to the government would seek to make capital out of those political differences and habits of mind which characterize Grove L. Johnson and his son, Hiram W. Johnson, and this expectation was one of the considerations which strongly dissuaded the son from becoming the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican candidate for governor. Not that there is enmity between the two men, for there is not, but their habits of mind and their attitudes toward public affairs differ as daylight from darkness, as straightforwardness from the indirect and circuitous. Only in one particular do they agree. Both are signally endowed with ability and eloquence.

Grove L. Johnson is in his seventieth year, not robust, and nothing will provoke his son to say any unkind thing in relation to his father, but he does not stand for the things that his father stands for and the fact that his father stands for things that the son cannot should not still the eloquent voice of the son or prevent his using his talents for what he conceives to be the highest interests of that country, that commonwealth and that cause to which his allegiance is due.

Honorable men, perceiving the difficulties of this situation, will strive to make it as little embarrassing as possible to father and son. Dishonorable men will seek to exploit the situation to all the political advantage possible. Fair minded folk will know what to think of them, and of attempts already made to exploit the situation.

Constructive Legislation

Representative S. C. Smith's paper, the Kern County Echo, takes the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League frequently and severely to task for not bringing forward proposals for constructive legislation instead of "camping on the cold trail" of emancipation of the Republican party from corporation control in this state. If the editor of the Echo thinks the trail cold let him camp on it awhile. Mr. Herrin does not think it a cold trail, neither does Mr. Curry, Mr. Anderson nor Mr. Stanton. There never was a more important issue presented to any people than the one of emancipation from corporation domination. League leaders agreed that if this one victory could be achieved all other good things could be added. The duty that lay nearest was believed to be to secure a free, capable state administration and legislature. This done, constructive legislation would be in order. There is need enough for it.

There is need for a reformed civil and criminal procedure, the non-partisan election of judges, the perfection of the direct primary law, the amendment of the railroad regulation law, the rectification of the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers, the determination of a state policy toward the users of state waters for the development of electrical energy and a state supervisory control of the sale of such power, the reform of our prison system and of the policy of the state toward dependent childhood. These are only some of the subjects demanding constructive legislation when there shall have been drafted into public, not corporate, service men fit to grapple with such problems.

Then there is the governmental system of the state itself, cumbersome, intricate, expensive and having as a purpose the augmentation of the political power of the "organization" in control. The whole system of commissions should give way to departmental control. Instead of state boards there should be state superintendents responsible to the governor and, through the governor, to the people. We have been moving in the direction of least resistance and most politics and the result has been heavy taxation and low efficiency in government. We need a state civil service system.

There is need for a larger participation of the people in legislation in those instances where representative government fails of being representative, need for laws which will permit legislation to be initiated by petition, and for referring particular statutes to the people, on demand, for their ratification or rejection. County, municipal and precinct local option issues should be compulsorily submitted to a vote when demanded by a fair percentage of the voters, and the right of women to vote in municipal and school elections should be conferred. All these things, and more, need to be taken up and dealt with constructively and no doubt will be when men fit to deal with them are placed in office.

But what would Representative Smith or his Echo have had to say of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League if it had ventured to sally forth with a platform covering all of these issues, or any considerable part of them? Would he not have regarded them as candidates for a lunatic asylum? He would have accused them of camping on a campmeeting of cold trails. Halley's comet will not fease us. California will be on the map after it has come and gone just where it was before it came and went. There will be time enough to attend to all these issues, not overlooking Representative Smith's very important hobby—after California shall have been made a free state and shall have placed its government in the hands of free and capable men. No government made up of men who will take orders from a political bureau can ever deal effectively with such problems. They would prove to them as problems in Euclid to a kindergarten.

The Right to Strike

The reading public and The California Weekly are jointly indebted to Mr. Walter Macarthur for an admirable presentation of labor's view of "The Right to Strike," which constitutes our "backbone" article for this week. We commend it to all persons capable of putting themselves in the place of another with the purpose of getting that other's point of view. Nothing else can so certainly make for industrial peace as a mutuality of understanding of each other's point of view. We are sure that Mr. Macarthur's paper will prove enlightening to many.

And yet we cherish the idea that he has relied too largely upon the deductions of logic in reaching some of his conclusions. They might almost be looked upon as what Lincoln called "pernicious abstractions." Personal liberty is absolute, but not necessarily unqualified. It is qualified in a hundred ways. Custom has qualified it, in domestic service, by requiring that notice be given of intention to quit work. This has been agreed to from time immemorial as a not unreasonable limitation upon the absolute personal right of one person not to serve another.

A strike is war. It is a trial of strength. War has been recognized by human society as legitimate under certain circumstances, but the absolute right to go to war has been qualified to the extent of requiring a declaration of war and a proclamation to the world justifying it. It may well be that a law forbidding a strike for seven days after final failure to settle a difficulty might work an injustice to labor in that it would give the employer an undue opportunity to fortify himself, but such a law could hardly be objected to on the ground that it injuriously invaded an absolute right. We think that portion of Mr. Macarthur's argument technically and logically sound, but practically untenable.

But any temporary limitation upon the absolute rights of the individual laborer must limit as well the absolute rights of the employer. There must be fair play and a square deal, and society as a whole must not only exercise its good offices for facilitating conciliation and arbitration, but, these failing, it must put forth its strong arm, not to compel men to work against their wills or employers to hire against their interests, but to maintain the peace and, as far as possible, preserve the innocent bystander and non-combatant from the invasion of rights as absolute as those of either party to a labor dispute.

This problem is far from a satisfactory solution and that it is so constitutes a reflection upon our civilization and statesmanship, but such papers as those by Mr. Weinstock and Mr. Macarthur are helpful toward such a solution.

Not So

An interior paper affirms that the insurgents in Congress are opposed to the American policy of protection. They are not. The Indiana platform settled that. What they are opposed to, and rightly, is the American practice of securing protection by converting Senate and House into bargain counters, and for this the standpatters are responsible. It is the Cannon-Aldrich way.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Some one has said that imagination is at once the richest and most perilous of God's gifts to the mind of man, and he may have been right about it.

The writer calls to mind one of the inconsequential friends of his youth and, as he looks back upon his callow days, he is persuaded that his lines fell to perhaps an unusual degree among those who were inconsequential, anyhow, such was the quality of 'Gene. His imagination was exuberant. He got a job once as porter in a hotel and, from that vantage ground, he was able to see his way clear not only to the management of that particular hotel, but to a string of hotels serving all the important towns between Kansas City and Denver, so that he could pass his patrons from hotel to hotel, making them feel perfectly at home wherever they put up for the night. He lost his job within a month for gross inattention to calls, which generally found him flat on his stomach somewhere with heels kicking up while his imagination was arranging the details of his hostleries.

He got a job in a lumber yard and, straightway, rose in his mind, like a modern bird man to become owner of the yard, to reach out for other yards from end to end of the Kaw valley and its tributaries, thence to secure forests in Michigan and Wisconsin with mills manufacturing lumber for all his yards for the elimination of the middleman and to enable him to become the noted lumber king of the state. While dreaming he suffered the yard's team to run away and smash the yard wagon and so got his walking papers, from which moment the greatest lumber combine of the time had no charms for him. For thirty years or more he has been lost in the general shuffle, but if he ever amounted to "shucks" he has agreeably disappointed all who knew him in the days of his industrial incipency.

And then there was Anson, a stocky, stolid fellow who took everything in dead earnest, was generally the butt of the gang, plodding, methodical, industrious, content to pick Colorado beetles off the potatoes growing in the home garden hour after hour while the rest of the fellows were getting shriveled and sunburned associating with the catfishes down in the river. He saw no visions, entertained no aspirations, brother to the ox, equally content to strain in the yoke in the hot sun if he might by and by loll in the shade and chew his cud in quiet. He has lived a blameless life, having neither poverty nor riches, possessing the respect of all men, the admiration of none, and, when he takes leave of life, it will be as the ox will do it, unconcerned because of the past, unsolicitous for the future. He was fashioned as deficient in imagination as 'Gene was superabundantly supplied. If they could have pooled their respective endowments and shared alike both would have been infinitely the better off. Excess of imagination makes one a habitual visionary and enthusiast, deficiency leaves life as empty and unprofitable as that of cud-chewing kine.

"What can we do about it?" Perhaps not very much, but parents and teachers could do not a little if they were somehow to know of the need. A persistent effort to hold the feet of the soarer down to the earth, to make him face things as they are, to verify his hypotheses before he gets into the clouds, to break in upon the day-dream and set the dreamer to work, these things may help the one. Per contra, the matter-of-fact child may safely be fed on Gulliver and the Arabian Nights, on folk lore and fiction, on poetry and the drama, to the end that he may become a living soul. Some day the science of psychology may be able to diagnose the needs of every sixth grade child and prescribe the treatment he needs to develop him into a rational, well anchored but truly sentient, living being, and, while we can not by taking thought add a cubit to our stature, we can, if we would be masters of our own souls, shake enervating day dreams out of our heads or feed latent imaginations on that which energizes them and makes them bear fruit meet for the gods.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Cost of Living Here and in England

The London food prices published below were taken from a report of the British Department of Commerce and Labor, and are official. The New York prices were secured by the Times of that city, and, while not official, undoubtedly are reliable—of course, making allowance for daily and minor fluctuations. Merely for the sake of making clearer the comparative greater cost of living on this side of the water, we have added the approximate percentage of increase. The table follows:

Bread, 1 lb.	4	5	25
Apples, 1 lb.	4 to 6	10	100
Butter, 1 lb.	24 to 32	30 to 35	15
Cheese, 1 lb.	14 to 16	18 to 22	33
Cocoa, 1 lb.	16 to 36	25 to 50	45
Coffee, 1 lb.	16 to 30	20 to 50	50
Currants, 1 lb.	4 to 8	8 to 12	67
Eggs, 1 doz.	22	33	50
Codfish, 1 lb.	8 to 12	15 to 20	75
Fish (general) 1 lb.	4 to 12	10 to 25	120
Flour, 3 lbs.	9 to 10	12	25
Bacon, 1 lb.	16 to 24	25 to 30	37
Beef, 1 lb.	16 to 20	22 to 30	45
Pork, 1 lb.	12 to 16	20 to 24	55
Milk, 1 pint	4	4 to 5	12
Oatmeal, 1 lb.	4 to 6	5 to 10	50
Onions, 1 lb.	2	4	100
Oranges, 1 doz.	10 to 12	18 to 50	200
Potatoes, 1 lb.	1 to 2	3 to 4	133
Prunes, 1 lb.	8 to 12	10 to 18	40
Raisins, 1 lb.	6 to 10	10 to 16	62
Rice, 1 lb.	4	6	50
Syrup, 1 lb.	6	10	67
Tapioca, 1 lb.	8	10	25
Tea, 1 lb.	20 to 60	30 to 1.05	125
Tomatoes, 1 lb.	8	12	50

Now strike a general average on these percentages, and you will find that the cost of food in New York City is about 64 per cent greater than its cost in London. Moreover, the Times is authority for the assertion that "in no single instance are the current London prices higher than in New York." Remember, too, that a considerable part of London's food—notably meats, fruit, etc.—is imported from America. With additional transportation to pay, the merchants over there sell for much less. Is it any wonder that the American people are complaining of high prices, and is there not room for an able-bodied suspicion that they are being bled for somebody's profit?

Fourteenth Transcontinental Line Completed

On the 5th instant the Trans-Andean railway, which connects Valparaiso, Chili, and Buenos Aires, Argentina, was completed, and, the first of South American transcontinental lines, now is in operation. This puts the two leading cities south of the equator within a day's travel of each other. Notable engineering was required in crossing the Andes. For example, one tunnel which is five miles long was bored through the mountain at an altitude of 12,000 feet above sea level, and 12,000 feet is a long way up on a very high mountain. The Trans-Andean is but a little north of 35 degrees south latitude, and the utmost northern transcontinental, in Canada, runs about 55 degrees north latitude, so that the distance between them is 90 degrees, or one-quarter of the circumference of the globe. Here is a fact which, perhaps, will surprise the average reader: Between these two lines now are twelve transcontinental railways, making fourteen in all—and not so many years ago it was supposed that the great mountain ranges interposed an insurmountable obstacle to the construction of all such lines. Of these railways, three are in Canada, seven in the United States, one in Mexico, one in Central America, one on the Isthmus of Panama, and one in South America.

Immensity of Our Railroad Business

Before entirely departing from the subject of railroads, here are some statistics showing the immensity of the railroad business in the United States, which are taken from an address delivered by Interstate Commerce Commissioner E. E. Clark before a convention of railroad men at Worcester, Mass.: The total miles of track is 328,000. If the annual revenue were laid down in silver dollars side by side, the dollars would extend more than twice around the world. . . . If all those revenues were paid in actual cash, the amount of money so paid to the railroads for transportation would equal the total sum of money in circulation in this country. . . . If the money paid by these railroads to their employees every year were laid down the same way in silver dollars, it would extend 22,000 miles—almost once around the earth. . . . If the employees of all these roads were to march in a parade at the rate of three miles an hour day and night, the single file would be 850 miles long and it would require nearly 12 days for the procession to pass a given point. . . . If the number of passengers carried one mile by these roads were formed in a parade 10 abreast, that parade would require 64 years to pass a given point. . . . If the freight cars of these roads were coupled together they would extend from Worcester to Portland, Ore., then to Los Angeles, then to Jacksonville, Fla., and from Jacksonville back to Worcester, and there would be enough left over to put in cross lines between Worcester and San Francisco and Jacksonville and Portland, Ore. . . . If all these cars were hauled in one train moving at a uniform speed of 10 miles an hour day and night, it would be 69 days after the locomotive passed before the caboose would come in sight.

Uncle Sam as a Corn-Producer

The figures relating to the corn crop in the United States are astounding when one pauses to consider their full significance. In 1909 the area planted to this cereal was 108,771,000 acres, and the yield was 2,772,376,000 bushels, or rather more than 25 bushels to the acre. This year the area probably will be increased to more than 110,000,000 acres. If all this acreage were combined in one vast field, it would completely cover the states of Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware—that is, both the New England and Middle states—and almost enough would be left over to make another Little Rhody. If we remove the field to the Pacific Coast, where states are states, it would cover a California, valleys, mountains and all, and enough would remain to make a Maryland and a Rhode Island—if they could be prevailed upon to come West. Or it would cover Oregon and Washington and have a Connecticut or two left. Texas is the only state in which that field of corn could be placed without slopping over into surrounding territory. What becomes of the corn, anyway? Last year's crop would have allowed more than thirty bushels apiece to every man, woman and child in this country. We have not used ours. Who has?

Farmers Who Own Automobiles

The reader may see no connection between the last paragraph and this, but there be those who may consider some such sequence as the following to be natural and almost unavoidable:

Big corn crops.
Good prices.
Prosperous farmers.
Automobiles.

At any rate, and whether the sequence is evident or not, it is said that, of the 10,000 automobiles owned in Iowa, 5,000 are owned by farmers. It is said, further, that Kansas farmers paid $3,200,000 for such machines during 1909, while they paid $2,750,000 in 1908. In a Nebraska village of 800 population 40 autos were sold last year to farmers and retired farmers. It is estimated that farmers own 76,000 of the machines in this country. The old question ran, Does farming pay? Well, there are some indications that it does.

OUR FIVE-FOOT SHELF

Chatterton

Last week we published on this page the death poem of Richard Reali, who destroyed his life because "he could not rightly utter to the day what God taught him in the night." Our Chatterton, a far brighter star of promise in the firmament of song, sought death at seventeen because he thirsted for applause that did not come and, more, because a neglectful world gave him scarce bread enough to live upon.

His poems are not such great performances that we should prize them overmuch for their intrinsic worth. But it is just that we should now and then remind ourselves that the poets who may be our nation's pride and glory a hundred or a thousand years hence are living now, and that, though their spirits are warmed by the divine fire, that fire warms no bodies.

But it is equally well to remind the poet that the thirst for fame and the possession of great talents are not enough to win the approbation of the world nor enough to earn its gratitude. He must have another quality, which is, the love of humanity. The world approves those that serve it, and only they serve who love. Dark as the tragedies of Sophocles and Shakespeare are, their birth was in a heart burdened with compassion for the sorrows of men. Joyous and beautiful as are the lyrics of Shelley and Keats, their inspiration lay in the poets' full participation in the richer emotional experiences of men. Not that any of these poets were conscious of their inspiration—only Shelley was, probably—but by nature they greatly loved and so they greatly served.

Here, we feel, was Chatterton's deficiency. His heart was eaten with desire for fame, he wished to be the master before he was the servant. His own sorrow and disappointment overwhelmed him so completely that the sorrow and disappointments of other men made no impression on him. And yet he serves, by the pathos of his life and the tragedy of its end, for these things move us to compassion, and that which withdraws us from ourselves and makes us sad for others is an aid to kindness and gentler thoughts.

BERNARD SHAW

Here is what Bernard Shaw said in a recent interview about his new play, "Misalliance:"

"My nature revolts against everything that suggests brevity. That is why in my new play about which I beg of you not to ask me to talk, I go on and on without stopping for hours and hours." "I imagine that it will arouse a great deal of attention?" "Not a bit of it. At any rate I hope it won't. Personally, I am saying nothing whatever about it to anybody. I want the public to concentrate their attention on the other fellows who are writing. I am, although—and I beg of you not to print this—'Mrs. Warren's Profession' is breaking all records in Berlin. The name of my new play is—"

"You have great faith in the repertory system, Mr. Shaw?" "None at all. I hope we shall fail—for the sake of the critics. I love the critics, and never lose an opportunity of saying nice things about them. Not that I read the notices that they write of my plays! I'm far too busy to do that! But they speak so charmingly of Frohman. By the way, talking of Frohman, the characters in my play will bore you to death. It is the most deplorably brilliant thing I have ever written. Nothing of Aristophanes can touch it. But I refuse absolutely to talk about it."

"You do not, of course, expect it to appeal to the general public?"

"On the contrary, it will certainly make the widest possible appeal. Unless you book at once, it will be impossible to obtain a seat before next year. I am not writing it for clever people. I wish the clever people would not come to my plays. The general public are brilliant. They understand me because I am such a sentimentalist. I am. Of course, I shouldn't like you to say so in print, because it would make the box office so busy. Mr. Matthews has more than enough to do as it is. What a delightful fellow."

"But surely, Mr. Shaw, you are regarded as the leader of the intellectual school of playwrights?"

"Nothing of the sort. You're thinking of Barker. I sprang into fame by refusing to be intellectual. The critics don't understand me because I'm not intellectual. I am a very simple person, with very primitive ideas. That is why I shock the lord chamberlain. He takes a distorted view of my work. But we've tricked him this time. My new play is so long that Mr. Bedford hadn't time to read it. It couldn't be done for the money. And yet every line is a master-stroke of humor, subtlety, intelligent observation, literary distinction. Don't print that."

"And now just a word, Mr. Shaw, if you don't mind, about the acting."

"I do mind. I won't tell you anything about the acting. It is superb, but wild horses will not compel me to say so. All the most brilliant actors and actresses in London appear in my play. I have rehearsed them myself. I leave nothing to anybody else. All the rehearsing done hitherto has been utterly wrong. We are going to change all that. We are going to change everything. And now I am going to change my clothes."

English managers are so pleased with Miss Marie Doro's acting that several have made handsome offers for her services as leading woman.

Californian Poets' Corner

A PRAYER FOR RAIN

Frank Soule

(Frank Soule was a pioneer journalist of California, and his name is associated in local history with the old Alta California. President Lincoln appointed him collector of the port of San Francisco. He was the author of poems of which this is a good example.)

God! give us rain! to Thee our hearts are crying!

This supplication breathes in mournful words To Thee! the earth in drouth and ruin lying, From dust and blight pleads for the starving herds.

The feeble pulses of the springs are dying;

In thirst, and doubt, and dread, men, beasts and birds

Are uttering one common prayer for rain.

God of the tempests! shall they plead in vain? * * *

The weary oxen on the dry-roads languish;

The poor dumb ass that on the thistle feeds Finds even that athirst, and hunts in anguish A scanty fare amid the dying weeds.

The scorching winds all vegetation vanquish;

The smitten life of nature pants and bleeds; Branch, leaf and blossom, grasses, fruit and grain,

Through brown decadence plead with Thee for rain. * * *

O, but to hear its silvery missiles telling

Their mercy message to the thirsty roof;

Along each duct the tiny currents welling,

The dripping eaves to doubt a strong reproof;

To see the rivulets to rivers swelling,

In thirsty beast and bird and man's be-hoof;

Oh, but to listen, and to hear again

God's revelation in the falling rain!

God give us rain! and from her sleep upspringing,

Sweet smiles of nature will deck earth's shriveled face,

The liquid pearls delight and solace bringing,

To cheer the land and bless the human race. From wood and wold joy's anthem will be ringing,

And grateful praises answer to Thy Grace;

And Nature, dumb and weary, wake again, And all her tongues hymn peans for the rain.

OF PLEASURE IN BOOKS

A first source of pleasure in books is their disinterestedness. They ask us for no service, they beg no alms, they do not slight us, snub us, disappoint us, cavil at belated keeping of engagements, fret at lack of attention. They are passive servants of our will, lying quiet and content until we want them, yielding then with perfect good nature to our demands upon them, responding to our moods and gently warming us in the glow of their perennial light.

Some one has said that books perpetuate the brightest and best moments of the brightest and best minds. This is true, and when we are weary of commonplace chatter or are ourselves dull or find our neighbors so, we may take down Charles Lamb and be regaled with inextinguishable laughter from the merriest of wits; we may read Keats and be led to the worship of the most beautiful and chaste forms and colors; we may follow Wordsworth through the woods and with him find the majesty of God; we may search the human heart, and meet woman in her infinite variety as Shakespeare knew her, we may travel with Coleridge into the mysterious realms of the half supernatural.

If we tire of little things we may wander with Newcomb through the charted constellations and guess at the unknown worlds beyond our outmost world. If we weary of little men, we may meet kings and caliphs, emperors and czars. If we are indifferent to the town or township where we live, Kipling takes us to India, in a moment to meet strange people and to scent the heavy odors of strange woods and flowers and to mingle with the unaccustomed life of crowded bazaars and the worship of unknown gods.

And books lift us out of our little lives. Without books we would be only citizens of a little group that plods from day to day, knowing of the past only what we might learn from grandfathers' tales, and guessing of the future only idle dreams. With books we rise to a high place whence we look back along the ages to the birth of primal things, and see the life of man from earliest antiquity arranged in orderly sequence down to our own age and hour and place. We know our place in human history, we have retraced the road by which we came, we mark the names and deeds upon their graves of those who wrought before us. From a little valley beyond whose bordering hills we never see, we have ascended to heaven and gazed upon the universal plan.

Henceforth our lives take on new meaning. Old fears drop from us; we know how vain they were a thousand years ago. New hopes arise; we know how far a strong heart and a clear vision carried those who strove in the past. We are richer in new ideas of beauty, in enlarged resources of courage, in stronger grounds for faith.

Books may bring us no money, they may fertilize no powers of acquisition. But they bring us much new life, they add an increment of enjoyment, they pay dividends of pleasure. If they bring us greater capacity for pain they also bring us greater strength to endure.

And, as these work upon the individual, their effects react upon society at large. A nation made up of men whose outlook is widened by the instruction of books, of men whose spirits are chastened by the compassion of books, of men whose ideals are colored by the ideals of books, that nation will be what the German empire is to the tribes of the Hot tentots.

Do not judge the influence of books by the bookworms who know nothing else. Judge it by the men who have translated their love of books into love of humanity, who have transmuted their readings about men into fellowship with men, who have made over books into life. The body of such men is vastly larger than that of the bookworms. Yet even the bookworm has his uses. Who else so carefully preserves literature through the centuries? He loves books only for themselves, but by him those books have been given to those who love them for their utility in a world of men.

MAKING OLD RACES LIVE AGAIN

VIVID REMINDERS OF ANCIENT MODES OF LIFE

Do not be frightened by the name, for the place is most interesting. It is the Anthropological Museum of the Animated Colleges, at Second and Parnassus avenues, San Francisco. "Parnassus" is good, for the museum stands at the edge of Sutro forest, on the side of a heavy-en-kissing hill whence you may see the Farallones when the air is clearer than it was this morning. "Anthropological," when "stepped down," as they say of an electric current, is simply that which refers to the study of man. So in this anthropological museum are all manner of relics of old civilization, relics gathered in Egypt and Peru and in California, by expeditions financed by Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst. If you want to know how an Inca lady combed her hair, step up to the second floor and the attendant will show you several styles of combs, some six hundred years old. If you want to know how an Egyptian business man wrote his letters before Spencean script became the style, the first floor rear contains a choice collection of stone tablets whereon the ancient scribe chiselled his thoughts. If you want to know what a Pomo Indian of Northern California had for breakfast before the white man introduced Grape Nuts, the third floor will show you, and show you also what his wife cooked it in and the paddle she stirred it with and even, in one old basket, some of the mush (mixed grasshopper and acorn meal) which Mr. Pomo left and which the dogs overlooked.

These three collections are the pride of the museum. Prof. A. L. Kroeber, curator and head of the anthropological department of the University of California, describes these things at length to his classes in Berkeley, expounds the life of the dead and dying races of which they are the reminiscences, and hopes for the day when the new and ample museum will be completed in Berkeley for the permanent storage of these treasures. But the man who lives with the specimens and who, especially when California Indians are mentioned, gets into a gentle but intense glow of enthusiasm is N. C. Nelson, assistant to the curator. He is a young fellow who has brought over here from "the old country" the fine European taste for science, and he revels in the proximity of his friends, the battered ancient relics, as if he were on speaking terms with old Indian chiefs and forgotten Peruvian Incas.

Take the California Indian exhibits first. Look through these utensils and garments and implements and playthings of the Indians and gradually you will unconsciously reconstruct in your mind a picture of their life. You will see that the Indian male held the female in contempt, because he alone had the use of the carved spoons for eating mush, while the squaw must be content with a plain shell. You will see the woman hunting in the sedge of the marshes for tough roots whose fiber went into the beautifully woven baskets. You will see her choosing fibers of different colors, and know that she did not know how to dye, or she would have used the same material throughout. You will see her weaving the baskets, learn that each tribe had its own distinguishing pattern, that there were several methods of weaving, that these baskets were used as cooking vessels. You will see the women gathering acorns, hulling them, leaching out the bitter taste by pouring hot water over them that drained out below through a rude sand filter, and grinding the acorns into powder with stone pestles, to make the morning mush. You will see them heating stones and throwing these stones into the baskets, mixing them with the acorn meal and water, and stirring the mush with wooden paddles.

Of the life of the men, you will see the gay regalia they made of feathers, worn as a head-dress; the skirts of reeds they wore in their mystic dances; the rattles and whistles and ceremonial bows and arrows they employed in these rites. You will learn that the women were never allowed to see these dances, nor even the regalia, for they were parts of the ancient Indian secret societies, and Mr. Pomo had as much objection to Mrs. Pomo's presence at his club as Mr. Francisco has to the presence of Mrs. Francisco at an Elks' smoker.

They made pretty good use of the materials they had, these old Indians. They knew how to tan skins as well as a modern taxidermist, as rabbit and coyote skins in the exhibit show. They made eel-pots and fish-traps and quail-snare out of reeds. They made pipes that lately deceived an Eastern expert who was positive that two samples in the exhibit had been turned on a lathe. They made flutes that a white man can not play, but from which an old Indian visitor to the museum lately evoked really sweet music. They made papoose baskets that are quite ingenious, and beside these, hanging on the wall of the museum, is a wooden doll in a tiny papoose basket that once delighted the heart of a little Indian girl.

The Indian was an inveterate gambler (I don't know why all gamblers should be "inveterate," any more than I know why all smokers are supposed to be "confirmed"), and here you will see the woven mats that were his substitute for the green felt and the round table, and also you will see the dice he threw for shell-money or anything else valuable or even, sometimes, for such a piece of mere property as a squaw. These "dice" are sticks of wood, about ten inches long, flat on one side and curved on the other. The "inveterate" held them up on end and dropped them, betting on whether they would land on the flat side or the rounded side—a sort of aboriginal "heads or tails" game.

Another gambling device was a bundle of small sticks, like toothpicks, one of which bore a distinguishing mark. One Indian held the pack behind his back and shuffled them and bet his opponent on the chance of drawing out the colored stick. The Caucasian school-boy who has played the game of "odd or even" with marbles will understand this game perfectly.

They even had pillows, our ancient Indian friends. That is, they carved wooden head-rests, much the same as the Japanese use today. They are said to be more comfortable than they look, but even at that they are not likely to come into style again.

One thing the Indian did not know—the California Indian—and that deficiency marks him low in the anthropological social scale: He did not—she, rather—know how to weave cloth. The race whose women did not know how to weave had to live poorly clad, as the Indians of this state did. He had his choice of jackrabbit skins sewed together with fibres, and fibre skirts that remind you of the Chinese window screens made of colored strings. These latter must have been prized by the Indian belles, though, for they rustled just like a silk petticoat when they walked.

Leaving the humble Digger for the relatively aristocratic Inca of Peru, you find the evidences of a pretty high state of civilization in the exhibit. In the first place, the Inca matron knew the art of weaving, and she turned out some admirable specimens of this handiwork. Some pieces of ancient weave, dug up from graves in the Andes, show a warp of cotton and a woof of wool, done dexterously into patterns that are admirably blended in colors. The Inca sense for form was less acute, however, one piece in particular showing a strange idea of the human figure, the teeth of a grinning man being represented in the cloth as large as his fingers, and his toes being reduced in number from the customary five to three.

But for housewifely skill Mrs. Inca ranks high. No piecing together of skins for her, no tying of bits of her fabric together with strings. Mr. Nelson will show you a package of Inca needles, made of wood hundreds of years ago, that are identical in size, shape, and eye with the steel needle of today, just as flexible, with points just as sharp, and just as serviceable for plain or fancy sewing as a Sharps. And he will show you Inca thread, of equal antiquity, that is pretty nearly as good as O. N. T. or Coates's. Furthermore, Mrs. Inca had a work-basket and a sewing bag to put her implements and fancy work in while she was busy in the kitchen.

She went in for trinkets and fancy toilet articles and jewelry, too. And she did not have to be content with sea shells or wooden ornaments, either. Silver was her favorite material, made up into ear-rings, finger rings, and bracelets. You may easily imagine the dusky belle of the Andes tricked out in all this finery and clad in the soft fabrics that she knew how to weave and to make gorgeous with brilliant dyes.

The Inca knew how to carve wood, too, though his performances in this respect are not much better than the totem-pole work of the Alaskan Indians, and not in the same class with the intricate and symmetrical designs of some of the savages of Australia. But as a potter he did well. Rows of earthenware in the exhibit attest a great skill in moulding and firing the clay, especially remarkable because the Inca had no potter's wheel and laboriously shaped his huge jars and urns by hand.

His skill as a smith in the fine metals is surprisingly uneven. He mastered silver, and wrought it into ornaments and embossed vessels and even learned to overlay wood with a smooth coating of silver. But gold seems to have bothered him. When he tried to put on gold overlay the best he seems to have been able to do was to beat the gold out into gold leaf and then tack it on the wood in the crudest possible way.

All these Inca relics were dug up from ancient graves in Peru. Hence they are limited to those things that a half-civilized people are wont to put into graves with their dead. Fortunately for our knowledge they had a habit of including many things that help us to reconstruct their life in our imaginations. The dead themselves are preserved in this case, not by artful embalming as in Egypt, but by the fact that the desert soil in which they were buried contains natural salts and niter that have preserved the bodies from decomposition. The absence of rain helped this drying process. In Lima it has not rained at all for more than a hundred years.

The Egyptian collection contains several mummies, but they are less interesting than the genuine stone tablets covered with hieroglyphics and the strange touch-me-not human figures of the old, old days. One of these tablets is retouched by hand in a brilliant array of colors that are as bright and clear as they were when the painting was done perhaps two thousand years ago.

One set of hieroglyphics is a prehistoric Egyptian medical book, which has been translated into English by a German scholar. The book gives the ancient doctors' prescription for sore eyes and boils among the first diseases to be treated, afflictions still common in Egypt to a degree far beyond most other places. Some of the methods of treatment are unprintably droll, but the modern amusement is abated when Mr. Nelson points out that substantially the same ideas hold in rural communities of civilized Europe today.

A series of prints shows the outlines of friezes from ancient Egyptian temples. These represent all kinds of national activities: wrestlers at their various holds and throws; men at the various occupations of daily toil, and their religious rites.

Smaller collections in the museum revive the life of South Sea Islanders, of New Zealand savages, of Filipinos, of North American Indians east of the Rockies. An hour or a day, or more, spent in wandering through these rooms is an experience of intense interest. In no other way can one so vividly realize the facts about strange people as by such a survey. The museum is open to the public on Thursday afternoons.

Several English notables have "doubles" familiar to Londoners. Lloyd-George, for instance, is always greatly amused when he discovers the presence of his prototype, a man who is so like him that when once, being new to London, he went sightseeing and asked the constable on duty outside the House of Lords how he could enter the building, that sturdy policeman shook with laughter, supposing of course it was Lloyd-George. Mr. Balfour is great friends with his prototype, who is a lawyer, so like the ex-prime minister that when they are seen walking together, as often happens, they can scarcely be told apart.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Which Is the Path You Will Take?

There's a place on the highway of life, my lad,
Where sever the paths men go,
One leads to the summits in snowdrifts clad,
And one to the vale below,
Oh, the upward path is rocky and steep,
And slow is the progress men make,
But the other leads where the valleys sleep—
And which is the path you will take?

On the upward path there is none may go
Save angels and splendid men,
But the sirens sing in the vale below,
As they dance in each luring glen,
Stern Duty is here, but Pleasure is there,
With cup whence our thirst we slake;
One's call is a song, the other's a prayer—
And which is the path you will take?

And at end, at end of it all, my lad,
When the cup of Pleasure is drained
And you dance no more with the sirens mad,
Oh, nothing at all is gained;
But the path of Duty, essayed and won,
Leads on where the glad dawns break,
And he who has striven shall hear, "Well done!"
And which is the path you will take?

Concerning "Poor Dad"

In The California Weekly, about four months ago, I published verses entitled, "A Tribute to Dad," and, for the sake of making clear what I desire to say herein, I republish two of them:

Who is it sees the children grow
With love he lacks the art to show,
Perforce content with overflow
Of loves that to their mothers go?
'Tis dad, poor dad!

Who is it of his bairnies vain,
And yet can't make the feeling plain,
And therefore sobs this sob of pain,
This doleful, soulful, sad refrain?
'Tis dad, poor dad!

Now comes Eufina C. Tompkins, who edits the Household department of Orchard and Farm, and pertinently asks: "Why? Why 'poor dad'? Why lacks he 'the art to show'? Why can't he 'make the feeling plain'?" And then she suggestively adds: "Perhaps it is lack of practice."

Yes, perhaps it is lack of practice, but there's the rub, for how and when is the average man to secure the practice that would enable him to compete with the mother in the affection of the child? He is away from home during the day, and sees the little one perhaps two or three hours in the evening, whereas the mother is guide, friend and consoler of the child about 24 hours in the 24. Is not that something of a handicap for "poor dad"? Again—with much reverence for our fathers and more for our mothers, be it said—I don't believe that the average man loves his offspring as does the average woman. How can he? The babe is not bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh, as is the case with her. In his life the new-comer is an interesting episode; in hers it is the very consummation of her living. She loves most, and, as love begets love, the bairns turn first to that one whose tender sympathy never fails them. So, even when the father feels the most yearning for his child, he unconsciously says to himself, "Well, here is the place where I am second," and the thought terminates in a bungling expression of love.

Of course it is unnecessary to say that these cogitations apply only to fathers who are worthy of the name. As for the mighty army of those who care more for dollars or pleasures than for wives and bairns, they get all the affection that is their due, and sometimes a good deal more.

"Oh, You Kid!"

Above are the words with which Miss Eleanor Sears addressed an octogenarian whom she met for the first time. There is an old-fashioned and possibly worn out theory that old age is entitled to respectful treatment, if nothing more, but Miss Sears evidently has not heard of it.

Trousers, frock coat and vest, such are the garments in which this young woman has displayed herself in public. There was a notion too, that feminine modesty is a rather admirable article, but Miss Sears is loftily above heeding such notions.

She would a-walking go, and somebody saw to it that the newspapers heralded the fact in columns of "guff" from which people either turned away disgusted or else fervently remarked, "Gee, ain't de loidy a lollapaloosa!" Oh, who said that feminine modesty was not a back number?

And now, because of all these gyrations in the limelight, the spectacular young woman is receiving letters from several varieties of fools—fools who suggest that she engage in marathons, fools who desire her to climb Mount McKinley, and fools beyond all other fools who wish to marry her regardless of the fact that she already has acquired the trouser-wearing habit. Thus is the gentlemanly young creature bombarded with suggestions which should interest her.

But, with all the suggestions, one still seems to be lacking, and so it is herewith tendered in the form of a question which may be answered as the reader pleases: What's the matter with hunting up one of her father's old but still vigorous slippers and trying to make it useful?

Some Men Do

"When they first were married he used to swear by her, you remember."
"Yes, doesn't he still?"
"Well, there has been a slight alteration."
"Glad to hear it is but slight. What is it?"
"He has changed 'by' to 'at.'"

Some Sawed Off Fables

The Public and Decomposed Nectar

A certain Mayoralty Chief who had been elected by virtue of a happy combination of Higher-Up Squeeze and Lower-Down Push was exceeding proud of a liquid appetizer which he had compounded.

"This," he assured the Patient Public, "is the real thing, the drink of the gods, the far-famed nectar of high Olympus. I mixed it myself."

"Of what is it compounded?" the Patient Public inquired.

"Well," was the response, "the recipe is that of the former Chefs Ruef and Schmitz, but I feel that I have added a few Parisian touches that should improve the flavor. You first take a sufficient quantity of the red juice of the tenderloin, add a liberal dash of dancehall-and-barroom bitters and a flavor of Barbary-Coast tonic. Grace all with a juicy slice of United Railroads pineapple and a luscious what-is-there-in-it-for-me cherry. It's great!"

"Probably it is," the Patient Public replied, "but what makes it smell so much like bilgewater in the last throes of decomposition?"

Moral (for application in San Francisco, as well as elsewhere):—Before some political mixtures are presented to the public they should be deodorized.

The Merry Machine and Its Damaged Ha Ha

A certain Hilarious Machine which had given the Obfuscated Public the Merry Ha Ha during thirty Jubilant Years opened its mouth widely in order to continue its Mirthful Cachinnations.

Just then a fine, healthy Johnson Pro-ec-tile, impelled by the vigorous arm of an Indi-nant Populace, struck the Hilarious Machine in the mouth injuring its Merry Ha Ha so seriously that it was put out of commission.

Moral:—Even a Hilarious Machine may overdo the ha ha business, and receive a painful and discouraging suggestion from the Obfuscated Public once in three decades, at any rate.

The Woe of the Miserable Wretch

A certain Miserable Wretch who had stolen a loaf of bread lay in gaol and groaned with great bitterness.

"What's eatin' you?" a Mere Common Offender, who also was in gaol, inquired.

"Alas and alas!" was all the Miserable Wretch responded.

"Is it because you committed a crime?"

"No, oh, no! It is because I—I am neither a— a Patcalhoun nor have Gold Galore to prove that I didn't do what I did."

Thereupon did the Mere Common Offender join the Miserable Wretch in weeping.

Moral (for everybody):—Don't commit a crime unless you have money to prove that you didn't.

Which Man Was Rich?

Christopher Rouse had a very fine house,

A house that was fine, exceeding,

While Artemas Wack had only a shack

Unworthy of glance or heeding;

And Christopher's servants were not a few,

While Artemas hustled for bread to chew,

And they both had sons, and they grew and grew

To a different style of breeding.

For Christopher's sons had little to do

Excepting to spend his treasure,

But the sons of Artemas right well knew

Their living their toil must measure,

So they raised the grain they must later sell.

But the sons of Christopher, they raised—well,
How shocking the word I refuse to tell.

So fill in the dash at pleasure.

Now Artemas' sons, they as men prevail,

A fact I delight to scribble,

But Christopher's sons, if they're out of jail,

Are out on a technical quibble;

And I have been thinking the one of the two

Who really was rich, as I guess he knew,

Was Artemas, proud of his stalwart crew,

Too manly at guilt to nibble.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Take Program or Get Out of the Party

It is regrettable that the Associated Press did not see fit to send fuller reports of last Saturday's speeches of the President at Washington and of Attorney General Wickersham at Chicago. Although the President disclaimed making a key-note speech, that was the substance of it. What it lacked of that quality the speech of Wickersham made up, and the two are to be read together as one declaration of the administration view. The issue as defined by the administration is this: "Take the administration program of legislation, as embodied in bills prepared by the administration and submitted to congress, or get out of the party. By that test you are to be known. These measures were foreshadowed in the Republican national platform upon which the present administration came into power, the party organization is logically committed to them, to oppose them is treason, to fail to enact them into law is infidelity. Fish or cut bait. Get busy." That is what these two speeches mean, and no one can read even the meagre excerpts of them that reach us without feeling that they mean a great deal.

In What the Program Specifically Consists

The program of legislation submitted by the administration to congress consists, in the main, now that the tariff bill has been gotten out of the way, in the creation of an interstate commerce court; the strengthening of the interstate commerce law; the enactment of a postal savings bank law; a bill to "buttress" the President by specifically authorizing him to withdraw public lands from entry where the "good of the country seems to demand it; a bill to prevent the abuse of the injunction power of the courts; the admission of Arizona and New Mexico into the Union. There are a number of other measures before congress that the administration has had more or less to do with formulating and pressing upon congressional attention, such as, making public contributions to the election of senators and representatives, an employers' liability law, a bill allowing the reclamation service to borrow $30,000,000 for carrying out enterprises already on foot (to be repaid later from the reclamation fund), a bill to constitute a special commission to revise and simplify procedures for the United States courts. This program was sufficient to keep congress busy making history without fooling away much time sparring for political advantage in making the forthcoming campaign.

Afraid of What The People Want

As this paper has stated, and here repeats, of all innovations proposed in recent years by any administration at Washington not one carries greater promise for betterment than the putting of administration measures into concrete form and their frank submission to congress for consideration as administration measures. It will tend tremendously toward legislative responsibility. Mr. Taft confines his efforts in this direction mainly to the carrying out of pledges made in the platform of his party. That he should do, but it were better if he broadened executive leadership to cover great national needs whether expressed in party platforms or not. But it is one thing to have bills drawn covering the subjects promised to be legislated upon and it is another to put into those bills the things that ought to be in them and keep out of them the things that ought not. The public remembers the tariff bill which, while a technical redemption of party pledges, fell far short of being such a measure as the spirit of the new era required, and remembers, too, that the bills submitted to congress were mainly prepared by or under the control of Attorney General Wickersham, a corporation lawyer of doubtful liberality of mind and, possibly, of reactionary tendencies. Therefore the insurgents in congress propose that these bills shall be scrutinized with the utmost care and subjected to all the amendment that they would be subjected to if they came from a committee of congress instead of from the White House, and in this they are entirely right. The test of Republicanism is not support of or antagonism to those bills as they are, but as they ought to be.

Judge Sloane For The State Senate

The outlook for making the thirty-ninth legislative session the best California ever knew is most promising. All over the state Best Men are being brought out, and of all so far mentioned none ranks higher than Judge W. A. Sloane of San Diego, who has announced his candidacy for nomination and election to the state senate to represent the fortieth district, comprising San Diego and Imperial counties. His opponent will no doubt be Leroy A. Wright, a very able, capable and adroit representative of the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau in politics and legislation. Judge Sloane is no artful dodger. In his announcement he openly declares that, if elected, he shall regard himself as pledged to the service of his district and state rather than to any partisan program; that he shall favor so amending the direct primary law as to afford a state-wide, free-choice, advisory vote for United States senators; the giving of independent and non-partisan voters a clear right to express their preferences for nominations to office; the adoption of the initiative and referendum in state legislation as important checks upon legislative abuses and a stimulus to good faith; such regulation of public service corporations as will make them well-paid and justly treated public servants and not masters; such a reform of our criminal and civil judiciary as will make the administration of justice more simple, expeditious, inexpensive and certain; and, while respecting property rights, shall give the higher consideration to rights of human beings; as a necessary preliminary the overthrow of the legislative domination of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company. Judge Sloane puts the issue to the voters of the fortieth district so clearly that there can not be two opinions as to what he stands for, and it will put the straddling proclivities of Leroy Wright to a final test if he be not also forced to face the music. The fortieth district owes it to the state to send us Judge Sloane.

Judge Maguire Or "Red" Hayes

Judge J. G. Maguire will definitely be a candidate to succeed E. A. Hayes in congress from the fifth district of California. This will put a good many good men in a quandary. Hayes is a Republican and Maguire a Democrat, and men who vote habitually according to the party label will have no difficulty in deciding how to vote, but, in this year of grace, party will cut less figure than ever before in determining good men's votes. All who know him, or know of him, will know that if Judge Maguire goes to congress he will stand for Right Things, but E. A. Hayes has done splendid work at Washington the past winter in standing out against a predominating "Cannonism" in legislation.

The First Canard Of the Campaign

"It is known" declares the imaginative editor of the Placer Republican, "that a secret agreement between Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League manipulators and certain Democratic bosses was recently made in Los Angeles, in which the Leaguers have agreed to desert to the Democracy in the November election if Johnson fails to win the Republican nomination in August." Yes, how did that come to be known? And what were the Leaguers to get for it? You are no novelist, Mr. Editor, if you leave your plot half disclosed. What are the Democrats to do if Johnson is nominated? Was not this agreement signed, sealed and delivered in the little town of Placerville in the sanctum of the editor of the Placer Republican? The yarn bears the earmarks of the man. A fortnight ago the laurel wreath for the most asinine diatribe of the campaign had to be conferred upon the Sonoma Index-Tribune. This week we must credit the first canard of the campaign to the Placerville Republican. The only color of verity to be accorded it is that, this year more than any other, perhaps, in the history of the state, good men will vote for good men and bad men for bad with less regard to party labels than ever before. The division is more likely to be made along moral or immoral than along party lines.

Stanton and The Steamers

The United States government maintains a line of steamships between New York and the Panama canal, thus affording a great advantage to Eastern dealers in furnishing supplies for the construction of the canal. Western men started a movement to have the government establish a similar line of steamships running from Seattle to Panama, by way of San Francisco, Los Angeles, San Diego, etc., and, to this end, there were introduced into the state senate of California by Senator Sanford, a series of resolutions relating to the, then, recent advance of transcontinental rates, protesting against the same, and addressed to our representatives in congress. Among these resolutions were the following:

"Resolved, That we request the Congress of the United States to speedily give consideration to the report of the Hon. Joseph L. Bristow, special Panama railroad commissioner, as submitted by him to President-elect Taft, and that we recommend the speedy establishment of the line (referred to in that report) at as early a date as possible in order that relief may be afforded to the manufacturers, merchants and producers of this state; and,

"Resolved, That we denounce the arrangement made by the Pacific Mail Steamship company with the transcontinental lines whereby they have never solicited any of this through business, and urge our representatives in congress to give this matter their immediate time and attention."

These resolutions passed the state senate without a dissenting vote and went to the assembly over which P. A. Stanton presided for concurrence, where, on motion of Johnson of Sacramento, the two resolves given above were stricken out of the series on a vote of 43 to 30, the speaker voting to strike them out. If the senate had concurred in the assembly amendments to strike out these two resolves, for which striking-out Mr. Stanton had voted, that would have been the end of the matter and the legislature of California would have lifted no voice in favor of a government line of steamers on the Pacific coast. But the senate refused to concur and a conference committee was appointed. Here, again, the speaker showed his unfavorable attitude toward the government line of steamers by appointing Johnson and Transue on this conference committee, Drew being the only man that could be relied on to stand for it. However, the free conference committee reported the Sanford resolutions with the two resolves placed back in them and then it was, and not until then, that Stanton voted for them. He had been beaten and there was nothing to do but take his medicine and he took it. For verification of this statement reference is made to the amended assembly journal, page 772. This issue becomes important because it has been denied that Stanton opposed the adoption of these resolutions, the denial coming from one who conceded that if he had opposed them Stanton would thereby have proved his unfitness to be governor. The record is in black and white and can not be explained away.

An Appreciation of Judge John D. Works

The following letter from the distinguished editor of The Twentieth Century Magazine, of Boston, to a friend in Oakland, explains itself: "I have received word from my friend, the Hon. John D. Works of Los Angeles, Cal., that he is just entering the fight for the United States Senatorship. I earnestly hope and trust that you will see your way clear to furthering his candidacy in any way that you can, as Judge

Works is a strong upholder of direct-legislation and fundamental democracy. I do not think there is, in the United States to-day, a greater enemy of machine rule and the corrupt practices of the feudalism of privileged wealth than the judge. More than this, when de Lara was unconstitutionally arrested and thrown into jail in Los Angeles, a short time since, Judge Works interested himself in the case and secured his release. He is a man of judicial turn of mind and is, in fact, I think, just the kind of a man we need in the Senate at the present time. Cordially yours, B. O. Flower."

Why Not A. D. Ware? Now that it seems improbable that Los Angeles will consent to lose Principal Francis of the Polytechnic School as its city school superin-tegrity is unquestionable. His record, his energetic personality, his character, and his training all appeal to The Watchman most strongly. We believe he would add strength to the League ticket, and do the League honor if elected. He should be sized up carefully as a possibility for the office of state superintendent.

A Word of Advice to Alameda Leaguers The spirit of compromise is often justified.

No set of men can always have their own sweet wills. And it is seldom possible to make up a ticket with all first-class men. Men of that class are not too abundant, no, not even in Alameda county, but any good government ticket with Dr. Tisdale on it is likely to waterlog the minute it is launched. The lesson of two years ago should ideal, but only for the reputable and the decent.

Walter Macarthur May Stand for Congress Many friends of Walter Macarthur, and Walter Macarthur has many friends, are urging him to try for the Democratic nomination for Representative in Congress from the fourth district, the district which Mr. Julius Kahn so picturesquely represents. Mr. Macarthur is merely thinking it over. There are not too many men in San Francisco whose hat covers as much sterling manhood as the hat of Walter Macarthur and there is none that covers more. He is honest and he is able, and, while he has usually voted the Democratic ticket, mainly as a protest to what he believes to be a Republican materialism unrelieved by high moral ideals, he is in no sense an ardent party partisan and will not follow any party far if it goes wrong. Moreover, he comes from a walk in life that deserves representation in Congress, not as representing the interests of labor and only those interests, but as a citizen whose environment has been that of a wage earner and who understands the industrial problem from the wage earner's point of view. If the legal fraternity were not represented in Congress we should all wish to see a few lawyers sent to Congress, and if there were no bankers there we should wish to see some bankers elected. This is equally true, and true in an equal sense, of the wage earning world and from that walk of life California can send no fitter man than Walter Macarthur of San Francisco and, unless some free Republican can be sent, the fourth district should send Walter Macarthur, for, ever and always, better a free Democrat than a Republican in bondage.

Organizer Up the San Joaquin Next Max J. Kuhl, state organizer for the Lincoln-

Roosevelt Republican League, will be in Stockton next Monday, and from that point will work up the San Joaquin valley to Bakersfield, organizing local clubs and breaking ground for the approaching tour of the same district by Hiram Johnson and his associates. Kuhl will visit Turlock, Modesto, Merced, Madera, Fresno, Porterville, Reedley, Corcoran, Dinuba, Hanford, Coalinga, Visalia, Tulare, and Bakersfield, and other important centers of population, on this trip. The tour will take him about ten days. Local papers at these points should announce his coming, and local Independent Republicans should be ready to receive him and co-operate with him in the work of organizing sentiment. These local clubs are the backbone of the movement for better things in California.

The Unterrified In Conference If the general tenor of reports printed in the San Francisco papers is to be accepted as a true characterization of the Democratic conference held in Los Angeles this week the net result is that every man who went there feels relieved and justified in that he has had his much enjoyed opportunity to rip the reputations of his associates up the back and down the front, but we have to bear in mind that it is only some form of fight that is grist to the daily newspaper mill. It is entirely possible that there may have been much sober reasoning together and, if the event be judged by the platform, the conference was not devoid of good results. Theodore Bell bravely bearded McCarthy in his lair, but at no great risk because McCarthy and all the votes he can control are safely at the disposal of William F. Herrin or Charles F. Curry, and the twain are probably one, or will be the night before election. The McNabites were looked upon as Herrinites in disguise, at least in state politics, and were made as uncomfortable as possible. The conference handled the direct primary law as a woman does a thistle, with the result that all hands are a good deal nettled. Only the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has dared to grasp it firmly and so avoid being stung. If Joseph McCall is put into the field against Theodore A. Bell that will split the reputable tendent, the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League must look elsewhere for a candidate for state superintendent of public instruction. Why not Allison D. Ware, of the San Francisco State Normal School? Here is a young man of extraordinarily brilliant mind, splendid executive ability, a forceful personality, and he is thoroughly grounded by education and experience in the best methods of teaching. Besides a remarkable record in the state university he has to his credit several years' experience as a teacher in the San Joaquin valley and six years' as an assistant to the head of the state normal school. He is a vigorous and independent thinker, progressive in his ideals without being a radical. And his personal not be lost on the good government forces of Alameda county. It would have been better for the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League two years ago if Assemblymen Pulsifer, Feeley and Mott had been elected by the "organization," instead of by the Leaguers for the "organization." Fooled the first time it is the fault of the fooler. Fooled a second time it is the fault of the fooled. If Mayor Mott feels that he ought to support his brother for a position he is unfit to fill no one need quarrel with the mayor for that. Blood is thicker than water, but that affords no justification for other men supporting an unfit man. Better a dozen defeats than one victory with unfit candidates. This paper is not asking for the Announcement is made that Miss Maude Adams will essay the title role of "Charlot" when Rostand's drama is produced in New York in October.

James Neill, the Western stock actor, plans to make a unique theatrical tour, sailing round the world on a chartered steamer and giving theatrical performances at all important ports on the way.

Mrs. Sol Smith, who is a member of the New Theater company in New York, has the distinction of being the oldest actress on the American stage, having celebrated her 80th birthday a few weeks ago.

Homer Davenport, the well-known cartoonist, plans to establish a weekly paper in Portland, where he will make his future home. J. E. Chamberlin will be the editorial head of the new publication.

Mrs. John Vance Cheney has been elected president of the Woman's International League of Right Thinking and Right Living. The league is a philanthropic organization which aims to form chapters all over the world. The first chapter was formed in New York a short time ago.

Mrs. Mary Goddard, who is said to be the oldest Quaker preacher in the world, celebrated on March 10th her 100th birthday at her home in Durham, Me. This is the first time in twenty-odd years that she has been unable to preach on her birthday in the Friends Meeting House in Durham.

Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt has given $500 to the Equal Suffrage Association of Washington, which enables it to have more commodious quarters in Seattle while carrying on the amendment campaign. Mrs. Catt was at one time a resident of Seattle and a leader in the equal rights movement there.

James K. Hackett announces that he will make a trip to the Pacific coast this summer, acting in San Francisco for eight weeks in a repertory of plays, including "The Prisoner of Zenda," "The Crisis," "Don Caesar's Return," "Samson," "Monsieur Beauchaire," "The Pride of Jennico" and "The Walls of Jericho."

John Stevenson Tarkington of Indianapolis is the newest Indiana author. His first book, "The Hermit of Capri," will appear on March 24th. Mr. Tarkington has been writing for several years and his articles have been published in magazines under the first part of his name, John Stevenson. It is a surprise to most of his friends to know that he is a writer. He is 70 years old.

Mrs. Julia Ward Howe has started among Boston women a movement to study applied economics relating especially to the increased cost of living. It is her hope that this movement will become national and will be considered seriously by women throughout the country. It was launched at the last meeting of the New England Women's Club, of which Mrs. Howe has been the head for many years.

Massenet's new opera, "Don Quixote," which has had a successful production at Monte Carlo opera house, will be one of Oscar Hammerstein's novelties for the season of 1910-11 if the Manhattan director happens to be pleased with the piece when he sees it performed in Europe this summer. One thing against Mr. Hammerstein's trying "Don Quixote" in America is that it has no part for a soprano, and therefore it is not available for Miss Mary Garden.

Princess Ingeborg, a member of the Swedish royal family, is among the most regular of the eight hundred women who have been attending the course of lectures given in Stockholm under the direction of the Swedish Women's National Suffrage Association. The lectures are intended to prepare women for their new responsibilities under the new municipal law which makes them eligible as town and county councillors. Though the women of Sweden have long had the municipal vote they are now for the first time eligible to office.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE

A LABOR MAN'S CRITICISM OF THE WEINSTOCK REPORT

By WALTER MACARTHUR

Two plans for the maintenance of peace in the industrial world have recently been presented to the public by Mr. Harris Weinstock. One of these measures provides for the treatment of disputes between private employers and employees by the creation of a board representative of both sides. The other plan deals with disputes between public-service corporations and contractors on public works, and their employees.

By the latter plan it is proposed that the legislature shall enact a law requiring the submission of labor disputes to a process of public investigation, and prohibiting a strike or lockout during the course of the inquiry and for seven days subsequent to the award, under penalty of a fine of not less than $1,000 upon the employer and of $1,000 upon the common funds of the employees, or of $25 upon the individual employee.

In the following remarks the writer treats exclusively of the latter plan and its bearing upon the interests of the labor movement.

Mr. Weinstock, in his recent contribution to these columns, very fairly states the case against the strike and in favor of conference and conciliation. None will more readily agree with that statement than the members of the labor movement, who have experienced the evils of the strike and thus learned to value and to practice peaceful methods.

Labor Opposed to Strikes

The best proof of this is to be found in the common practice of the labor movement. Strikes are an exception and conciliation is the rule in the settlement of labor disputes.

This assertion may seem inconsistent with the facts as these appear to the public. But the public is dependent for its information upon a single source, namely, the daily press. The latter publishes little or nothing concerning the negotiations between employers and employees in the peaceful adjustment of the questions that arise between them. On the other hand, the press invariably "plays up" the strike. Thus the public, being informed only of the strike, is led into the error of attributing to that feature of the labor movement a much greater relative importance than really attaches to it.

Conference, conciliation and arbitration constitute the theory and practice of the labor movement in the great majority of industries. This method is approved both by employers and employees, by associations and unions; it is growing in popularity and effectiveness, and, once adopted in a given industry, it is seldom abandoned, and even then only with the greatest reluctance upon the part of labor. These peaceful methods are predicated upon one condition, namely, organization upon both sides and mutual recognition, respect and frankness in discussion.

The labor movement will support any measure for the extension of the methods now generally prevailing and generally successful in the settlement of labor disputes, or any better method which may be devised. While the present plan of voluntary conference between the parties directly interested is preferable, as compared with any plan involving the intervention of outside parties, the latter procedure may be supported as a necessity in those cases which, by reason of the lack of organization or failure of the parties to come together, are not amenable to purely voluntary measures.

Must Be No Compulsory Awards

One important qualification must be understood in this connection. The measures designed to insure the submission of the questions in dispute to a conference board must conserve the absolute freedom of those interested in the matter of accepting or rejecting the award. In a word, there must not be any compulsion upon labor to accept the award, under a penalty of any kind or character for quitting work or going on strike. The right to strike must be maintained at all times and under all circumstances.

Upon this point the labor movement is bound to disagree with the plan suggested by Mr. Weinstock. The latter will probably say that there is no ground of disagreement here, that he, too, recognizes the right to strike as a necessity in the last analysis, and that his plan conserves that right.

A Fatal Objection

It is true that Mr. Weinstock states his position in substantially these terms. Little exception can be taken to Mr. Weinstock's general view of the right to strike. But the proposal to prohibit the strike during the period of inquiry and for seven days thereafter, under penalty of fine, is a fatal objection to the plan.

It is not sufficient to say that the prohibition of the strike lies only against employees of the public-service corporations and contractors on public works, and prevails only for a limited period. If such prohibition may rightly be imposed upon any class of labor, it may rightly be imposed upon all classes. If the strike may rightly be prohibited for seven days, it may rightly be prohibited altogether.

The logic of the case is obvious and inescapable. The author of the plan himself acknowledges this in the statement that it "would pave the way for still further legislation and constitutional amendments which would make it possible to apply state intervention to all important private as well as public labor disputes."

If the plan may be applied to "important," why not also to unimportant private labor disputes? Who shall determine the question of importance or unimportance in such matters? Who shall say that the strike, being prohibited in some instances and for a certain period, may not be prohibited in all instances and for all time? Who shall say that the "general welfare" is affected only by strikes in quasi-public service and that that consideration may not be invoked against the strike in any and every branch of labor? "Facilis descensus."

It is unnecessary to say that the right to strike is here asserted as a principle rather than as a practice to be indulged in for its own sake? The practice of the labor movement is to forego recourse to the strike until all peaceable methods fail, and even then to adopt the last resort only under pressure of the strongest necessity, bearing well in mind the effects not only upon the employer but also upon the public. Generally speaking, the value of the right to strike lies in its deterrent influence upon the employer.

The fact that the strike is always a possibility, being recognized by the employer, serves to determine his course in the direction of peaceful and equitable adjustment. If the plan under discussion affected merely the practical workings of the labor movement, without reference to the principle upon which that movement itself is founded, there could be little objection to it, since strikes are seldom inaugurated without notice extending over a considerable period. To pass a law prohibiting a strike during the period of inquiry and for seven days thereafter would of itself be merely giving statutory expression to the practice now generally, indeed almost universally, prevailing.

Proposed Law Would Vitate a Principle

But the passage of such a law would do much more than is here suggested. It would vitiate a principle, not of the labor movement alone, but of human action, and "pave the way for still further legislation and constitutional amendments." To comprehend the possibilities contained in the latter suggestion, and at the same time secure a broader outlook upon the position of the labor movement, let us briefly consider the real nature of the strike, its significance as a factor in the industrial world and its relation to other institutions and phenomena of social life.

In the view of the public, the strike is a resort to force, foolish, hurtful and pitiful. The public sees the strikers and their families suffering from hunger, and industry paralyzed. Of course, the public is directly involved in the trouble to the extent that it is deprived of the commodities or conveniences to which it has been accustomed. In the end, the public sees victory for one side, defeat for the other side, and nothing for itself but the memory of its own losses. Consequently, the public cries out against the strike as a "relic of barbarism," a "reversion to savagery," and demands that something, almost anything, be done to "put a stop to strikes."

The attitude of the public is natural and its proposed remedies explainable upon grounds of impulse if not of reason. Similarly, the impulse of the drowning man to throw up his hands and open his mouth is easily explained. The moral is obvious.

The labor movement is not oblivious of nor indifferent to the incidents of the strike. It sees and feels these things with eyes equally as clear and hearts equally as sympathetic as those of the public. But the labor movement sees in the strike much more than lies upon the surface. It sees in a strike, be it of one hundred, one thousand or one hundred thousand men, the exercise in a collective capacity of a right which inheres in each individual man. The labor movement sees in the strike—the act of quitting work collectively—that act which makes effective the right of the individual to quit work, failing which the individual right becomes a mere abstraction.

The right of the individual to quit work being recognized as the fundamental warrant of the strike, the mind is at once directed to a consideration of the origin, value and uses of that right. To do this we must go back to the beginnings of civilization and retrace the footsteps of labor.

Thus comprehended, history presents itself as a constant struggle by man to free himself from bondage to king, lord or master, the struggle of man to own himself, to be absolute master of his own body and his own labor power. This world-old struggle finds its consummation in the personal liberty of the American citizen.

Man has progressed by virtue of the impulse of personal liberty implanted in him and directed against those institutions which held him thrall. Under this impulse villeinage, serfdom and slavery have successively given way to a system under which the man who labors—who possesses nothing more than his labor power—is the equal of every other man in respect to the disposition of his own person. If we should undertake to embrace in a single term the sum of human progress in respect to the personal relations of men, we should use the term "personal liberty."

This term, expressing as it does the "liberty of the person"—liberty to possess and dispose of one's person—defines that characteristic which chiefly, indeed solely, differentiates the freeman of today from the bondman of the past. Reduced to its ultimate and most concrete expression, the liberty to dispose of one's person is the liberty to quit work, the right to strike.

Right to Quit Work Inviolable

He who possesses the right to quit work is free. He who is denied that right is slave. Take from the American workingman this right of personal liberty, impose upon him compulsion to work a moment longer than he so wills, no matter what form such compulsion may assume nor how brief the period of restraint, and he is to all intents and purposes enslaved. The line of demarcation between slavery and freedom is obliterated.

Upon this fundamental element of liberty rest all other institutions of free society. Political and religious liberties are incidental to this basic and indispensable condition of human freedom, valuable and effective only as corollaries of this condition, enduring only as this condition endures. Society progresses only as the individual progresses, is free only as the individual is free. In some instances the material condition of the freeman may be little better, may even be worse than that of his progenitor condemned to enforced labor, but it contains at least the possibility of improvement, limited only by the desire for and willingness to strive for better conditions.

In contending for the preservation of the right to strike, without limitation or qualification, the labor movement contends for the one thing which, more than all other elements combined, epitomizes and gives substantial meaning to the progress of mankind, the one thing which of itself affords a guarantee of continued advancement and justifies the hope of consummation in a state of social and industrial relations in which peace shall prevail by common consent and in virtue of justice between man and man.

It is understood, of course, that the right of personal liberty is not absolute as to all acts. Society rightly and necessarily imposes numerous restrictions upon that right. Again, men may, and do, voluntarily agree to surrender a certain measure of their personal liberty for the common good. But these reservations do not run to the point under discussion, i. e., the right of the individual to give or withhold labor. As to this point, the right of personal liberty is and must remain absolute and unqualified.

Proposals to restrict or prohibit the strike are an ever-present feature of the discussion of industrial affairs. In most instances these proposals indicate a well-meant but mistaken view of the problem. In other instances these proposals bespeak an ulterior purpose of opposing the progress of the labor movement and destroying its efficiency or at least its promise of further efficiency. In either case these proposals are dangerous, the more so, if anything, in proportion to their apparent harmlessness.

Danger of Subtle Beginnings

Everything must have a beginning, and the larger the ultimate object the smaller and more insidious must be the initial step. Every one now admits the right to strike; not even the most pronounced opponents of the labor movement dare openly declare against that right. Whatever be done in this matter must be done carefully and with proper regard for the sensibilities of those chiefly affected! In these circumstances there is but one safe course for the labor movement, namely, to resist every proposal that will in any degree affect the right of its members in the exercise of their inherent liberties, and especially in the matter of the strike.

With all due respect to the plan proposed by Mr. Weinstock, it may be remarked that it suggests at once the easiest and most difficult method of dealing with the "strike evil." It is easy to say, "It shall be unlawful to strike." But unless the law in this, as in other connections, be in accord with right relations and conduct, it is more likely to produce than to prevent the condition aimed against. In other words, a law to prohibit strikes is certain in the end to increase rather than diminish the number of such outbreaks.

We need but look to Australia and New Zealand for an example in point. The erstwhile "country without strikes" is today the country in which the "right to knock off" is most freely asserted, and, we might also say, mostly freely exercised.

The labor movement acting in accord with its traditions, aspirations and precedents, will support any measure designed to minimize and eliminate strikes by means of investigation, conciliation and arbitration. But such measures must be based upon the principle of voluntary action by the parties directly interested, and must not contain any element of compulsion other than that of the moral force of private or public opinion. So far as these measures are based upon the principle of legal compulsion or inhibition the labor movement is bound to oppose them in obedience to the law of human liberty and human progress, a law which transcends in its importance to the individual and to society all consideration of the incidents accompanying the strike, unfortunate and disastrous as these may be in themselves.

The strike is frequently described as a "weapon of barbarism." In reality, the strike is a "weapon of nature," an expression and exercise of men's inherent and inalienable right to revolt against conditions that degrade manhood. No consideration of "general welfare" can outweigh this individual right.

Ultimately and fundamentally, the "general welfare" and the individual right are one and the same thing. The former can not be conserved at the expense of the latter. Public rights can not be conserved by the destruction of individual rights.

The labor movement does not wish to strike, but it insists upon its right to do so, fundamentally as an exercise of personal liberty and practically as a measure held in reserve for the purpose of insuring peace.

("Political Table Talk"—Concluded.)

Democracy in twain and give Mr. Herrin his opportunity to introduce the entering wedge in the shape of some man who will make his peace with the Southern Pacific Bureau, and accept its backing. It is the old game played with such marked success. Keep your eye open for that third man.

The Platform Promulgated There is not a line in the platform that stamps it as Democratic, not a word about

"sovereign states," (where was Caminetti?) or "tariff for revenue only." Tom Jefferson's bones were not dug up and reworshipped. The old order has changed sure enough. The platform declares that the "Emancipation of California from Southern Pacific rule overshadows every other public question." So it does. It declares for "Retrenchment in public expenditures." There is need of it. "Equal and uniform taxation." Which is bad. If taxation be uniform it cannot be equal, exactly what ails us now, but that is another story. "Initiative, referendum and recall." Populistic but not a bad club to hold over the unrepresentative heads of representative government. "A more efficient control of transportation companies." Much needed. "Liberal provision for extending the school system." A compulsory education system that will "compulse" is the chief need. "Betterment of land and water highways." Why did they not say something about Gillett's $18,000,000 bid for the automobile vote? "Election of United States Senators by the People." A demand for a statewide direct primary advisory vote would have been more to the purpose. "Revision of the rules of the House of Representatives so that control may be restored to the membership." Splendid. And much more, not in traditional Democratic platforms.

PART II. THE RIGHT HAND ROAD

The humiliation which Gaspar Gautier suffered because of the misadventure at the river, related last week, was profound. Sensitive to a degree, he slipped out of the house at the earliest moment and kept out of sight until nightfall. He might, indeed, have set out upon the road, without daring to face his benefactors at all, had not Abner taken the trouble to look him up and fetch him in to supper. "Too big a sled and too small a boy, I guess," was all that Abner had to offer, but he spoke kindly and laid his hand gently upon the shoulder of the shrinking boy, letting him know by that token that, so far as he was concerned, the event of the day was a closed incident.

Not so Isabel. Catching sight of a tear in the boy's eye as he entered the big kitchen, she proceeded to express her mind with much freedom as to the heedlessness of Our Hiram, who, she said, seemed to think that every one else should be as big and strong as himself, but, sakes alive, all is well that ends well, and Gaspar must come right in and have a good, warm supper. Where had he kept himself all the afternoon? She had gone in search of him more than once, and had sent Annabel, too, but to no purpose. He must not let a little thing like that upset him so.

Notwithstanding the too patent kindness of Abner and Isabel, and the palpable hovering near of Annabel in a mollified mood, Gaspar had small appetite for supper, and, at the first opportunity, slipped away to his little garret over the kitchen and went to bed.

That night when all was still and the big embers were burning low, Isabel took her candle and stepped softly into Gaspar's room, intending not to awaken him, but as she entered she saw the coverlid drawn quickly over head and ears and thought she detected a sound as of a sob. Going to the head of Gaspar's bed, and drawing his stool to her, she sat down by his side and gently pulled the coverlid away. She found the pillow wet with tears. Stroking his temples with tender hand, "Why, my dear boy, what does this mean?" she asked.

"I might have drowned her," he whispered, half sobbing.

"Yes, but you did not, you know, and she is as snug and warm in her bed as a bug in a rug, and sleeping so soundly that my kissing her just now did not awaken her at all. Our Hiram did wrong to let you try to manage so big a sled in such a dangerous place. He meant well, but he is so heedless sometimes that I am almost afraid to trust Annabel in his charge. She is all we have, you know—except you," she added.

"Ah! but was he not generous to let me be the first to take her down? And did he not come bravely to get us out? Is he not the grand young man, Madam, so tall, so strong, so brave? He did right to call me the little black beast and to duck me. My stepfather he often says: 'God did make you to come to no good thing,' and I see now that it is so. Why did not the water take me under the ice? It would have been more better."

"Tsh!" the good woman protested, laying her hand gently across the boy's mouth. "You must not speak so, my Gaspar. You shall know in good time for what purpose your Heavenly Father made you, if you strive to know and seek to do His will. Many a man smaller and less strong than you has so risen above difficulties that the world has called him great. Our Hiram is big of his age and overgrown and thoughtless, but his heart is sound and he does not mean to be unkind. I must caution him about his treatment of you. It is hard for you in school, I know, for you do not yet understand all the words you see and hear, but the teacher tells me that you are bright and are learning finely, that in another year or so you will surely catch up with others of your own age. You will yet challenge the admiration of us all, I am sure, if you try hard and bear your disadvantages with patience."

"I am ever so thankful, Gaspar, that you and Annabel are in your warm beds tonight and not down there in the swift river somewhere under the ice, and it was to thank our Father in Heaven by your bedside that I stole in, so softly, as I had hoped, as not to waken you, but if you don't mind I'll thank him, anyhow."

With that Isabel slipped to her knees by the lad's bedside and, in a few simple words, returned thanks for the happy rescue of the children from watery graves, asked that they might always be in God's keeping and, letting her voice fall to a whisper, asked God to give Gaspar good courage to face life in all its trials with a stout heart and most graciously to indicate in some clear way, in his own good time, what work in the world He had for Gaspar to do for the glory of God and the service of men.

With a quick motion Gaspar crossed himself and Isabel turned his pillow over, smoothed it out gently, pushed the lad back upon it, stroked the raven hair back from his swarthy, but high and well-formed forehead and kissed him. The lad crossed himself again as if in the presence of something holy, then, yielding to a sudden impulse, threw his arms about the woman's neck for one fervent instant and fell back upon his pillow, not black and lowering, but radiant with a mother-hungry love.

"You have been reared a Catholic, haven't you, child?" Isabel asked.

"Yes, madam," was the quick reply, "and you are my holy mother."

"Why, child, what an idea!"

"Is it then wrong to be a Catholic?" the boy pleaded. "It was the religion of my mother and I went with her to catechism and mass nearly every Sunday."

"No, child, not if you are a good Catholic, although we are Protestants in this house, and so, I believe, are all in the community that have any religion at all. There have been many splendid men and lovely women who belonged to your faith. Only be true and the faith you embrace will not so much matter, but if the children at school, not understanding, should say unkind things of your church do not quarrel with them about it. They will know by and by perhaps that in Our Father's house are many mansions."

"And may I call you Mother Isabel?" the boy pleaded, "it would make me feel as though I belonged to some one. You know I haven't really for more than a year."

"Why, yes, child, if you should care to."

"And would he let me call him Father Abner?"

"I am sure he would be glad to have you. You belong to us now, you know."

Reaching over and kissing the lad again upon his forehead, Isabel left the room and, softly closing the door, made her way down the back stairs through the kitchen to the big sitting room where her husband sat dozing.

"That is a strange child, Abner," Isabel said, as she took her seat in her accustomed corner and reached for her knitting. "He has unbosomed himself to me just now and I think I never knew one more artless or sincere. The trouble with him is that he is discouraged and has little confidence in his ability to find a place or hold his own in the world. Undersized, half starved through his earlier childhood, and overworked, as he plainly has been, with only kicks and cuffs for recompense, he has lost heart and we must do all we can to encourage him to find some one thing, if possible, that he can do better than anyone else he knows. That will set him upon his feet. His teacher says that he is really bright."

"He is handy with tools," remarked Abner. "You know how he has fixed all the locks in the house and tinkered up everything about the place that needed it. I must see what encouragement I can give him."

And so the winter wore away and the spring and summer, with the putting in and tending of the crops, in all of which Gaspar lent a ready and a willing hand. Always, when not otherwise occupied, he was tinkering with tools, which kind old Abner always encouraged him to use, making little conveniences for the farm or kitchen, among other things a neatly carved chest for Annabel and another, not so painstakingly made, for his own belongings. One day he set up a delicately modeled wind-mill on a corner of the shed with a stout rod running down through the roof and terminating in a miniature churn whose dash rose and fell almost with a measured persistency. When Abner saw it he declared that Gaspar ought to make one big enough to do the family churning. "May I?" Gaspar eagerly demanded and, in a month or two more, for he could work at such things only at odd times, he had a considerable mill erected, affording power enough, when the wind blew briskly, to do the family churning. The mechanism lacked much of perfection, but it served and was made wholly of odds and ends picked up about the farm.

With this achievement, and the good work done all during the growing season, the "Little Black Beast" looked less little and less black to the other boys and girls when school "took up" for the winter. Beside, Gaspar had learned our language better now and soon outstripped the younger children with whom he had been classed and, before the winter was through, had well nigh overtaken those of his own age. He had also betrayed a native bent for drawing, which his teacher was at much pains to encourage. If he were at a loss how to make himself understood a bit of crayon and a blackboard or pencil and piece of paper in his hands served to make the matter plain.

"I should like to see a sawmill, Father Abner," he said one day and, Abner having told him where one could be found, he set out a day or two later on foot with a generous luncheon and a blanket strapped across his back and was gone a week or ten days. When he returned it was with a small circular saw and a few rods and bolts he had earned, together with elaborate drawings and specifications set forth on paper. Abner and Isabel questioned him little, for he was wont to keep his own counsel, but they watched his activities narrowly.

A little brook ran near the house and dashed on by into the river just above the rapids. All the rest of that summer and on into the fall Gaspar busied himself about the banks of that stream. He had broken a pair of young steers to the yoke and with these he drew heavy granite slabs and boulders into the stream until he had dammed the water sufficiently to turn it into a little raceway that he had plowed out and shoveled clear, leading back into the brook down by the meadow. Up early and toiling late, he by and by got the foundations in for a miniature sawmill and, by the time the snow came a-flying and getting up next summer's wood was the order of the day, his mill was cutting up limbs of trees and cleared-out underbrush with a fraction of the labor of handwork, so that, by Christmas time, Abner and he had a two years' supply of firewood piled up in the yard or stored away under the shed.

But that was the last of Gaspar's winters at the Hardy homestead as it had been. It was clear now to Abner and Isabel, as well as to Gaspar himself, that he had in him the making of a mechanic, so, after many conferences in front of the big fireplace on winter evenings, much planning and letter writing, Abner went with Gaspar to Boston and there found opportunity for him to work in a big machine shop and attend a private technical school at night. So Abner went home, after a few days of watching the boy in his new environment, leaving Gaspar as well provided for as his own slender means would allow.

For seven long years Gaspar toiled and studied, going home, as he called it, for a week's vacation once each year, but writing regularly every Sunday to Father Abner or Mother Isabel with a truly filial devotion. Though reticent in speech, he could unbosom himself on paper so that his letters glowed with enthusiasm or were heavy with misgivings as his mood was when he wrote. There were small remittances, too, from time to time, and many little remembrances for Abner and Isabel, and not forgetting Annabel, but, except for these, he husbanded every dollar he earned and banked it, for he had learned prudence from Abner.

It was not a sylvan path that he traveled or a sheltered life that he lived. The men with whom he worked were not exactly "Frenchy" and there were hard knocks to take as well as to give. Once he was discharged for insubordination and once was soundly thrashed by a big fellow who sought to impose on him, but he put up so good a fight that, although he came off second best, it was not without inflicting punishment enough to command respect if not admiration. His discharge prompted him to transfer his activities from iron to wood, where he found himself in his native element and soon acquired a skill that brought him into demand.

It was not until Our Hiram and Annabel were to have their wedding day, preparatory to joining a colony destined for the prairies of Kansas, to help to make Kansas a free state and found for themselves a home under more ample conditions, that Gaspar came home to stay. All the years that he had been away there kept running through his mind visions of the brook he had dammed, the river that rushed by one corner of Abner's homestead, the rapids below and the high banks and still water above. Upon each visit he had paced up and down this rushing stream and estimated its power value as closely as he could, but he had no definite data upon which to base specific plans. Now he had come prepared to obtain that data and had brought an engineer's level with him. It was only a matter of a week or two when the differences of level had all been taken, plans made and specifications figured out. But there was still a question in his mind if it were not wiser to follow Our Hiram and Annabel to the West where larger opportunities were to be looked for.

But the desolation of the old home when Our Hiram and Annabel had gone proved the determining factor. "You will be leaving us, too, Gaspar," Isabel said, "and then there will be nothing left us except to live our lives as best we may alone, hoping and praying to go as nearly together as we may."

"I don't know, Mother Isabel," was Gaspar's reply. "Almost ever since I went away I have foreseen this hour coming. I felt certain that anyone as full of enthusiasm and self-confidence as Our Hiram would not be content to settle down here among these hills and little farms, and I knew that Annabel would go where he went, even to the ends of the earth."

"And ever since I dammed the little brook and set it to sawing wood for us I have had my mind's eye on the river where the Little Black Beast got his well-deserved ducking. I have figured it all out and have a proposition to make. If you will let me have the power site down by the river I'll build a dam and put up a little mill for turning the oaks, the hickories, the chestnuts and maples of the neighborhood into merchantable forms. I have talked to our edged-tool people down at Boston and, for one thing, they will give me the contract to furnish all the wooden handles for their tools and I shall be able to pay you enough for the privilege to support you in comfort all your lives, and I'll not go away any more."

The bargain was struck amid tears of joy, for Father Abner and Mother Isabel were aging now, and Gaspar's heart went out to them as their hearts had gone out to him when he was the Little Black Beast that, friendless and alone, desperately needing to be started off on the righthand road, had come so near to drowning their only child. It would be a small venture at first, but would lift them above the need for that unremitting toil that had marked their lives and would put him in line for bigger things when more power could be developed and more machinery be installed.

The prayer of Isabel was answered. The despondent, soul-sick lad of a decade before had found the thing that he could do as well as another, and soon the whining of the saws, the sputtering of the planing machines and the whirring of the lathes made music in the ears of Father Abner and Mother Isabel and the foundation was laid for as thrifty a New England factory village, and as comfortable a private fortune, honestly made, as one may find in a day's travel, even by our modern, new-fangled trolley that hourly speeds by where Abner and Isabel unheedingly sleep. The Little Black Beast is now black and white, the white being more suggestive of snows than of years for, amid his children and his grandchildren, and the stray human wanderers he has retrieved from reform schools and orphanages and helped along the righthand road, he has made shift to keep that buoyancy that came to him through tribulation, but never left him after he found that he really could do something well worth while and that God did not hate him just because his stepfather did.

And on the little finger of his left hand he still wears a massive gold ring with the name, now well near worn out, "Gaspar Gautier," neatly graven on the inside. "It was my father's name," he explains sometimes, "and it is mine. My mother gave it me, saying, 'Keep it always, my son. It is all I have to give you.' And kept it I have, although I had to steal it in order to get it from my step-father, but it is not to steal to take that which is one's own. I thank God that my step-father is now a long time dead, but, ah, if he had not been bad to me how should I have found Father Abner and Mother Isabel? How could I be here now and able to help so many to take the righthand road? Oh! the ways of God are past finding out." Then the old gentleman crosses himself, for the faith of the mother is still the faith of the son. Many of his faith and some of his kindred have come down from Stansfield over the border and, like himself, have become thrifty and industrious American citizens.

NOT SO NEW AS SUPPOSED

Editor California Weekly:

The direct primary election as a means of nominating candidates for office, is generally spoken of as something new.

The plan found in Berkeley's new charter of making the primary election final for those candidates who receive more than one-half of the votes cast is also regarded as new in principle.

The history of the United States shows us, however, that both of these ideas were embodied in a proposed amendment to the national constitution in 1825, designed to change the method of electing the President and Vice-President.

A feeling was prevalent at that time that a more direct method should be found for choosing these important officers, and various measures looking to that end had been discussed. Finally, a committee of nine of its members was appointed by the senate to report a plan. Senator Benton of Missouri was chairman of the committee, and the other members were Senators Macon of North Carolina, Van Buren of New York, White of Tennessee, Findley of Pennsylvania, Dickerson of New Jersey, Holmes of Maine, Hayne of South Carolina and Johnson of Kentucky. This committee was instructed "to report on the best and most practicable mode of electing the President and Vice-President."

The plan reported was, briefly stated, as follows:

Each state shall be divided by its legislature into as many districts as it has representatives in congress and the senate, the districts to be composed of contiguous territory, and as nearly equal in population as practicable. A vote without nominations was to be held throughout the country on the first Thursday and the following Friday of August of the years when President and Vice-President are to be elected. Each man by his vote would thus record his individual preference for President and Vice-President.

Those candidates who received the highest votes for each office in each district would then be credited with one vote for the office. In other words, each district would cast one vote for each office. To elect it was necessary for the candidate to receive the highest votes of a majority of the districts, and if that occurred at the August election, that election was final. Failing of that another election was held on the first Thursday and the following Friday of December following, the two candidates for each office who had received the vote of the highest number of districts being then the only candidates.

Senator Benton made the following arguments in favor of this measure: "The advantages of this plan would be to get rid of all the machinery by which the selection of their two first magistrates is now taken out of the hands of the people, and usurped by self-constituted, illegal, and irresponsible bodies—and place it in the only safe, proper and disinterested hands—those of the people themselves. If adopted, there would be no pretext for caucuses or conventions. If any one received a majority of the whole number of districts in the first election, then the democratic principle—the demos krato—the majority to govern, is satisfied. If no one receives such majority, then the first election stands for a popular nomination of the two highest—a nomination by the people themselves—out of which two the election is sure to be made on the second trial."

This amendment failed of enactment by not receiving the necessary two-thirds votes of both houses, and Senator Benton drew the conclusion that "select bodies are not the place for popular reforms. These reforms are for the benefit of the people, and should begin with the people," which seems to be as true today as it was eighty-five years ago.

MORE ABOUT CONGRESSMEN

The New York Times has made an amusing and instructive compilation of the personal characteristics of Congressmen from which The California Weekly has quoted before. Here are more of them, from the same source.

When Senator La Follette of Wisconsin was Governor of that State Representative Lenroot was Speaker of the House in the Legislature. Lenroot is a faithful follower of the little Senator with the prominent hair.

At the end of each sentence he utters, Representative Englebright of California sucks in his breath with a resonance equaling the exhaust of a steam engine. "I thought there was a steam pump working somewhere" observed a new member one day after he had listened to the Californian's remarkable inflow of breath.

The future of Alaska is a hobby with Representative Sulzer of New York. Mr. Sulzer owns valuable mining property in our far northern province, and is better fixed financially than most of his constituents would believe. He affects homespun garments of very modest cost.

Representative Reeder ("Irrigation Bill") of Kansas is the fastest talker in the House and the horror of the stenographers.

G. W. P., N. S. G. W., is the impressive array of initials that Representative Knowland of California is entitled to affix after his name. When extended into words, the initials mean Grand Worthy President of the Native Sons of the Golden West. The organization for which the letters stand is a very influential affair on the Coast.

Lever of South Carolina, Smith of Michigan and Hardwick of Georgia are the pygmies of the House. Burnett of Alabama is the polypolyist. When he gets up to speak and stands in the aisle he fills the passageway like a wedge, and if he were to lie down on either side would be almost as high as when on his feet.

Mr. Longworth of Ohio is the best pianist in the House.

Senator Jeff Davis of Arkansas was admitted to the bar when he was 19 years of age.

Senator du Pont of Delaware was cut out for a soldier and was commissioned in the Engineer Corps of the army after being graduated at West Point at the head of his class in June, 1856.

Sylvester C. Smith, the Representative from Bakersfield, Cal., does not like to be addressed by his first name, and when he signs the payroll or the hotel register, makes it "S. C. Smith."

In his younger days Senator Perkins of California was a common sailor. "When I sailed before the mast," is a favorite expression with him, and he seldom makes a speech without bringing it in.

Representative Norris, the insurgent Representative from Nebraska, has just shingled his hair. Some of his friends say it was done to make his constituents think him young, while others assert it was to deprive "Uncle Joe" of a hold in the scrimmage.

"Seven-sixteenths Chickasaw and Cherokee Indian and nine-sixteenths Scotch-Irish" is the reply made by Representative Carter of Oklahoma when any one asks him his nationality.

His great-grandfather was captured when a small boy by the Indians in the Wyoming Valley massacre, was traded from one tribe to another, and grew up with the red men. His son and his son's son followed in the great-grandfather's footsteps, and the Representative was born in a little log cabin near Boggy Depot, an old fort in the Choctaw Nation.

Representatives Longworth of Ohio and Gardner of Massachusetts have a common sorrow. Each is the son-in-law of a great man and is anxious for the public to forget it. Longworth married a daughter of former President Roosevelt and Gardner made a similar alliance with the family of Senator Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts.

The most ardent Prohibitionist in Congress is Representative Rodenberry, the new Congressman from Georgia. He was largely instrumental in drying up Georgia, and comes to Congress intent upon making the entire Union a desert for the demon rum.

Sulloway of New Hampshire, Anthony of Kansas, and James of Kentucky are the three giants of the House of Representatives. Sulloway is the tallest and oldest, wears long hair, a grizzled beard and a stoop, and looks for all the world as he comes lumbering toward you like the ogre in "Jack the Giant Killer."

Senator Bourne is famous for his short and long cigars. He always carries two cases—one of each kind. If he is feeling happy he will pass out a ten-inch cigar; if, on the contrary, things are not going right with him, he will offer you a cigar the size of a toothpick.

"Walk In" is the sign posted outside the door of Senator Dixon of Montana. He put it there after he received a number of complaints from home folks who had been frightened away by the awful solemnity and oppressiveness of the gloomy hallways and black doors.

Representative Frank M. Nye of Minneapolis is a brother of the late "Bill" Nye, the humorist, but unlike his famous relative, is not a funny man. He is noted as a deep Lincoln scholar, and on the birthday anniversary of the martyred President invariably makes an oration.

Senator Dick of Ohio started his adult career as a man of all work in a feed store.

The first speech made by Representative Graham of Pennsylvania, was upon the greatness of Pittsburgh as a pickle town. The name "Pickles Graham" still clings to him.

Senator Stephenson of Wisconsin and Representative Fordney of Michigan are known as the "lumber kings of the Capitol." Next to Mr. McKinley of Illinois, Mr. Fordney is said to be the richest member, and Mr. Stephenson's share of worldly ducats is said to be considerably better than $15,000,000.

THEOSOPHICAL LITERATURE

A full line of Theosophical literature from Point Loma, Calif., the headquarters of the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, under the leadership of Katherine Tingley, is on sale by A. M. Robertson, 222 Stockton street, San Francisco and by Smith Bros., 462 Thirteenth street, Oakland, Calif.

We would especially mention the Century Path, a weekly illustrated, which is a work of art as to its typography and illustrations, while the subject matter is of the highest order which deals with the problems of the day from a Theosophical standpoint; also the Theosophical manuals, written with a view of meeting the interest of enquirers; a Point Loma edition of "The Key of Theosophy," by H. P. Blavatsky, written especially for students; "Studies in Occultism," also by the same writer; and "Echoes from the Orient," by William Q. Judge, successor to Madame Blavatsky. To one who is interested in the ancient wisdom religion these books will be of the deepest interest.

All the above are the product of the Aryan Theosophical Press at Point Loma and it will easily be conceded that their work will compare with any in artistic finish and accuracy.

SCIENTIFIC OPINION OF ALCOHOL

"Exact laboratory, clinical and pathological research has demonstrated that alcohol is a dehydrating protoplasmic poison, and hence its use as a beverage is destructive and degenerating to the human organism. Its effects on the cells and tissues of the body are depressive, narcotic and anaesthetic. Hence therapeutically it should be used with the same care and restrictions as other poisonous drugs."

ANNUAL MEETING.

The regular Annual Meeting of the stockholders of BOWERS PORTABLE GRADING AND CONVEYING MACHINE COMPANY, a corporation, will be held at the office of said corporation, room 411, Foxcroft building, 68 Post Street, San Francisco, California, on Saturday, the 30th day of April, A. D. 1910, at the hour of 3 p. m., for the purpose of transacting the regular business of the said corporation.

BY ORDER OF THE PRESIDENT.

Hubus Calmann, Secretary.

NOTICE TO STOCKHOLDERS OF GIGANTE MINING COMPANY.

Notice is hereby given that in accordance with a resolution of the Board of Directors of Gigante Mining Company, duly adopted at a regular meeting of said Board, held on the 31st day of March, 1910, a special meeting of the stockholders of Gigante Mining Company will be held on the 14th day of June, 1910, at the hour of two o'clock P. M. of that day, at Room 269 in the Russ Building, on the west line of Montgomery street between Pine and Bush streets, in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, the same being the principal place of business, and the office of said corporation, and at the building where the Board of Directors usually meet. That the object and purpose of said Stockholders' Meeting is to take into consideration and then and there act upon a proposition to increase the capital stock of said Gigante Mining Company by the amount of $25,000.00, that is to say, from $100,000.00, divided into 100,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each, its present capital stock, to $125,000.00, divided into 125,000 shares of the par value of $1.00 each.

Dated at San Francisco, California, the 31st day of March, 1910.

AUG. WATERMAN,
Secretary of Gigante Mining Company.

NOTICE OF AUCTION SALE.

Notice is hereby given that the following described household goods, counters, shelving, trunks, personal effects, machinery, books, merchandise, etc., stored by or in the name of the following parties on which storage, freight, cartage, and other charges are delinquent, unless the same is paid before day of sale, will be sold at public auction at the warehouse of Bekins Van & Storage Co., 190 West Mission Street, San Francisco, Cal., at 10 o'clock A. SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't.—

The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Fell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.

[Seal of Superior Court] H. I. MULCREVY,
Clerk.

By JAS. P. KANE,
Deputy Clerk.

Memoranda.

The first publication of this summons was made in The California Weekly, on the 18th day of February, A. D. 1910.

The following persons are said to claim an interest in or lien upon the said real property, adverse to plaintiffs:

The City and County of San Francisco, whose address is at the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Expenses of Primary Election

Holding elections is an expensive luxury and holding a primary election is going to prove as expensive as holding a general election. Part of this expenditure will come out of the county general fund of each county, part of it will be met by the candidates and partly the friends of candidates, or friends of causes that candidates represent. We shall consider the last division first.

Nearly every candidate that enters the field for a state office will, to a certain extent at least, represent some popular movement or some private or corporate interest or at least some strong personal attachment. These causes, interests or fellowships, must organize to advance the candidacies of their champions or leave them out of the race. This is especially true of candidates for governor. Apart from what a candidate may do, leagues, committees and constituencies must be put to heavy expenditures in making the state acquainted with their purposes and candidates.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League has for its reason for existing the emancipation of the Republican party in this state from corporation control. It is a great cause. The people of California must be made to understand it. Half a year is not too long a time for carrying that message to the understandings of 300,000 men scattered over a territory 800 miles long and 200 miles wide. Headquarters must be maintained, organizers put in the field, speakers sent out and literature provided and distributed. Under the convention system relatively little of this work had to be done before the general election, the effort being mainly to secure the election of convention delegates favorable to whatever interest was taking a part in the campaign without greatly disturbing the general public. To hold its power the "organization" will doubtless raise and expend $10 to the League's $1. The League's funds come from private donations. The "organization's" fund will come, directly or indirectly, mainly from the coffers of great corporations. One candidate is believed to be financed mainly by the Royal Arch, an organized liquor interest; still another candidacy has been liberally financed by prominent citizens of his home city. These expenditures will none of them figure in the returns required under the law, but they will aggregate tens of thousands and, very likely, hundreds of thousands of dollars before the primary votes are counted in August. A republic is burdensome. There is no getting around that, and the direct primary has nearly doubled the expense of holding elections, but if it will afford free government it will be worth the price.

The county general funds of each county in the state must bear the expense of preparing and publishing the ballots, paying the election officers, furnishing the supplies and the places for voting, publishing the election notices required by law, etc. The printing bill is a heavy one and the advertising is, in the aggregate for the state, not light. Time was when citizens were drafted into the public service now and again to give a day, but that there might be something to dole out to political odd-jobs men, and owing to a growing disinclination to make personal sacrifice for the common good, all services performed in holding an election are paid for. The law fixes the maximum to be paid an election officer for each election at $10, but the Board of Supervisors may fix the compensation at less than that and most of them do. Without special knowledge it may be assumed that the usual compensation is $5 each for the day and so much of the night as is needed to count out the vote. As there are six such officers at each precinct, and upwards of 2,400 precincts in the state, it will be seen that the total must be no small sum of money. It is not likely that the counties of the state, in the aggregate, will pay less than $100,000 to election officers for services rendered on the 16th of August. The filing fees paid by candidates will not go very far toward paying the cost of holding the primary election.

In our lesson on "What the Candidates Must Do," we set forth what the candidate for nomination may expend money for in securing his nomination and how much each class of candidates may expend altogether. It will not be profitable to repeat that lesson here; but it may be a matter of interest to know that we are indebted for this schedule to a most laudable effort on the part of lawmakers in this and other states to prevent political contests degenerating into a mercenary contest between pocketbooks without regard to the merits of the controversy. There was need enough for it, but, as with most laws, our corrupt-practices laws bind the hands of honest men while leaving those of rogues free to do mischief. The honest candidate will file his expense account true to the letter, the rogue will "cook" his account and cover up the truth so it can be unearthed only with extreme difficulty.

But what matter if our direct primary system does prove more expensive than the old system of nomination by convention? If it results in restoring government to the people, and in the nomination and election of free and honest men to office, it will pay a thousand per cent. on the investment in giving us government for the common good instead of for special interests and in supplying such economies as honest officials will practice, as well as in the honest service they will render. It is by that test that the increased expenditure must be justified, and, if the plan works out as its friends hope, that justification will be ample. There is such a thing as saving at the spigot to lose at the bung.

The whole Edison family appears to be given to inventing. The daughter of Edison has just invented an automobile wrap to wear in the car driven by her father's storage battery.

Hale Fellow Well Missed

THE COUNTRY WILL FERVENTLY HOPE that there will be no Adalina Patti business about Eugene Hale's announced last appearance in the United States senate. May his line terminate with his term and the succession be not handed over to an understudy schooled in our modern Bourbonistic feudalism. A narrow man and a bigoted, by sheer seniority of service he gravitated to the titular head of the upper house and, to hold his place of vantage that he might maintain a high-tariff wall about a congeries of Maine industries, to the injury of others, he swapped navy yards and stations with senators from other states with as little compunction as boys swap jack-knives. Nothing in his public life will so become him as his taking leave of it if he keeps his promise and does take leave of it without being pried loose.

One of Eugene's Lies

EUGENE HALE HAS WARNED the protected interests of Maine that if the Democrats capture the next House they will, within ninety days, fetch in a free-trade tariff bill that will knock the internals out of 'em. There are not enough free trade Democrats in the United States, if they were all sent to the lower house, to constitute a quorum of that body, but peradventure it were better to take hold with the insurgents and replenish the House with Republicans standing on the Indiana platform. In fact that platform is broad enough for Republicans and Democrats both to stand on, and we may look for a rush to see which can get there first.

As It Filters Out

AS IT FILTERS OUT through unstopable leaks the dismissal of Chief Martin is not to be brought about so much through the protests of the reputable element in our social life here in San Francisco, indignant as that element rightly is, as by reason of sounds similar to those uttered by a pig fast in the fence issuing from the red-light district itself. It is alleged that petty grafters connected with the city government in one form or another are so relentlessly applying the squeeze to that district and so little remains for those who practice iniquity as a profession, that it does not pay to practice it at all. This seems the more reasonable explanation, for, if the voice of righteousness was to be heeded at all, it should have been heard at the start.

As Mr. Bryan Sees It

"AS A DEMOCRAT," Mr. W. J. Bryan recently declared, "the outlook is very encouraging." No doubt of it! Any sort of row in the Republican ranks looks good to a Democrat, but what the public has a mild curiosity to know is how the political outlook appeals to Mr. Bryan as an American citizen. That is coming to be the truer test.

Not Theory, But Fact

IT IS NOT THE QUANTITATIVE THEORY of money that is confounding those of us who stood for the single gold standard in 1896, but the quantitative fact of an enormous and unlooked-for augmentation of the monetary standard itself. The quantity of money could be reduced by contracting the paper and silver representatives of money, and perhaps that ought to be done, but the supply of the standard can not be curtailed without putting a stop to mining and metallurgy and they can't be stopped. Will those bimetallicists never learn their financial a, b, c's?

Yes, Yes, So It Is

SOME ONE HAS WISELY SAID, "The noteworthy fact about the Twentieth century is not the prevalence of graft. That is eternal, even from infinite antiquity. The noteworthy thing now is the fight on graft." Yes, yes, so it is. Praise God for that, brother! There are godlike men walking this earth with head up and jaunty step and, as they walk, craven rascals slink around the corner or seek sanctuary in clubs or find protection under putrid governments of unclean cities. There is good cheer in that quotation.

Encouragement From Theodore

THANKS TO THE BULLETIN, San Franciscans who stand for Right Things have received words of encouragement from the greatest moral force now living in the world, even Theodore Roosevelt. At Porto Maurizio, in talking the situation over with James D. Phelan, Colonel Roosevelt expressed sorrow for the defeat of Heney, but he feels that the attack on wrong must continue, that though lawless wealth seeks to escape the penalty of wrongdoing, and seems to conquer at certain times, in the long run the honest man, whether wage-earner or man of means, will have his innings in city, state and nation. What if William Howard Taft had said that, and only that, when here, but he came and went and said not a word. Can anyone imagine Theodore Roosevelt missing such an opportunity to "eat 'em alive?"

Only the "Kids" Left

ONLY THINK OF IT! It was forty-five to forty-nine years ago that the boys in blue turned their faces to the southward and their hearts to the God of Battles, willing to die if the nation might live. Indeed, they were boys in those days, "just kids!" Subtract forty-five or forty-nine years from the ages of the veterans who visited Oakland this week, and then see. Those who were not boys when they went to the front were human tough-nuts whom nothing can kill. Brave boys they were! And fine old fellows they are! May their sunset be as radiant as was their morning.

Working It Up

IF THE ADVANCE AGENTS OF REFORM were to study the ways of the children of darkness their own feet might walk in radiance ever after. Witness the astute activities of the press agents for the Jeffries-Johnson knock-down and drag-out. Their method is that of the orchestral leader who begins with the wail of the flute, fetches the other instruments in piece by piece, strain by strain, until, at the psychological moment the bomb explodes, the firmament flies into smithereens and everybody gets hit. If one wishes to see exactly that thing done in prose and done beautifully, let him watch the sporting pages of our dailies that he may see with what skill public interest is being created in Mayor McCarthy's forthcoming intellectual feast of fists. Why can not righteousness somehow be made interesting, piquant and palatable? Must we go to the Devil to learn how?

Not Answerable For Consequences

GAMBLERS ON THE COTTON EXCHANGE have warned the administration at Washington that critical conditions, of their own making, exist in the cotton market and that if the administration does not keep its investigating hands off they, the gamblers, will not be answerable for consequences to cotton or country. If the President will proceed to set a bomb under those gamblers the country will be answerable for all consequences.

Business Hurting in a New Place

A number of well meaning persons lately assembled at Sacramento and organized the "California Public Health League," with the purpose of stamping out tuberculosis and other contagious diseases. Have these reformers reflected upon the injury they are likely to inflict upon lines of business long established, occupations by which honest citizens earn their living, rights that have become vested, even guaranteed by the constitution?

There are the lumber interests that furnish raw material for coffins, the foundrymen who turn out the castings that make the coffin furnishings, the craftsmen who sickly them o'er with a pale cast of silver, the needlewomen who, with deft fingers, fashion the shrouds, the patient gravediggers, the solemn undertakers, the great American coffin trust, physicians deprived of patients, nurses made idle for the want of employment, manufacturers and dispensers at a dollar a bottle of consumption remedies, warranted to cure if the patient has dollars enough and lasts long enough to drain bottles enough—have these meddlesome persons reflected upon the havoc they are likely to work in all these honorable occupations—with especial relation to the coffin trust?

The next we hear of them they will be trying to have reconsidered the edict of the McCarthy government in San Francisco whereby the building trades have been benefited and landlordism made increasingly profitable through a legalized shutting of the sun out of tenements and reducing of fresh air areas. Inasmuch as the American saloon kills more persons than the tubercle bacillus these fanatics may be sticking their meddlesome fingers into that business and be trying to abate it as a public nuisance.

Or they may turn their attention to the red plague which prostitutes of both sexes scatter up and down the length and breadth of the land, cursing generations yet unborn, filling the world with misshapen, blind, deaf and the unclean. They may have the impertinence to try to put on "the lid" that Mayor McCarthy of San Francisco was at so much pains to take off that joy might be unconfined and virtue unregarded. What, we should like to know, will become of the jewelry business when tawdry damsels and bleached out rogues have no money to spend for flashing diamonds and glistening pearls?

Why can not these people rest content to leave things as they are? Do they want everybody to die of old age? Did not the Lord God Almighty make tuberculosis bacilli? What right have these people to be interfering with His plans? Don't they know that money is the only good and that if nobody were allowed to prey upon anybody nobody would have a soft snap? Has not human life been a legitimate article of merchandise since the foundation of the world? Besides, the writer of this has a friend whose friend has a friend who is in the gravestone business and this movement for better health conditions is a menace to that occupation—all must stand or fall together.

Suppose that a city administration does make covenants with hell and exchanges souls with Satan for political preferment! Since when has that become illegitimate? Does not the Constitution of the United States forbid the impairment of contracts? What is a constitution for if not to protect one's personal liberty from invasion?

All that scoundrelism and money-lust ask is to be let alone. Why can't such people attend to their own affairs and stop "hurting business," we should like to know?

The Citizens' Alliance View

We are glad to be able, this week, to present to our readers the Citizens' Alliance view of the labor problem. It is a view that has a right to be considered and it must be taken into account if any settlement of issues between labor and capital is to be effected. Mr. Finnell has presented the issues with frankness.

He deplores the existence of the walking delegates. So do we. It were much better if the employees were to select from among their number some one in whom they have confidence to present their case for them to their employers, but who was it who forced the walking delegate upon the labor union? It was the employer who discharged the fellow laborer who came with a grievance representing his fellow workers. It is the employer, and not the labor union, that is responsible for the walking delegate. Let him therefore undo the mischief he has done by consenting to collective bargaining and to immunity from discharge if a fellow employee come with representations on behalf of his fellow workers.

That "perfect liberty of direction and control," which Mr. Finnell demands belongs to the old order of industrial life and not to the new. It is gone forever. Time was when the relation subsisting between the worker and the worked-for was one between slave and master, then it became a relation between master and servant. Now it is a relation between man and man, a relation subsisting between equals in a partnership. Whatever there may be of centralization and liberty of control must be founded upon mutual advantage and not upon autocracy in industry. Whoever stands for autocracy in industry ranges himself with the reactionaries, and will find himself little in accord with twentieth century spirit or practice.

The unalienable rights of the non-union worker have lately come to be of great concern to employers of a certain class, who were not wonted to be so concerned for human rights when pleaded for in the form of decent hours of labor for men or women or immunity from drudgery on the part of children who should be in school. Employers must not, therefore, be surprised if the public views this unwonted solicitude with suspicion of insincerity.

In very truth, the non-union laborer is not an attractive character. He wishes to walk under the umbrella which unionism raises over the heads of toilers without lending a hand to sustain it. He is frequently mean spirited and a shirk, or he is for self and has not the spirit of brotherhood in him.

Nevertheless, he has rights which the law must respect. Every reasonable opportunity must be afforded his brothers to persuade him, but none to compel. The safety of his person, contemptible though it may be, should be guaranteed if it takes all the power of army and navy to do it, and yet a line should somewhere be drawn betwixt the enjoyment of an abstract right and the breaking down of the whole brotherhood of toilers through enabling employers to take unhindered advantage of the necessities of men who must work or not eat. Industrial pressure, unless somehow modified, tends to force labor to a dead level of bare subsistence, and it will be hard to restrain beings possessed of the impulse to rise, and the instinct to fight, from resisting that tendency tooth and nail.

But if labor may not bargain collectively, may not accredit representatives to speak for it with authority, may not strike or boycott, may not picket or persuade, may not have a voice in the conduct of what is, and must ever be, essentially a partnership business, in God's name what may it do other than to endure outrageous fortune with stolid stoicism?

Where Indiana Leads

Opportunity, and the courage to seize it, have given Indiana, and its most courageous statesman, a good chance to lead the nation. Its Republican state convention came in the nick of time. Albert J. Beveridge threw down the gauntlet to Hemenway and the standpat contingent and swept them from the boards. This all happened a fortnight or more ago, but its significance is only now being felt throughout the nation. It is Indiana's lead.

Indianans declared that, "We believe in a protective tariff measured by the difference between the cost of production here and abroad. Less than this is unjust to American laborers; more is unjust to American consumers. That difference should be ascertained with the utmost speed, and the present law modified accordingly."

That is sound Republican doctrine. Anyone who says that it is not says what is not so. It is a sound statement of the American system of protection to home industries. Anyone who says it is not bears false witness.

Whoever declares that the Payne-Aldrich tariff was constructed in accordance with the principles enunciated in the paragraph above quoted, be he president or citizen, does so either because he is himself deceived or because he would deceive others. The Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was constructed in accordance with the American practice of tariff making, not the theory. The theory is splendidly stated above. The practice is one of log-rolling, "you stand for my plunder and I'll stand for your graft." It is abominable, and those producers who stand for it because they profit by it are grafters.

There is just one way to make a tariff schedule and that is to search the markets of the world for the basic facts of production, the searching to be done by non-partisan experts. The schedules should be amended from year to year, and session to session of congress, as the facts ascertained justify such amendment. Here again Indiana splendidly leads in declaring that, "We demand the immediate creation of a genuine, permanent, non-partisan tariff commission with ample powers and definite duties stated in the law itself."

The President is in accord with this view. In fact, he is trying to use the tariff board to that end, although the tariff board was not created for any such purpose and in face of the fact that congress specifically denied him a tariff commission, all of which goes to show that he does not find it as essential to be "but-tressed by the law," when he finds something that he wishes very much to do as in cases where he is more or less indifferent. He should put up with no half-way measure. He should serve notice upon Congress that it is a tariff commission or a fight, with an appeal to the country to aid him in that fight.

Here comes the issue important for Californians to draw. Not one representative should go to congress who will not stand on the platform planks quoted above. Better a Democrat who will stand on them than a Republican who will not. As to how our congressmen may have voted, under pressure of the American practice of swapping protection for protection or graft for graft, is unimportant. We can not demand more of courage from our rep-representatives in congress than we ourselves possess. The issue should be: "How will you vote from this time on?" It is time to put an end to a national iniquity that demoralizes our best men and makes "The Cinch" the cornerstone of commerce and industry.

Aldrich as a Type

The retirement of Nelson A. Aldrich from the United States senate will carry sorrow to no honest heart, and yet Aldrich is probably an honest man, as we have come to rate honesty. He would not steal and he would not lie, except as the exigencies of diplomacy might require him to give an evasive answer. But the Aldrich type of mind is dangerous. It cherishes no ideals and no enthusiasms. It is the mind of the get-there Yankee who employs no means not necessary to the end he has in view and scruples at the employment of none. He has converted the acquisitive qualities of millions into merchandise and has made of the United States senate a bargain counter over which he himself has presided as chief huckster. To the Aldrich mind Rights of Men are inconsequential and rights of property paramount. The individual has been lost in the corporation whose prosperity is indispensable and comprises within itself all the needs of a nation. As for the common man, what can he want more than wages? How can he secure wages unless there are prosperous corporations to employ him? When an Aldrich is not dealing with the affairs of a people as with merchandise arrayed on a bargain counter he is working out industrial and political problems as a game of chess in which he would handle industries as titled pieces and people as pawns. He neither loves nor hates and, utterly without malice or human concern, has done as much as any man now living to resolve his native land into a plutocracy and proletariat and a free republic into an oligarchy under bond to greater and more tyrannous special interests than the world, in all its history, has ever before known. The retirement of Aldrich can work nothing but good to his country. May he be the last of his kind.

Art Thou the Man?

Few peoples have ever loved liberty more heartily than have the Hungarians, and nowhere that our first citizen has been has he found any people more anxious to do him honor than in Hungary, where the love of the people proved more dangerous than the ferocity of the African jungle. And why? The answer given by Theodore Roosevelt himself is perhaps the best that may be given. It is that they regard him as personifying the spirit of liberty and human rights. Is that not also the reason why he is so popular in his own country?

It is not with contentment that discerning Americans perceive old world history repeating itself in this land that was dedicated to an emancipated civilization; a new feudalism as treacherous as the old succeeding an era of unhampered liberty with equality of opportunity; wealth centering in vaster hoards and fewer hands than ever before since the world began. We have been disappointed to find that an unrestrained individualism has not preserved equality of condition, and that a laissez faire democracy is fast transforming the country into a plutocracy and proletariat. We have had liberty, but it has been unrestrained by human rights. We have exalted the idea of individual freedom to the sacrifice of the spirit of human brotherhood. We have emphasized personal success to the injury of the common good. We have so lost the spirit of fair play that our commerce and industry have come to be founded upon The Cinch. Our policy has resulted in making our biggest and brainiest men into law-breaking, competition-crushing, robber barons and, of those who are weaker, either apologetic retainers or hate-cherishing proletarians.

Who is to lead us to a broader and more liberal fraternalism, a fraternalism that will exalt the common good above the unbridled selfishness of any individual and yet not plunge us into that socialistic vortex that would kill initiative, smother enterprise and equalize conditions only by pulling down from the top instead of lifting up from the bottom. Theodore Roosevelt, art thou the man or look we for another?

Our need is for leadership. No other voice than that of Roosevelt has been listened to so readily or commanded so wide a hearing. No other public man has so emphasized and vitalized the plain, homely virtues upon which we must depend. No other public man of the first magnitude has so dared to challenge the right of the robber barons to plunder the public under the guise of a false conception of the inviolability of liberty and the sacredness of property. No other prophet of the common good has so stirred the hearts of rich and poor. No other influence, outside the Christian religion, has done so much to correct erroneous views of living and implant sound ideals in the minds of millions.

Our civilization needs to be revolutionized, not with force and arms, yet profoundly and from the foundation upward. Brotherhood must be exalted at the expense of extreme individualism, co-operation over exploitation. We must somehow be piloted safely between the Scylla of socialism and the Charybdis of anarchy. Was it for that purpose that Theodore Roosevelt was born into the world? There be many who hope as much, and who dare to hope that he will come home to throw himself into the conflict with a zeal that nothing can withstand.

And Why Not?

Certain ill-mannered suffragists lately hissed the President of the United States for having expressed the fear that, in the event of enfranchising women, the least desirable portion of the sex would participate most generally in elections, while the most desirable would prove indifferent. The fear was not unfounded. It finds justification in the voting sex every election that is held. Politics is participated in mainly by men of two classes: Those whose eyes are upon the ground, those who are held together by the cohesive power of patronage if not of graft. These number twenty-five to thirty per cent. of the total voting constituency. Then there is a much smaller group, probably not above five per cent. of the whole, who go into politics with eyes fixed upon the stars, sacrificing their time, their means and their strength for the common good, desiring no compensation beyond the good opinions of their fellow citizens. All the rest, sixty to seventy per cent. of any voting constituency, are dull and indifferent, stupidly unconcerned for their own welfare except as, now and again, the five per cent. of vitalized leaven work among them and so finally, and at great pains, persuade them to render judgment between the evil and the good, between the self-seekers and the seekers after justice. What right have we to suppose that it will be different with women than with men? Are they not flesh of our flesh and bone of our bone? Are not their fathers and mothers our fathers and mothers? The suffrage reform that the nation needs is that which will take the ballot from those not fit to use it and put it into hands that are fit and do use it. When suffrage is so bestowed the line of demarcation will not be that dividing race from race, sex from sex, color from color or nativity from nativity. Doubling the voting constituencies of government is not likely to aid the solution of the problem, but if some means can be found for compelling the performance of civic duty the enfranchisement of women will be looked upon in a more favorable light.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

The little predaceous, herbaceous insects that live on the tender buds and shoots that grow on trees and plants owe their existence to the fact that, despite evil tendencies, they love light rather than darkness, habitually face it and crawl toward it and so find the food that they must have or perish. If they crawled the other way they would go down the tree away from their food supply and so perish miserably in the midst of plenty. They do not do this from instinct or choice, but rather as the result of chemical or other affinity betwixt the sun's rays and their organs of sensation. The relation is purely chemical and implies neither instinct nor choice, but it serves.

We mortals belong to a higher order. Not that the sun's rays may not exert important influences upon mentality and character. Probably they do. Families living under the almost continuous shade of the Alps are frequently afflicted with cretins, mis-shapen idiots superstitiously supposed to bring good luck to the family, but, in reality, one of the direst afflictions. Transplant those families to sunny instead of shady slopes and cretinism disappears from them. So with all human kind. If we do not face the light we become morbid and unwholesome.

But we can not rely on the chemical action of the sun to make us face the light when we should, nor will instinct suffice for it. A false view of our interests often overcomes the innate tendency, the instinctive desire, and prompts us to face the other way, so that we find ourselves standing in our own light, living in the shadows of pre-judgment, which is prejudice. Nothing could be more hurtful. That way lies the starvation of our better selves as certainly as starvation would await the insect larva if it crawled down the tree toward darkness instead of up the tree toward light and life. The insect crawls upward because he must, but we do it because we will or refuse to do it because we will not.

It would be easier for the caterpillar to go down the tree than up. Gravity operates in that direction, and it would only have to let go in order to reach the ground in a hurry. It is easier for us also to go down than up. The forces of atavism (human gravity) act always to pull us down the tree of life toward mental and moral starvation. If we turn toward the light it is because we resolve to do so. We have to seek if we would find, knock if we would have a higher life opened to us. There is no other way for us, but it is worth the effort. It is toward the light that we are to look for beauty, for inspiration, the evolutionary impulse, higher altitudes and the broader view.

But the open mind has its disadvantages. It is seldom cocksure. It is not ever and always the same. It is often convicted of inconsistency. The earlier and the later writings of every great philosopher, thinker, teacher, will be found to be in disagreement. The ass of today holds exactly the same opinions that were held by the ass that Jesus rode into Jerusalem. The opinions of the opaque mind are clean cut and uncompromising, while he who knows most of any subject, whose face is always toward the light, who has climbed to the highest outlook and from whose brow the sunlight is reflected most radiantly, still confesses that he sees through a glass darkly, that he does not yet stand face to face with the eternal verities.

Nevertheless, it is only as we face toward the light that there is life, growth, the joy of making progress, the satisfaction of a fair and free outlook, as in gazing upon a beautiful landscape, the sense of being alive and living abundantly. The light which now and again breaks in upon the visage of the sincere, upturned face of the patient and constant seeker after truth, no matter how inconsistent with preconceived hypotheses and conceptions, is that light which never was seen on sea or land and is the greater glory, a scintillation from the glory of God. Walk ever with face toward the light!

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Two Varieties of Immigrants

Here are some statistics relating to immigration to this country which are full of food for thought. During the month of March, just past, 108,288 immigrants arrived at the port of New York, and this was a larger number than have arrived in the corresponding month of any year. Of these immigrants 29,488, or more than 27 per cent., were Italians, and about 2,000, or less than 2 per cent., were Englishmen. Fifteen to one is a striking disproportion in numbers, but, as the value of immigration depends upon quality rather than quantity, we need not mind the disproportion, provided we can be convinced that the average Italian will make approximately as good a citizen as will the average Englishman. Unfortunately further facts compel another conviction. Of the 2,000 Britons, just four, or one-fifth of one per cent., could neither read nor write. Of the 29,488 Italians, 13,070, or 45 per cent., were illiterate. That is, the Italians outnumbered the English in illiteracy in the proportion of 225 to 1. As popular enlightenment is the very corner-stone of a republic, these facts, as has been said, are food for thought, and particularly serious thought at that.

Seven-Eighths of Coal Wasted

If some man—women not barred—should invent a method of conserving the fuel energy of coal, he would take his place among the notable benefactors of mankind. As it is, the waste of this fuel energy is appalling to one who considers it. Here are the figures relating to this waste, as prepared by the manager of a great power-house, who took 10,000 as representative of the number of work units in a pound of coal. He found that 3,620 work units were wasted in the boiler-room, the waste being divided as follows: 300 in the ash-pit, 1,960 in the stack, 560 in banking fires, and 800 in radiation, etc. In the engine-room were wasted 5,180 work units, divided as follows: 4,810 lost in the condenser, and 370 by radiation from the pipes. Summed up, we find that of 10,000 work units in a pound of coal 8,800 are wasted, and but 1,200 are made useful to man. It follows that if, by any invention, this waste could be decreased by only one-half, the value of coal to mankind would be multiplied by four and two-thirds. This is an age of wonderful inventions, and if some of the men who have made it so would turn a thoughtful eye in the direction of coal they might greatly benefit mankind. Not that much attention has not been given to this subject, but sooner or later, if continued, as it will be, it must result in success.

The Cape to Cairo Railroad

The "dark continent," of which Livingston and Speke gave the civilized world almost its first glimpse, rapidly is turning, or being turned, unto the light. The Cape to Cairo railroad, which is, in a sense, the child of the active brain of that remarkable man, Cecil Rhodes, has progressed so far that it requires no prophet's eye to foresee its completion. Very soon the entire line will be surveyed, and by the end of this month locomotives will be running from Capetown to a point 2,247 miles north, or 100 miles beyond the frontier of that Congo country which once was about the blackest of black Africa. As the entire distance from Capetown to Cairo is 5,600 miles, it will be seen that the southern half of the line nears completion. Between Capetown, Victoria Falls and Broken Hill through trains now are running twice a week. Where the railroad goes civilization is not far behind, and it follows that it will not be long until the "dark continent" will exist only as a feature of ancient books of adventure.

Russia Persecuting the Jews

Unspeakably it is a reproach to our civilization that Russia's cruel persecution of the Jews is permitted to continue. Nations which have the temerity to dub themselves Christian sit placidly by and see an unfortunate people driven from their homes, sometimes murdered, frequently tortured, and always shamefully abused, without putting forth any effort to put an end to so terrible a condition. If this be Christianity, wherein would paganism be worse? The old persecution has been renewed in full force. Already 1,600 families (perhaps 8,000 people) of Bokhara Jews have been driven from their homes and know not where to turn for shelter. In Kieff 1,200 families (say, 6,000 people) have been expelled from such homely domiciles as they occupied. More than that, the Jews have been expelled from those "settlement districts" in which they had been given what purported to be the legal right to live. What day this spirit of the anti-Christ may break out in slaughter no man knows, but Russian history assures us that it may not be far away. No record of any barbarism could read much worse; yet Russia pretends to be Christian, and the nations that sit by and do nothing, they also are "Christian." Sometimes, in man's social economy, "Christian" is but a poor, cheap word.

The Aviation Meeting in Nice

Little has been said in the daily papers concerning the aviation meeting which now is in progress on the Champs d'Aviation de la Californie, at Nice, France. Yet, if one may judge by the size of the prizes offered, the meeting should be of considerable importance. Following are the awards which will be made at the close of the meeting next Monday: $10,500 for flight from Nice to Cannes and return, 31 miles; $10,000 for largest total distance covered; $8,000, flight from Nice to Cape Farat and return, 15 miles; $8,000, Nice to Antibes and return; $5,000, fastest lap; $4,000, longest single flight; $3,000, greatest height; $2,000, start in shortest space; $2,000, passenger-carrying contest; $1,000, mechanics' contest; $500, doubling the lighthouse at Garoupe. Here is a total of $54,000, and, as it will be divided among a mere handful of men, it should be sufficient to lend speed to the aviators' wings and make the contests most interesting.

Says Jericho's Walls Did Not Fall

Professor Sellin, who is at the head of a German expedition which is now excavating at Jericho, in the Holy Land, has sent back a report concerning the result of his investigations. According to him, the walls of Jericho did not fall down when Joshua's priests blew their horns. Quite to the contrary, the professor says that the city's triple walls are excellently preserved, standing and in particularly good condition. In the course of his researches he has found implements belonging to the stone age of the Canaanites, as well as the bronze and iron implements of later ages. These latter discoveries, of course, should have been expected, but the condition of the walls may prove a puzzler to some savants.

The Coldest Town in the World

Verkhoyansk is a little trading town in northeastern Siberia, and people who are likely to be overcome by heat might do well to establish a residence there. At any rate, the heat is not what should be termed excessive, as the mean annual temperature is hardly three degrees above zero, Fahrenheit, or 29 degrees below the freezing point of water. When it gets really chilly, however, the spirit in the thermometer sinks to 85 below zero. There is a short summer which is comparatively warm, its mean temperature being 59 degrees above zero.

The gift of half a million dollars made by Mrs. Russell Sage to the American Bible Society on condition that a like amount be raised by the society has become effective. The $1,000,000 thus secured is to be a permanent endowment fund, the income to be used for the distribution of Bibles through nine agencies in America and twelve abroad. Of the half million raised by the society the largest gifts were of $25,000 each. The smallest was 10 cents and nearly ten thousand persons sent one and two-dollar subscriptions.

SAVAGE ON AMERICAN DRAMA

In the course of a recent interview, Henry Savage, the noted theatrical manager, spoke of the improved condition of the American drama. "Freak drama and freakish projects in the theater," he said, "seem to have had their day in America, even if the air is as yet well filled with moonshine of the wordy sort. As a matter of fact I do not believe that the playgoing public in any part of the world has a particle of interest either in the actual attempts to stage queer things or in the imaginative announcements that appear so frequently.

"For my own country I think I can speak with a good deal of definiteness. America is keener than ever for really worthwhile entertainment; but its people demand sincerity, and, above all else, real quality. Next to operetta with a genuine purpose and first-class music, comedies of sentiment and gay little plays that stand half way between farce and comedy, seem to be most in demand. There is also renewed interest in the works of native writers—a demand I mean to try to meet liberally next season with such pieces as A. E. Thomas' comedy, 'The Divorce Fund,' Gustav Luder's 'Grape Girl,' and Rupert Hughes' novel piece, 'Excuse Me.'

"I have not by any means abandoned European fields, however, and I have in 'The Great Name' a comedy of sentiment with a charming musical motif. In 'Little Boy Blue,' the Franco-Hungarian operetta, and a lively French farce, 'Theodore & Co.,' the material seems also quite in the right line."

PLAYS IN STOCK THEATERS

The New York Sun says that of all the 400-odd plays used by stock companies throughout the country, "The House of a Thousand Candles," one of the flattest failures New York ever saw, has proved the biggest "money-maker," not only of the last few years, but has made a record for stock use.

This is one of the freaks of psychology which help to make the providing of material for the stock companies a business by itself, and almost as much of a gamble in its way as a New York first night. In fact, "The House of a Thousand Candles," in spite of having E. M. Holland for the leading part, was declared to be so hopelessly melodramatic on Broadway that it was almost immediately withdrawn. There is no saying how long a play may not last in stock. "Charley's Aunt" is still doing big business, "East Lynne" is just as good as it ever was, and the brokers are simply "honing" for the time when "Madame X" shall be released for stock. They believe it will last forever there like "East Lynne."

"The Man on the Box," which never made any claims to literary merit, is bringing its author tremendous returns, and from present indications there are several years' life still left in "Alabama" and "In Mizzoura." "Arizona," which isn't so awfully young any more, does splendidly.

"Madame Sans Gene" and "The Sporting Duchess" are yet drawing in the shakels abundantly. "Shenandoah" is only now beginning to lose its hold, while, strange to say, "Shore Acres," which seems almost an ideal "stock" play, hasn't done well at all.

The explanation for this given by the brokers is that the owners withheld the play until the psychological moment was past. When finally the Herne estate released the play the towns in the Middle West had forgotten all about its previous fame. Guessing the moment for "release" is another element of the gamble.

As soon as a play is used in stock it is "dead" for use on the road, for the routes then become dotted with towns where the production could not possibly draw because the townspeople have seen it already acted by the local stock companies. Accordingly, if a play is released too early profits from "the road" are cut off; too late, and the fickle public will have forgotten all about it.

Mme. Marie Kraus-Bolte has just celebrated at her home in New York her fiftieth anniversary in kindergarten work. Mme. Kraus-Bolte was a pupil of Frau Froebel, and speaking of her early experience said: "I was almost afraid to come to America. I was afraid of the Indians, whom I was sure I would meet in America. I have always been glad that I overcame this groundless fear. I shall keep right straight on with my kindergarten work, and some people tell me I am good for fifty years longer." The celebration was given by the Kraus Alumnae Association, which is composed of pupils of Mme. Kraus-Bolte.

Emil J. Meyer, 70 years old, a country school teacher of Gerald, Mo., has made application for admission to the University of Missouri. Mr. Meyer desires to study agriculture, history and music.

"OLD JOHN BROWN"

By A. F. Kercheval

Albert Kercheval was a resident of Pasadena, to which city the best known of his poems is dedicated. A book of verse published a few years before his death contained these lines on John Brown.

O, the quivering, shuddering haze
Of those smoke-palled, gloomy days!
Through the country up and down,
Stalked the soul of "Old John Brown,"
Ever "marching on" and on,
Shrieking, sobbing, sighing, gone,
Startling with its quaint refrain
Drooping hope to life again.

How it stirred a Nation's heart
With a pulsing, mighty start!
How the farmer left his plow
In the furrow, half-way through,
As he heard the martial strain
Of that mystic weird refrain!

How the workmen left their tools,
And the pedagogues the schools!
How the merchant left his store!
How the clerk his colors bore!
With a loftier, prouder mien
Than the counter e'er had seen!
How the lawyer left his brief
To avenge his country's grief!

How the priest laid down the Word
For the all-convincing sword!
How the peaceful Quaker grave,
Swift his country's life to save,
To his soul's deep instincts true,
Dropped the drab and donned the blue!

How it filled with quenchless fire
Maid and matron, son and sire,
Quickening sluggish blood of age
With a noble, burning rage!
How the student ceased to pore
O'er the past's forgotten lore,
Thrilled as by a magic spell,
Bidding home and books farewell,
When the summons deep and grand
Like an earthquake shook the land!

How its echoes throbbed and rang,
When a million heroes sprang
At the cannon's awful call,
With its tale of Sumter's fall!
How it rose, and sank, and wailed,
Where the camp-fires blazed and paled!
How the swelling anthem pealed
O'er each battle-tented field!
How it cheered the weary slave,
Stirred the coward and the brave—
When 'mid serried hosts of blue
Thrilled its cadence through and through!

Glory, glory! it is done!
Freedom's battle fought and won,
Hallelujah! not a scar
Now remains of hate and war!
Peaceful are our Nation's days—
God of Right, we give Thee praise!

If she be kind
I shall be true,
And she shall find
The skies so blue
The world so fair
That she shall ne'er have cause to rue,
If she be kind.

If he be true
I shall be kind,
And I shall do
That thing I find
Best pleases him
And keeps me dearest in his mind,
If he be true.

Thou hast been kind,
Thou hast been true,
And Thou, we find,
Beyond the blue,
Hast been so good
These years, oh, Thou our love renew,
Most True, Most Kind.

AN INTERESTING BOOKMAN

George Cary Eggleston's "Recollections of a Varied Life" is one of the most interesting books of April. The author is one of the most interesting and beloved of the literary men of New York, where he has made his home since the civil war, during which he served in the confederate army, although a native of Vevay, Ind. His brother, the late Rev. Dr. Edward Eggleston, author of "The Hoosier Schoolmaster" and other excellent books, was one of the founders of the Authors' Club of New York, of which George Cary Eggleston is one of the leading members. George Cary was in the practice of law in Virginia when the war of secession began. He was for six years literary editor of the New York Evening Post; then editor of the Commercial Advertiser, and for eleven years editorial writer for the World. Among his books are "A Rebel's Recollections," "Captain Sam," "The Signal Boys," "Camp Venture," "A Daughter of the South," "Love is the Sum of It All."

"VILLAGE SMITH" DEAD

Thaddeus W. Tyler, the original "village smith," made famous by Longfellow in his poem beginning, "Under a spreading chestnut tree," died two weeks ago at his home in Lynn, Mass. He was 76 years old and had been ill for several days with pleuro pneumonia. Mr. Tyler was a blacksmith for only a few years. Shortly after the poet was inspired to write the famous poem which he conceived while watching Tyler at work over his forge and anvil, the latter went into the shoe manufacturing business, and invented a process of moulded stiffenings for shoes. He still remained a close friend of Longfellow, however, and was a frequent visitor at his home. He always spoke of the poet with affection, and was very proud that his was the original "village smithy." Few of his business associates were aware of the fact. He leaves three children, three grandchildren, and one great grandchild.

Miss Jane B. Haines has opened a school of agriculture for women at Ambler, Pa. The school is modeled after the famous school at Swansea, England.

Mrs. Susan Look Avery of Louisville and Mrs. Hannah M. Bryan of Rochester have each contributed $1,000 to the Susan B. Anthony fund, which is to be used in erecting a building on the campus for women students of Rochester University. Both Mrs. Avery and Mrs. Bryan were close personal friends of Miss Anthony and are suffragists. Mrs. Henry G. Danforth, who has charge of the fund, reports that $12,000 is now in bank to the credit of the association. Mrs. William C. Gannett, president of the association, has spoken in various cities in behalf of the memorial.

PLAYGROUNDS IN LOS ANGELES

AN INSPIRING MUNICIPAL ACHIEVEMENT

The playgrounds system of Los Angeles is a combination of places for play and places for neighborhood social activity. A typical example of the Los Angeles ideal in playground making is the Violet street playground. Here is a plot of land, two acres in area, in which are sandboxes for the children to play in, swings for the babies, seesaws, maypoles, croquet grounds, tennis courts, and basket ball courts for the girls, and, for the boys, a baseball field, handball and basket ball courts, and an open-air gymnasium with the necessary apparatus. Hot and cold shower baths are provided. A summerhouse, where the mothers may sit and watch the children play, is an important accessory. There are many small gardens, in which the boys and girls grow vegetables and flowers.

But fully as important as the playground is the clubhouse, in one corner of the grounds, where entertainments may be given. This clubhouse is equipped with an assembly room containing a raised stage, and with a kitchen stocked with dishes and utensils. Sewing is taught here, and some of the manual arts; games, drills and folk dances are played or practiced; and musical and dramatic entertainments given. Weekly lectures and concerts are provided except in the summer, one evening of the month being reserved for home talent, when the children who use the grounds are the only ones who participate in the exercises.

The social settlement idea is worked out further by having the home of the director on the ground. He and his family thus become inseparably a part of the neighborhood life and they throw around the features of the playground the inspiring atmosphere of home. This phase of the Los Angeles idea is considered among the most essential of all the betterment work.

This, roughly, is the pattern upon which the playgrounds of Los Angeles are based. The ground just described was the first to be opened in that city, five years ago. Since that time (three years ago) the Echo park ground has been opened, a site more than twice as large as the Violet street, and with some added attractions. Here a Playground Republic has been organized, formed of those youthful regular visitors who care to join (there is no compulsion about it) and who can pay the monthly tax of five cents. The citizens of the republic make laws, elect officials—president, judge and police—and enforce the rudimentary part of the playground discipline.

The third achievement of the Los Angeles Playground commission is the establishment of a recreation center, a term used to differentiate this ground's purpose from the ordinary playground. This center is an effort to supply much the same advantages that are offered by a Y. M. C. A. building. A $30,000 building on a corner lot 120 by 200 feet was equipped at a cost of $5,600. This place was completed in October, 1908.

A large gymnasium is the principal attraction of the building. This gymnasium is 74 by 44 feet, with lights on three sides and opening on the fourth side into a large stage, so that the whole can be used as an auditorium. Bowling alleys, lockers, two clubrooms, district nurses' headquarters, library and a kitchen are other features of the building, besides ten marble shower baths. A five-room apartment for the manager again carries out the idea of the social settlement.

The use of this building is divided between the sexes and the different ages. On certain days and at certain hours the women and girls have the exclusive use of the gymnasium and bath, and at other times the men and boys have a monopoly. The little children use the building in the afternoons, and, after dark, the youths and young girls are kept off the street by wholesome amusements fostered by the manager. Dramatic and musical clubs, drum and bugle corps, Saturday night lectures and entertainments provide an abundance of safe rivals to the cheap dance halls. In the course of time the present building will be enlarged to surround three sides of a court, of which the present is but one wing.

The idea of the playground commission is to correlate, in such recreation centers as this, all those functions of municipal activity that touch the leisure hours of the people. The public library has established a branch at each center, from which books are issued to the number of 1,500 a month and at which current magazines and daily papers are accessible in a pleasant reading-room. Quiet games, like checkers, are encouraged.

Some district nursing work is also done from these centers as headquarters. Two nurses answer calls registered at the Violet street ground and at the Recreation center, and some drugs are dispensed from them. These headquarters are also the base from which the nurses carry on the inspection work in the public schools. Band concerts, arranged through the co-operation of the newly created Municipal Band commission, are maintained during the summer months. These are simply school yards, equipped with whatever apparatus they will conveniently hold. A man and a woman are stationed in each yard, to supervise the play and to maintain the slight discipline that is required. Stories are told to the children, basketry and sewing are taught to those who care to learn, and folk dancing is permitted in the kindergarten rooms.

At the close of each vacation all the playgrounds, permanent and vacation, have an inter-playground field meet, in which there are no individual entries but in which teams of boys or girls are entered against teams from rival grounds. Many prizes and trophies are awarded, all of which are hung in the clubhouse on the ground of the winning teams.

On May Day of last year a new annual play festival was instituted, in which all the playgrounds participated, in the folk dances, drills and games, witnessed by 15,000 people. A May queen was crowned, and the children carried out the picturesque customs of the maypole dance.

The staff in charge of the playgrounds is most important. Los Angeles had the good fortune to secure at the start a superintendent whose training and sympathies made him an ideal man for the work. He has surrounded himself with qualified assistants who enjoy the work and understand its social significance. Each playground has a man and a woman who are the directors. A physical instructor is employed by the hour in the gymnasium of the recreation center. An accompanist, also employed by the hour, plays wherever the dances or drills require music. None of the men employed by the playground commission, not even the janitors, are allowed to smoke.

Two new playgrounds are the Hazard and the Slauson avenue playgrounds. The former contains about eleven acres, and will be fitted up on the same principle as the Stadium in Golden Gate park in San Francisco, with tiers of seats on a natural slope for spectators of the field sports and ball games for which the field is especially adapted by its size.

The Slauson avenue playground contains four and a half acres, and will be equipped much the same as the Echo park ground. It will have, besides, a running track.

Another ground, of three and a half acres, will soon be opened on city land in the heart of Los Angeles, to be known as the Downey avenue playground. Still another ground to which the children may look forward is a six-acre plot in Agricultural park. Another part of this park, 30 acres probably, will be set off for use as an athletic field where the big games, field meets and festivals of the future will be held.

The two most encouraging facts about the Los Angeles playgrounds are the hearty sympathy of the city administration toward the idea of founding and fostering these places, and the almost unanimous demand for more of them on the part of the public. The people at large have realized the enormous advantage to themselves in having such places where their children may play safely and participate in the social life of the neighborhood. Their cry now is for playgrounds within walking distance of every home in Los Angeles.

Another point worthy of consideration and emulation by other cities is that Los Angeles is acquiring sites for playgrounds years ahead of their probable utilization. This is not only proper but it is good, sound business sense. No one who has given the playground idea any study has any doubts of the economic saving to the city and the commonwealth that comes from the presence of playgrounds. Counting the reduced cost of policemen, police courts and reformatories, the added economic efficiency of children who may play in the open instead of indoors, and the saving achieved by correlating the municipal enterprises around the recreation grounds or centers, playgrounds are a good investment from a purely monetary point of view. And to purchase the land for such grounds some years before that land advances to exorbitant prices is a sensible piece of municipal financing.

Los Angeles has done well with her playgrounds, probably more in proportion to her population than any city in California. Her example should be studied by other cities and towns, and should be followed to the extent of the means at their command.

One last point. The adoption of the playground idea is one more sign of progress, indicating that American municipalities are struggling upward toward a new light which they now plainly see, which will ultimately lead them to the point already largely achieved in Germany, where municipal government has become a practical science, engaging the full time and energies of specially trained men and women. The old idea that any jack-of-all trades is qualified to hold any public office is fast losing ground, and the playgrounds, calling for trained administrators, will help to relegate it to oblivion, just as the modern science of public health and sanitation has given it a heavy blow.

"MAN HATH NO ARMOR AGAINST DEATH."

(In the "Antigone" of Sophocles.)

"Wonders are many, and none is more wonderful than man; the power that crosses the white sea, driven by the stormy south wind, making a path under surges that threaten to engulf him; and Earth, the eldest of the gods, the immortal, the unwearied, doth he wear, turning the soil with the offspring of horses, as the plows go to and fro from year to year."

"And the light-hearted race of birds, and the tribes of savage beasts, and the sea-brood of the deep, he snares in the meshes of his woven toils, he leads captive man excellent in wit. And he masters by his arts the beast whose lair is in the wilds, who roams the hills; he tames the horse of shaggy mane, he puts the yoke upon its neck, he tames the tireless mountain bull."

"And speech, and wind-swift thought, and all the moods that mold a state, hath he taught himself; and how to flee the arrows of the frost, when 'tis hard lodging under the clear sky and the arrows of the rushing rain; yea, he hath resource for all; without resource he meets nothing that must come; only against Death shall he call for aid in vain."

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

The Planters' and Growers' Company, an Eastern corporation, has purchased 1,440 acres of land near Dixon, which will be set out to eucalypts.

The first cherries shipped East this year from California were grown at Courtland, in Sacramento county.

In a recent election in the city of Redlands the Good Government party elected every one of its nominees except the candidate for marshal.

Willows has voted to annex its suburbs by a good majority, and henceforth will boast of a population of about 3,000, as against 800 in 1900.

The Stockton Record has entered upon its sixteenth year of daily publication, and it is a clean and helpful "record" that it has made all the way.

The Pomona Times is to be issued as a daily. This will make three dailies in the place, which seems to be enough.

A Campaign Song

(Which should be jubilantly and melodiously sung to the old tune that everybody knows.)
Toot the good old whistle, boys, and let the engine go!
Anderson is on the jump, and Curry's lying low,
And Stanton's nursing infant hopes in trust that they will grow—
Anything to beat this Hiram Johnson!

Chorus:

Hurray! Hooroo! The brand we always wear!
Hooroo! Hurray! The cinders in our hair!
The jangling of the engine-bell behind the Gov'nor's chair—
Anything to beat this Hiram Johnson!

Mary had a little lamb, its baa was like a toot.
And Jack and Jill, they wore a brand the S. P. style to suit.
While Anderson and Curry cried, "The whistle blows! Salute!"— Anything to beat this Hiram Johnson!

Chorus:

Hurray! Hooroo! The whistle's sounding queer!
Hooroo! Hurray! Machine is out of gear!
And that is what the gang will think when August next is here
And no one has beaten Hiram Johnson.

You or Your Liver—Which?

You are tired; tired, anyway, even if you haven't done a thing. You get up in the morning tired, you drag through the day tired, you go to bed tired; being tired is your long suit. You realize that your liver is practically solid, and you have a strong suspicion that petrification has set in. This is the time, too, that your stomach selects to send a committee to you to notify you that you must give it shorter hours and better wages or it will go on a strike. To be sure, the Californian sky is blue, but what of that? You could give it cards and spades on blueness, and then beat it out. Oh, living is tough under such circumstances, isn't it, Jeroboam?

Yes, but did you ever pause to reflect, dear boy, that these are precisely the circumstances under which the test of our manhood or womanhood is made? To be sweet-tempered when all life seems sunny and beautiful to you, that is nothing; but to be so when every natural instinct of human cussedness within you prompts you to snarl at Betsy and the babies, to growl about the coffee, to kick the cat—ah, that is the test that decides whether you or your liver is the mightier. It is regrettably but tremendously natural to yield the victor's throne to the liver. Is it not? Look back on your record, and tell me, just between ourselves, in what proportion of instances you fancy you have done it. But don't ask me how often I have done a similar thing, for I despise these personal questions. Nevertheless, Jeroboam, let's hold close to the uplifting thought that men can rise superior to their occasional tendency to smash things. I know they can, for I have seen them do it. We can be sweet of disposition even when our stomach is discontented with life, and, in all seriousness, it is a splendid thing to do. Suppose we try it? What do you say?

Primer Lesson for Willie

Do you see the man, Wil-lie?
Yes, you do see the man.
Is he a nice man, Wil-lie?
Oh, such a nice man!
What is the man's name?
It is Frank Jor-dan. Do you see his hand, Wil-lie?
Yes, you do see his hand.
Is it a glad hand?
Yes, it is a glad hand.
What has the nice man on his back?
Yes, it is a coat, Wil-lie.
What made the creas-es in the coat?

The vot-ing ma-chines he car-ried made them.

What did he do with the ma-chines?
Yes, Wil-lie, he sold them to the coun-ties.
What did the coun-ties do with them?
They threw them a-way.
Does the nice man want an of-fice, Wil-lie?
Does a duck swim?
Will he be Sec-re-ta-ry of State?
Will the vot-ing ma-chines vote?
They will not.

Is it not too bad a-bout the nice man, Wil-lie?

And the vot-ing ma-chines that do not vote?
Oh, the poor hand, how glad it seems, and yet—

Let us weep to-geth-er, Wil-lie.

The Opinions of Rufus

Always when I hear a man laugh at the mother-in-law joke I can't help wonderin' what his wife's done to him to make him feel that way 'bout her ma.

I used to deny that men was descended from monkeys, but I've met some fellers sence then that kind o' make me hesitate some 'bout feelin' so certain.

Have you ever reflected, brethren an' sisters, that the most noticeable thing 'bout some folks we meet is the price they pay for their clothin'?

You're mistaken, Ezry; law ain't what you find in the statute books; it's what the courts say 'tis, an' the diff'rence sometimes is amazin'. I despise pretence, but I can't help reelizin' the value of it. More'n once it has made a pair of deuces better'n a pair of aces.

It's true that Heaven ain't reached at a single bound, but, on the contrary, if the bound's took in the right d'rection, you're a little nigher than you would have been with-out it.

Procrastination's the thief of time, but I shouldn't s'pose the kind o' time it gits from some people would be worth the effort of stealin' it.

Gener'ly a soft answer turneth away wrath, but I've known cases where it come nigher to exhibitin' a soft head.

None but the brave deserves the fair, an' there's cases where none but the brave could live with her if he got her.

Winter, lingering, chills the lap of May—back East; out here I've heard May contendin' that he sometimes makes her lap most too warm.

My idee is that the folks that yell fer a "safe an' sane Fourth" would do considerable less yellin' if they'd take some medicine warranted to perduce safe an' sane nerves.

Thoughtful Man Discusses the Joke

"It's an awfully good joke on Herrin, isn't it?" the Thoughtful Man remarked.

"What is?" I inquired.

"Why, you know—everybody knows; Curry's running for governor, and he's doing it with full speed on. He has his picture posted on Mt. Whitney, and the blue waters of Tahoe smile again to its endearing smile. As he himself admits, every man in the state has promised to vote for him; that is, every man except a few in the back counties, and his agents now are engaged in running them down. His campaign cry is, 'Let your officials continue to warm the official seats, for the dear boys are used to it.'"

"I don't see the joke on Herrin," said I.

"You don't? Why, 'God bless you, dear boys! Go in, and may the worst man win,' says he to Anderson and Stanton and Ellery and—what are you laughing at?"

"I thought that last was the joke," I responded.

"Well, it isn't. Mr. Herrin hadn't more than spoken the words before he went off into a—I don't know; some say it's a trance and some say it's a slumber, but, anyway, he doesn't know that Curry's running. It's a good one, isn't it? Imagine his feelings when he wakes."

"I should think some of his lieutenants would inform him," said I.

"Oh, that is the singular part of it; they are in a trance, too. Did you know that Herrin is bitterly opposed to Curry?"

"I did not," said I.

"Neither did I," said he. As he said this I fancied that he winked, but I am unable to imagine why.

Say!

Are you perfectly willing to pay the price of all the fun you have had?

Don't you sometimes wince a little, or a good

Have you noticed that not infrequently that pleasure which is the least genuine demands the biggest price?

Are you man enough to stand up and take

Or do you yell and whine that you will do

Are you so foolish that you suppose you can

Oh, we have done many things that were foolish or worse—both you and I—but let us thank heaven that there is in us the capacity to look the Almighty in the face and say: "I life.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Is Mr. Joseph Call The Herrin Indian?

Mr. Joseph Call spent last Saturday in Oakland and, while there, expressed to a close friend his expectation, or likelihood, of getting into the fight for the Democratic nomination for governor in opposition to Theodore Bell, and this friend of his stated that if Call went into the fight it would be with the expectation of having Southern Pacific support in the primary election and in the general election against Johnson if nominated, the expectation of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau being that Johnson will be nominated by the Republicans. Is Mr. Joseph Call the Herrin Indian? To assume that he is to assume that, having made a good anti-railroad reputation, he is now in a position to "cash it in," so to speak, a hard thing to contemplate, but not a new thing to California politics, and what else did James N. Gillett do? This may account in part for Herrin's seeming opposition to Curry who, other things being equal, should be more than satisfactory, but the south is being made to want the governor this time. With Stanton beaten at the primaries and Call nominated the south might be expected to knife Johnson in the interests of Call and so help to defeat Johnson in November. We are to look for long-headed generalship from the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company and, remember, too, that every corporation attorney in the country got his corporation job through successfully prosecuting the corporation that by and by employed him. Keep a weather eye on Joe Call!

Second Notice To Alamedans

Under the old politics it was considered worldly wise to balance a ticket of good men by putting a few renegades on it to keep them and their followers from getting off the reservation. Under the politics of the direct primary the diplomacy of such a device is to be questioned even if its morality is not to be condemned. Two years ago Alameda county was the banner reform county of the state, and nothing hurt reform more than the few, very few, compromises that were made in the interests of some particularly good men. This time everybody is going to vote at the primary and with a full vote at the primary the better the ticket the better its chances of success, while the ticket that is tarred at top or bottom is likely to get smudged from top to bottom before the voting is done. Rumors of compromises that come to our ears are disquieting. Now is the nick of time to strike for a full ticket of clean, strong men, better when the primary law is new than after it becomes an old story and men have grown indifferent to it.

On the Surface "It Is Anderson"

Within the past week the word has been passed out from Market and Powell streets rather freely that "It is Anderson," but only the unwary and unremembering (including Mr. Anderson himself) will allow themselves to be deceived thereby. It was Crocker up until a short time before the city election in San Francisco last fall, and yet deep down it was known all the time to be McCarthy. Mr. Herrin is no slouch as a political chess player and there are times when he would as soon sacrifice a knight or a castle as a pawn to save his king. There is only one, or possibly two, reasons why Mr. Curry should not be acceptable to Mr. Herrin and one reason is that Curry is as good a manipulator of the saloon and tenderloin vote as Herrin is and, if elected governor, he might feel his oats and prefer to run the state with his own machine rather than permit Mr. Herrin to dominate him. Very likely, therefore, Mr. Herrin's first choice might have been Anderson and his second Stanton, but he will take Curry in preference to Johnson so quick as to make Curry's head swim. The fight being between Johnson and Curry it is not going to be Anderson at the end, no matter what word is passed out at this stage of the contest. The truth will not be passed out longer than forty-eight hours before the polls open on August 16th. The logic of the situation speaks louder than many words. The second possible reason will be found explained in another paragraph.

L.-R. Executive Committee Endorses More Candidates

The state executive committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League last Saturday formally endorsed the candidacy of John M. Eshleman for railroad commissioner for the third district, of B. Grant Taylor for clerk of the supreme court, and of Allison Ware for superintendent of public instruction. A legislative committee was also appointed, to direct the work of bringing out and supporting good candidates for the next legislature. This committee will be a clearing-house of information about candidates, and will keep in close touch with every district in the state. Friends of good government will do well to assist in supplying information for the use of this committee by writing to the secretary, Charles R. Detrick, at 625 Market street, San Francisco, telling who the men are that are good legislative timber in their neighborhood.

More About Allison Ware

Readers of this page are familiar with the record of John M. Eshleman, now district-attorney of Imperial county, and Lincoln-Roosevelt candidate for railroad commissioner. Also with the record of B. Grant Taylor. But the following additional facts about Allison Ware are of timely interest: He was born in Santa Rosa, where he was reared and educated. After graduating from the public schools of Santa Rosa he entered the University of California, from which he graduated in 1903. He then taught in the public schools successively at Hanford and Lemoore, in Kings county. Since 1905, Mr. Ware has been a member of the faculty of the State Normal School in San Francisco. Here his ideals of education have developed, his advocacy of a closer relation between the schools and the life outside becoming a profound conviction. As chairman of the educational committee of the Commonwealth Club and as a popular speaker at most of the teachers' institutes, his ability has become widely recognized and his influence widely diffused. He is, besides, one of the most eloquent orators in California, in every way a strong man.

Legislative Candidates Must Face the Issues

The first act of the legislative committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, after its appointment last Saturday, was to issue a statement to the public through the press of the state, in which it announced that this committee would co-operate with the constituents of each assembly and senatorial district in requiring Republican candidates for legislative honors to take a stand either for or against the vital issues of the campaign as announced in the League's platform of principles. This is the right thing to do. It is just as important that California shall have the right sort of legislature next year as that California shall have Hiram Johnson for its governor, and it should be understood right now that this is not a campaign when either straddlers or reactionaries will find a welcome in Republican districts. It is also well that candidates should know that there is a committee whose sole business is to scrutinize their records and force them to take a stand on the issues. Those issues are, substantially, shall California be bond or free and shall California be represented in the United States senate by an insurgent like Judge Works or by a stand-patter like Gillett or Flint. The committee does not propose to interfere with local issues in any sense and it will co-operate heartily with local men in the election of the right sort of candidates.

Deceiving the Country Press

The Fresno Republican has warned the country papers of the state against a line of innocuous looking political stuff that was going out to them in the "boiler-plate" or "patent inside feature" material supplied by the American Type Founders company. This apparently harmless material proved to contain adverse criticism of Hiram Johnson and boosts for Curry in the same article, and a good many papers printed it before the trick was discovered. The manager of the American Type Founders company promptly disclaimed it, and, to quote his own language, announced that "somebody slipped one over on" him, and that he would edit his output more carefully in the future. This incident is only one of a series of like efforts to "slip one over" on the press of the state. A good deal of propaganda favoring Alden Anderson, is being mailed anonymously to editors. The only fair and honest way to bid for publicity is that adopted by the Lincoln-Roosevelt League, which plainly prints on its editors' sheets the League's name and address and a statement of the contents of the sheets.

Johnson Meetings For Next Week

Robert Duke, formerly deputy district attorney under William H. Langdon, is out in the field as an organizer for the Lincoln-Roosevelt League. He finds the field as ripe for Hiram Johnson as Max Kuhl has found it. He announces that arrangements have been completed for Johnson meetings next week, as follows: Woodland, Monday, the 25th; Colusa, Tuesday, the 26th; and Wilcox, Wednesday the 27th.

"Fighting Joyfully"

Under this title, Collier's Weekly, of April 16th, prints the following "first impression" of its editor upon meeting Francis J. Heney in New York. This Heney is the Heney his friends in California know and love, the Heney those friends have been amazed to hear described in San Francisco by harsh and unendearing names. The wonder is that no one before Norman Hapgood thought to give the people this authentic, life-like and pleasant picture of the man: "Few implacable reformers have come across our horizon in a more care-free guise than Francis Heney. He is ruddy with health, a smile is often on his lips. He has a clear, merry eye, good teeth, cheeks full of a color which a man twenty years younger would be fortunate in possessing. He is a man who abounds in the vitality which springs from good blood and untroubled nerves. A sturdy figure of a man he is, middle height, compact, and even powerful build, with the chest of a hammer thrower. A big upper lip, divided by a line of indentation, gives an effect of honesty and good nature. The muscles of his face are set for smiling—his voice is kindly, with no harshness lurking in its range. The bitter fighting he has done has come from unstrained strength, and has not poisoned his disposition, which would like to find men honest and companionable, and would be most at home with a crowd of outdoor men, lumbermen, sailors. He is at the summit of his life—every faculty and organ in easy play. He is as one free from care and hurry, with no restlessness and no ennui. He takes the surfaces of life in an offhand 'joshing' style. 'Healy? did you say?' asks the telephone girl. 'Not quite as bad as that,' he says, 'Heney will do for me.' With four telephone numbers to call up, and a couple of visitors, on business bent, to dispose of, he roams around the room as if the afternoon were an unencumbered thing, but he actually drives through the half-dozen items swiftly, and then rubs his hands, like one ready for more work."

White Against Frankel In the Thirty-ninth

Some time since the Independent Republican Club, in the Thirty-ninth assembly district, endorsed the candidacy of J. E. White for the Republican nomination for the assembly. Mr. White is a progressive Republican who stands for Right Things and who stands hard. If he secures the nomination and is elected he will make a valuable legislator and be an honor to his district.

Pitted against him is one Julius Frankel, "organization" through and through, a man who has been known to express the opinion that racetrack gambling should not be the subject of legislation; that such evils should be left to adjust themselves without interference. He will have the influence of the railroad push and the saloon, the twain being one flesh. Consequently, the result of this contest at the primary will be the taking of the moral measure of the Thirty-ninth assembly district. The contest will be watched with much interest. Mr. White has enough signatures to his nomination papers already, but he will not file them for some days for the reason that he desires a better distribution of signatures than yet obtained. J. E. White is the right man for that place.

mowers, pitchforks and whatever else comes handy with which to fight State Treasurer Williams. He has had the effrontery to insist that they work on the capitol grounds, full time, six days in the week, instead of being out rounding up the "push" where the sons of rest plainly hear the voice of duty calling. The ruction has reached such a pitch that these gardeners, who know two tricks in politics to one in catching gophers, are actually trying to dig up a candidate for State Treasurer to run against W. R. Williams before the primaries. They approached former Treasurer Truman Reeves but without success. Then they tried former chief clerk under Reeves, F. W. Judson, but he did not rise to the bait. Now they are looking for another. But let not their hearts be sad. Their good friend Herrin will pick them the late elections in the county indicate that the sentiment in favor of reform is even stronger in the smaller cities, if that could be possible, than in Los Angeles itself. For example, in Alhambra, between Los Angeles and Pasadena, the entire good government ticket was elected, the smallest majority being one hundred and twenty. In Redondo the victory of the progressive element was equally inspiring. In both these towns—and the same thing may be said of every other town in the county—determined efforts to maintain their hold upon the administration of public affairs were put forth by the machine leaders.

W. D. Stephens to Beat McLachlan

The candidacy of William D. Stephens of Los Angeles for nomination to congress to succeed Representative James McLachlan from the seventh district is meeting with a most gratifying reception. The only open opposition to him thus far comes from the editorial office of the Los Angeles Times. Stephens is an "insurrecto" of the La Follette stripe, moans Otis. He won't do—in Otis's eyes. But in the eyes of the masses of decent, progressive, honest Republicans in Los Angeles he will do. Mr. Stephens was formerly president of the Los Angeles chamber of commerce. When Harper resigned during the recall campaign a year ago, Mr. Stephens was appointed mayor and served until Alexander's election. He is a man of unimpeachable integrity. In business circles he is regarded as one of the most substantial men in the city. And he is popular, too. He has gone squarely on record in favor of those policies advocated by the great army of the followers of Theodore Roosevelt, and it is on this platform that he will be nominated and elected.

Progressive Legislators Coming From the South

Southern California has abated none of its strenuous efforts to send to the next legislature a group of men who will work in harmony with progressive Republican policies. In the late session the southern delegation in the lower house was almost solidly "push." Assemblymen Cogswell and Cattell were two bright exceptions to the rule from Los Angeles county. Hinkle of San Diego also made an excellent record. But with these exceptions the South was railroad to the core. It is doubtful, however, if any of those who so faithfully served the railroad at the recent session will be permitted to return. Those who are candidates for re-election will find very strong opposition from the mass of voters. Transue, who was Stanton's right-hand man on the floor of the assembly, and who could always be depended upon to steer the important railroad measures toward passage and to block reform measures, will probably be opposed by E. J. Fleming. Mr. Fleming is a young Los Angeles attorney with a brilliant future. As city prosecuting attorney he made a splendid record, and the voters like him. Percy V. Hammon, who holds a political job in the office of the district attorney between sessions of the legislature, also is a candidate for re-election. But the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League will have a strong man to contest the ground with him.

Lyman W. Farwell Against Stanton

In Lyman W. Farwell, who has been persuaded to make the run for the nomination in Stanton's district—the seventy-first—the League has found a man who will put up the strongest kind of a fight. Mr. Farwell is a member of the distinguished Chicago family of that name and ranks as one of the most substantial and popular citizens of Los Angeles. Under ordinary circumstances he would be regarded as too big a man to put up for the assembly, but the conditions this year are not ordinary. The League realizes that it must find the very highest type of men for the various offices, and it is men of the character and standing of Lyman Farwell that it is endeavoring to persuade to get into the fight for the political freedom of California. Mr. Farwell is the same stamp of man as is found represented in William Kent, John D. Works and A. J. Wallace. In agreeing to become a

That Unfeeling Billy Williams

The capitol grounds in Sacramento are in the keeping of the State Capitol commission, and this commission is made up of the Governor, Secretary of State, State Treasurer, and the governor's political secretary, one Mitchell, thus giving practical politics the best three in four of that commission. A result of this has been that the grounds have been kept by a bunch of men who are petty politicians first and gardeners afterward, if they have time after doing their part to see to it that Sacramento walks politically after the dictates of the conscience of the railroad "organization." Well, there is trouble in the garden and the gardeners are out with pruning hooks, lawn out a candidate in good season, one that will not permit such frivolities as the proper care of the capitol grounds to interfere with the more serious business of doing small politics.

Good Government Is Victorious in South

The Good Government forces down in Los Angeles are jubilant over the results of the elections recently held in several of the smaller cities in Los Angeles county. There has been considerable speculation as to whether the voters in the town outside of the chief city would follow the splendid example set for them when, last December, the entire Good Government ticket in that city was elected by decisive majorities. ALEXANDER GORDON

Alexander Gordon, candidate for railroad commissioner, was born in Hants county, Nova Scotia, October 16th, 1846, of Scotch-Irish parentage. He received a common school education and followed the pursuit of farming until 1869, when the lure of the West drew him from the old home and he came to California by way of the newly completed Central Pacific railroad.

First locating in San Joaquin county, he engaged in the sheep business with W. C. Miller, of Stockton. There he remained until 1875, when he moved to Fresno county, taking his stock with him. Continuing in this business until 1887, he sold out to his partner and, settling near the town of Fresno, embarked in the raisin growing industry quite extensively and acquired considerable land.

Mr. Gordon was of that second generation of pioneers whose larger vision, looking beyond the exploitation of the state for its mere mineral treasures, beheld the possibilities of the soil when the hitherto wasted water wealth of the Sierras should be applied. Entering actively into this phase of the development of the San Joaquin valley he helped institute irrigation canal systems and promoted colony settlements.

In 1890 he became interested in the Farmers' Bank (now Farmers' National Bank) of Fresno as stockholder and director. He was one of the organizers and subsequently president of the Mutual Building and Loan Association of Fresno, holding these several positions until the fall of 1901, when he went to Sacramento to accept the position of vice-president and director of the Sacramento Bank. During his incumbency the bank became the largest, and one of the strongest, savings institutions in Northern California, having at the present time assets largely in excess of six million dollars. The bank's liberal policy has been instrumental in the phenomenal development of the great interior valleys of the state. Under Governor Pardee's administration Mr. Gordon was appointed a member of the auditing board to the Commissioner of Public Works. He was selected as chairman, and in this capacity helped to construct many improvements in the Sacramento river. This position he held until the office of Commissioner of Public Works was abolished and the new law enacted creating the State Engineering Department, which has charge of all public works, including the rectification of our rivers. Under that law he was appointed a member of the consulting board by Governor Gillett and served in the capacity of chairman of the new board. His good work for the betterment of river conditions still continues on the new board. His services on both boards were rendered without compensation.

His natural sympathies have always been with the Republican party and he has affiliated with that party at all times.

candidate for nomination as member of assembly he is preparing for a personal sacrifice, but his heart is in the work of reform well under way in this state and he will give the machine forces in Stanton's district the fight of their lives. Cogswell and Cattell will go back. A determined effort will be made to keep Barn-dollar of the sixty-ninth at home. Riverside county sends greetings with a declaration of its ability to shelve E. B. Collier, who misrepresented his district last year. Hinkle undoubtedly will be returned from the seventy-ninth (San Diego) district. Melrose of Orange county has announced that he will not seek renomination, and the progressive Republicans of that district are backing Col. O. H. Coulter. Clyde Bishop, who succeeded in making himself more or less of a joke in the session three years ago, probably will have the machine support in this district.

Mrs. Charles G. Ames was elected president of the School Voters' League which has just been organized in Boston.

San Francisco.

Gentlemen:—I welcome the need to send you a check for I have wanted to tell you how thoroughly satisfactory your paper is to me. I like the fair and frank and factual way of reporting on political affairs and municipal conditions. Your exactness and sobriety are an admirable blend. I travel over the state constantly and find frequent opportunity to tell the Weekly's merits, and to send on numbers as samples.

I should like to know that the Weekly is a paying enterprise. It ought to be, and I should respect our state if it so much endorsed the publication. I want to say that not the least pleasure in the Weekly is your underlying assumption that the prime value is Manhood, that ultimate worth tests are moral and spiritual.

Yours truly,

MILES B. FISHER.
Berkeley, Cal., April 19, 1910.

We appreciate the foregoing commendation because it is discriminating. The writer of it likes The California Weekly and knows why, and it is the kind of missionary work that he is doing for the paper that will by and by make it widely known and generally wanted as "San Francisco's Honest Newspaper," as it is coming to be spoken of. The paper needs to be talked about by friend to friend. What reputation, worth the having, is made in any other way?

The California Weekly,
San Francisco.

Gentlemen:—I enclose a money order for $2.00 for my subscription which, as you wrote, was overlooked. I should be very sorry to miss The California Weekly from its standpoint of interest and keen thought alone, and I wish to do my share in helping in the noble and fundamentally necessary work you are doing. I am,

Yours truly,

OSMER ABBOTT.
Oleander, Cal.

If all who feel that way will put their feeling into action, and do their full share toward making The California Weekly a success it will be a success and a power for good in this state. Good will become a real asset when expressible in cash. Until then it seems to be sort of ineffectual.

The California Weekly,

Dear Sirs:—Enclosed please find $3.00 for one and one-half year's subscription. Your paper is O. K. and I am pleased to have the opportunity to subscribe for such a paper. It has the true ring.

Very truly yours,

C. L. PARDEE.
Sacramento, April 16, 1910.

The "true ring" is the ring that rings true, that is, sincere, straight from the heart, the shoulder, the conscience. Sincerity is an attribute of courage. Cowardice resorts to deceit as its most efficient weapon, and that periodical that is less than frank is cowardly and it is its cowardice that makes it less than frank. If the journalism of to-day has few to commend it and many to condemn, it is more because of its moral cowardice than because of its yellow sensationalism or blundering inaccuracy.

Mr. Ingersoll is the manufacturer of the Ingersoll Dollar Watch, is a progressive reformer with high ideals, thoroughly interested in the determined movement throughout the United States to stamp out graft and corruption in politics and business. He was in the city a few days ago and handed me the money for a year's subscription to The California Weekly, copies of which had fallen into his hands during his visit.

Yours truly,

ROLLA V. WATT.

Here and there a rich man subscribes for, approves and enjoys The California Weekly, but, commonly, it is as difficult to get the paper into such hands as it is for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven. Both of these things can be done, and are being done, but if the rich man only knew it The California Weekly is his best friend. It is striving to secure conditions that will enable his children to enjoy their inheritance without risk of spoliation by the mob spirit or facing a bitter class enmity at every turn in the road. These things are only to be obtained by establishing justice so equally that no Calhoun will be able to buy immunity from punishment and no corporation will be able to shirk its share of taxation, secure special privileges without paying the public what they are worth, or subvert free government in any state.

THE CITIZENS' ALLIANCE VIEW

OF LABOR UNIONISM, STRIKES, AND BOYCOTTS

By BUSH FINNELL, General Council of the Citizens' Alliance in San Francisco

A great deal is being written and said by editors, ministers, economists, and the general public about industrial conditions and especially regarding organized labor.

Much that is said on one side is actuated by large sympathy for the hardships endured by the laboring classes; the unquestioned injustice that is too often done when large corporations or other employers take advantage of an opportunity to grind the faces of the poor to their own pecuniary profit.

On the other side, it frequently occurs that employers, exasperated by arbitrary exactions, arrogant conduct on the part of walking delegates clothed with authority unwisely delegated to them, lose their sense of proportion and say and do things which are quite as unreasonable, unwise and wrong as anything justly charged against organized labor.

Professional men, teachers, clergymen and a large part of the general public, with no personal knowledge or experience of industrial conditions, but accepting the assertions of whichever side they espouse at their face value, discuss the question purely from a theoretical standpoint with the natural result—a confusion of ideas, a clouding of the issue and many erroneous conclusions.

Limits of Unions' Usefulness

If labor unions would confine their acts, objects and purposes to the betterment of their material welfare, attend to the proper regulation of their internal affairs and not meddle in the affairs or attempt to restrict the liberty of others there would be less controversy over the well-worn expression "Capital and Labor." Organization is a splendid thing for the man who toils, and it should be fostered and encouraged to a degree that all those who desire may become a part of a combination having in view the improving of their condition without violating either the law or the rights of fellow workers who do not happen to agree with their ideas. It is but fair to assume that the primary object of many labor unions and the ultimate result of their efforts to better their condition has been carried on without any thought of or desire to injure those outside the unions, but labor unions, as a whole, have been led astray by paid agents who become agitators for personal gain, which is always at the expense of the rank and file of organized labor. Collective bargaining may be good, but collective striking can only be destructive of the rights not only of organized but of unorganized labor. Strikes among workmen are not necessarily unlawful though they may become both illegal and criminal by the means employed to enforce their objects. Employees may lawfully quit their service either singly or in a body, but if unlawful means are used to uphold or maintain a strike, or if the end to be attained is unlawful, then the strike itself is unlawful.

Violence Illegal

The moment that violence becomes an essential part of a scheme, or a necessary means of effecting the purposes of a combination, that moment the combination, otherwise lawful, becomes illegal. All combinations to interfere with perfect freedom in the proper management and control of one's lawful business, to dictate the terms upon which such business shall be conducted, by means of threats or by interference with property or traffic, or with the lawful employment of others, are within the condemnation of the law. It has been well said that "The wit of man could not devise a lawful strike because compulsion is the leading idea of it." A strike is essentially a conspiracy to extort by violence; the means employed to effect the end being not only the cessation of labor by the conspirators, but the necessary prevention of labor by those who are willing to assume their places, and, as a last resort, and in many instances an essential element of success, the disabling and destruction of the property of the master, and so, by intimidation and by the compulsion of force, to accomplish the end desired. I think no strike was ever heard of that was or could be successful unaccompanied by intimidation and violence.

It must be apparent to even the most superficial observer that in the operation of any business, not only are capital and buildings and laborers necessary, but that also liberty of direction and control are of vital necessity. Without it success is impossible; disaster is inevitable with all its mournful consequences. Liberty of direction and control are the very breath of life in any business. In them are wrapped up inseparably the interests of the employer and the employees, of all those who have dealings with them, and of the public generally.

Any combination which seeks to deprive a great and necessary department of human activity of that which is so absolutely essential to it is manifestly and emphatically against public policy and is illegal in its purpose. To sustain it would be to approve of what strikes directly at the public welfare. Such a policy is against public morals. It is highly contrary to public welfare. It is an obstruction of the liberty of the citizen and is contrary to public policy to the extent that the combination to attain it is unlawful.

Labor Deceived by Agitators

As a general thing, strikes are caused by the body of a labor organization being led by paid agitators who convince the men whom they represent that they are down-trodden and that employers are endeavoring to be oppressive and to deprive them of their rights. I do not think it can be said, in the light of present events, that employers aim to be oppressive to employees, but it is a contest between them, each one doing what he can for his own benefit. It must be conceded by everybody that it is commendable in the laboring people to endeavor to better their condition morally, physically and financially, and to obtain the best price they can for their labor and upon the most convenient terms for themselves. That is conceded by everybody, but in doing that they too often, I think, forget one thing. They forget that they must attain their objects by legal and proper means. They must not undertake to accomplish what they desire to the injury or at the expense of other people, and there is where a mistake is too often made. It is conceded by all that they have the right to better their condition, but they must not do it in a way to be oppressive to others.

Non-Unionist Has Rights

A man who does not belong to a labor union has the same rights legally and morally, neither more nor less, as has the man who does belong to a labor union. His rights and his family are just as dear to him as are those of the union man. There are and can be no differences, and employers have precisely the same rights to employ non-union men as union men; and the absolute legal right to have their property and their employees protected when they do elect, for any reason, to employ non-union men; and when such right is violated, the employer has the right to seek and obtain redress from the law. All the courts of the civilized world so hold. These questions are not debatable.

This is a free country and every man has the right to work for whomsoever he pleases and such men are entitled to protection. The man who hires labor has the right to be protected in his property and in his right to employ whomsoever he pleases and have his employees work in peace and quiet and by orderly methods. There is no authority in the United States which has not declared this to be the law. No person, individual or any combination has the right to directly or indirectly interfere with or disturb one in his lawful business or occupation or to threaten to do so for the sake of compelling him to do some act which, in his judgment, his own interest does not require.

When members of a labor union go on a strike their demands must necessarily be enforced, first by a system known as "picketing" and, secondly, by "boycotting."

Picketing Unlawful

The boycott is that form of picketing wherein individuals acting as pickets are placed in front of or in the immediate vicinity of the place of business which has been declared to be under the ban of a labor organization and it is the means adopted by such organization to advertise to the patrons of the boycotted person, and to the public at large, that here a non-union man is attempting to exist and all those who do not desire to incur the displeasure of organized labor must keep their distance and withhold their patronage and trade. Some writers upon this question talk very glibly about a certain kind of picketing termed by them "peaceful picketing." There can be no such thing as peaceful picketing or picketing for mere observation and for persuasion any more than there can be chaste vulgarity, or peaceful mobbing, or lawful lynching. When men want to converse or persuade, they do not organize a picket line; when they want to see who are at work they go and see, then leave, and disturb no one physically or mentally. But a picket does not do this and the real purpose is as they know, and as everybody else knows, by a show of force to give the general public notice that the owner or the proprietor of a certain place of business being boycotted is under the ban of the union because they know that to a certain extent that is intimidation of the men and women who may want to go into or come out of that place. The true and real purpose of these people is by coercion to force that man to come into the union fold, and cease employment of non-union men and to employ union people and let them dictate to him the terms upon which he shall conduct his business. A non-union man would be devoid of good sense, knowing the history of labor organizations and the history of labor union strikes, who took the chance of entering such a place of business. A union man would not enter because he would immediately subject himself to a fine from his union, and, perhaps, expulsion.

Boycott Is Coercion

The law defines the word "boycott" as an organized attempt to coerce, or intimidate, one into compliance with a demand by combining to abstain and compelling others to abstain from any business or social relation with a particular person. Has there ever been a strike in the history of industrial disputes in California by any labor organization wherein the boycott has not been resorted to? I think this might be answered in the negative. And can it be possible that it is true that because one individual may refuse to deal with a certain tradesman for any reason that suits him, or for any reason at all, so-called organized labor or any other organization or combination can, for such reason as seems good, select a tradesman for attack, concentrate on him all its power to crush him, allow none of its members or friends to deal with him, cut him off from support in the community, isolate him, and make him a pariah, a leper or a "scab," until he is either ruined or bends the knee in penitence and signs such contract or agreement with regard to the conduct of his business as will insure his submissive conduct in the future?

The very statement of the question shows that should the law answer "Yes," the ruling power in this country would be transferred from the courts and magistrates to secret associations, acting through agents, walking delegates and pickets whom they can disown on occasion or recognize on occasion; and the despotism of medieval times would be repeated in the twentieth century in what is supposed to be a free country.

The social principle which justified the organization of labor unions is departed from when they are so extended in their operation as either to intend or to accomplish injury to others. Public policy and the interests of society favor the utmost freedom in the citizen to pursue his lawful trade or calling.

A PROVIDENT PARENT

The mother of two boys, who kept them at work while they were still at school, was more than repaid for her self-sacrifice.

When the older lad left high school, at fifteen, he owned a typewriter and knew how to do good work upon it. In their small town there was just one young lawyer struggling to build up a practice. This boy applied to him for a job, and the lawyer told him that he would hire him at sixty dollars a month, provided he spent two years in Chicago studying stenography and law, and getting some of the hayseed out of his hair. Furthermore, if he wanted to leave his wages in his employer's care until he was twenty-one, the accumulation would buy an interest in the office.

This proposition was submitted to the mother. She approved of it and promised to board the boy until he was twenty-one, letting him keep his earnings intact. While he was studying in Chicago she undertook to send him four dollars a week, on condition that he brought back to her the four hundred dollars when he returned. He agreed, and during the two years away from home boarded with a milkman, getting his room free for helping with deliveries in the morning. Every night he carried newspapers, earning enough to pay his board. At the end of two years he took home four hundred and fifty dollars. To-day he is a partner in a profitable law practice.

The younger boy left school about the time the other came home. He had a kit of cobbler's tools and knew how to do simple repair work. Getting a job in a shoestore, he served without wages the first six months, living at home. The mother agreed to board him until he could get into business for himself. Canvassing for cobbling jobs, he did the simple ones at home nights and took the harder ones to the store, where the work was done by a skillful shoemaker. At the end of six months, however, he had learned to do all this work himself, and when the shoemaker began paying him wages of five dollars a week he was earning as much more nights. In two years he saved seven hundred dollars, and that, with business acquaintance, enabled him to set up shop for himself. To-day his store clears a thousand dollars yearly, apart from living expenses.—Saturday Evening Post.

CONSERVING PUBLIC HEALTH

To see that the people who go to the mountains for their health do not get typhoid fever is the purpose of the State Board of Health in beginning a campaign of inspection and education before the resorts open for the coming season.

That insanitary health resorts remain undiscovered sources of typhoid infection, and that they also cause typhoid epidemics in widely scattered communities is the assertion of a member of the State Board of Health, who has been an active advocate of inspection and regulation. He maintains also that because many typhoid fever convalescents seek the mountains when recruiting their strength there is menace added to the situation.

About one typhoid convalescent in four becomes a "carrier," that is, continues to discharge the disease germs with the wastes of the body for several weeks or months or even years. The presence of one of these "carriers" at a resort where the toilet vault is accessible to flies, or drains underground into the water supply, is sufficient to cause the infection of many guests. The typhoid bacillus requires two weeks for incubation; consequently patrons remain unwittingly at dangerous health resorts, as in the majority of cases the guests who are infected complete their outings and return home before coming down with disease. There is always the possibility that patients thus scattering to different communities will become centers of other epidemics.

The necessity of this primary inspection is obvious. Typhoid is an insidious epidemic disease that is easily spread, and hard to trace to the point of origin. It is notorious that sanitary conveniences are lacking in the majority of summer resorts, and the plan of sending out inspectors before the season begins is one to be heartily commended. It is useless to wait until the development of typhoid results in tracing the disease back to its source at some summer resort for the damage has already been done. The time to make inspections and compel sanitary conditions is before the resorts open. The inspectors who are to be sent out by the State Board of Health will make known the state laws in regard to sanitation; ascertain the condition of toilets and water supplies; and also spread information on the prevention of typhoid fever. It is expected that when resort proprietors fully understand the situation they will take the measures necessary for the protection of their patrons. In case of any persistent unwillingness in this direction the board will be compelled, of course, to invoke the long, bony hand of the law.

This is perfectly proper. It is in line with the conservation of the public health and will, it is believed, result in better sanitary conditions in the resorts where people go in search of health and recreation. The evidences of diseases such as typhoid are hidden from public gaze, and this crusade of the Board of Health should be welcomed not only by the public, but by the resort keepers.—San Francisco Recorder.

ODDS AND ENDS

Hawaiian tomatoes and cucumbers have been barred from California on the claim that they contain a maggot, which, if it gained a foothold in the United States, would be a menace to several industries.

The navy department is to test a device, which, it is claimed, will stop a 10,000-ton battleship going at full speed, in its own length.

Fred C. Ripley, son of the president of the Santa Fe railroad, has bought, for $120,000, eighty acres of land in the oil belt near Bakersfield, Cal.

The Louisiana state game commission has asked for an appropriation to bring big game from Africa to stock the state forests.

A fund of $12,000, set aside by congress to be used for sprinkling the roads of the Yosemite valley will be available this season.

PART II. THE LEFT-HAND ROAD

When the children reached Annabel's home, three of them dripping and the others spoiling to tell of what had happened, there was much to be said. Gaspar slipped up the back stairs to his attic to effect a change of clothing and get out of sight as quickly as possible, while the others, all talking at once, did their best to apprise Uncle Abner and Aunt Isabel, as they were called, of what had happened. In his haste to make his escape Gaspar had left the stair door ajar so that he heard, in shame and bitterness, every word that was said.

"I had a big notion to chuck the little black beast under the ice and let him go down the rapids," boasted Our Hiram, "but concluded to duck him and spank him instead and let it go at that, but, pshaw! if he hadn't been a sissy he could have made the turn as well as not. I could make it with both hands tied behind me and my eyes shut," with which declaration he bounded off for home to get on some dry clothing and spread the news farther.

Uncle Abner had little to say at the time, but Aunt Isabel freed her mind fully, as was her wont. "For my part," she declared, as she was helping Annabel to get off her saturated garments, "I don't see what you wanted that little snip to take you down the hill for, anyhow. Couldn't Our Hiram have done it, or Joshua Whitson or some other of the neighbor boys? The little stupid! Our Hiram's name for him, the 'Little Black Beast,' just fits him, I declare."

"Well, he was in the grumps," Annabel replied, "and I just did it to get him out of 'em. I'm sure I would a good deal rather have had Our Hiram take me. He never makes a mess of anything, while the boys and girls are always laughing at Gaspar. He's such a blundering little runt."

Not one word that was said failed of reaching the burning ears of Gaspar and, as soon as he could get dry garments on and hang his wet ones out on the line, he made himself scarce until chore time.

There was a birch swamp down at the edge of the meadow, as lonely and still as the most melancholy soul could wish, and there Gaspar hid his miserable self for the rest of the afternoon. "Black beast!" he ejaculated. "That is so. Let him look out! Black beasts have claws and they can scratch," and his hands flew furiously as if to scratch the cuticle off Our Hiram's visage. "The big Yankee pig! He shall see. Black beasts do not forget."

Back and forth he walked in the snow until he had beaten a path a hundred yards long. "It is a truth what my stepfather said. God did not make me for any good thing. Why did he not make me like le grand Hiram, then I would show him. I would black his two eyes for that ducking, but he shall see. Wait! I shall not forget."

And so he had it out with himself, one moment wishing that he were dead, lying with his father and mother in the little consecrated cemetery at Stanstead, and the next he was plotting for revenge upon Our Hiram and the other children who had humiliated him so unnecessarily and ungenerously because of a mishap for which he was no more to be blamed than was Hiram or Annabel.

When he came to the house for the milk pail Uncle Abner met him at the door. "It was quite a caper you cut for us this afternoon." That was all that Uncle Abner said, but his manner and tone cut to the quick. Aunt Isabel's greeting was, "Well, you are a smart one, I must say!" but the boy took his pail and went to the barn in shame-faced silence.

That night Gaspar crawled off to bed supperless, too indignant and injured to meet the family at the table, and the family left him to himself without intrusion. For hours he tossed uneasily and the darkness took gruesome forms and hovered threateningly over him from among the bare rafters of his little attic. As Abner and Isabel passed to their room he overheard the latter say, "Well, I hope it will be a lesson to him." It was. When at last he fell asleep it was to go bounding down the hill and out upon the river, then to go sinking, sinking, into the chill water, Annabel's brown hair floating against his face and her mitted hands clinging wildly to him while her scream woke him to find himself all of a shiver and teeth chattering as a result of the nervous strain to which he had been subjected.

But the incident became an old story by and by, after the school children had indulged themselves in raillery to their hearts' content, and so the winter wore on into spring, when the beginning of farm work gave one and all something else to think of. Into this Gaspar threw himself, if not with a buoyant enthusiasm, at least with a dogged fidelity that made him almost indispensable to Abner and Isabel. Upon occasion he was light hearted and joyous and, at such times, he and Annabel were much together and sincerely companionable; but any little slight, any reference to his size, his complexion, his religion, anything like being taken to task for some neglect, sufficed to throw him into the dumps again and make him shun human intercourse for days at a time. At such times he loved only the live things on the farm, the horse, the oxen, cows and young calves, pigs and poultry. These he seldom if ever neglected and they, at least, seemed to respond with something of that warmth of affection which his soul craved.

Abner Hardy's supreme love was for justice, in the sense of abstinence from inflicting wrong. No matter how well one served he was still an unprofitable servant and, if he so held regarding others, he made no exception in his own case but pleaded night and morning lest an avenging wrath fall upon him from on high. His boyhood was long since forgotten. Indeed, he could scarcely remember when he had not taken up the struggle to get on in the world. He had become an adult before he had gotten his growth and was now. Old Uncle Abner when he should have been in his prime.

As for Isabel, she was just, too, exactly so. Severely critical of others and with an inclination to express her mind freely, she appeared to be more unsympathetic than she really was. If she hauled Gaspar over the coals for any trifling delinquency, at least she did her duty for him as she saw it and was not grudging in serving. She kept Gaspar's clothes clean and in repair, kept his room neat and saw to it that he had enough to eat. What more?

So spring and summer passed blithely by. Gaspar doing, if not the work of a man, at least the work that a man would have had to do but for him, and he made it the easiest summer on Abner that Abner could remember. Sometimes Gaspar came to Abner to borrow his pocket knife, always returning it none the worse for the use, but it never occurred to Abner that the boy needed a knife of his own. By and by, after much whittling, Gaspar erected a tiny windmill on one corner of the shed with a rod that ran down through and operated the dash of a tiny churn. Annabel was in ecstasies over it and Isabel went so far as to say that it was "real cunnin'," but Abner merely glanced at it and then expressed the opinion that hoeing potatoes would have yielded a greater profit.

Abner had a chest of tools, part of which had been inherited from his father, and Gaspar desperately desired to know what was in it but seldom got more than a glance into its depths, for Abner looked upon these tools as precious and not to be trifled with. However, with Abner's big knife, pieces of window glass he had picked up, a broken pointed gimlet he had contrived to redeem with a file, the buck saw and a hammer, he had gotten out and pegged together a chest for his clothing and another more elaborately finished for Annabel which Isabel pronounced "real handy."

A little brooklet came out of the big meadow and, running by the house, dashed on into the river. At odd moments Gaspar built a stone dam across this, turned the water into a trench and set it to turning a miniature overshot water wheel. He had gotten the idea from a wood-cut in the school reader. It was only a toy, but it whirled with the rapidity of a windmill and, as Gaspar sat on the bank watching it, he thought of the power that was going to waste down at the river and if he might some day put it to use; but when Abner came along and, looking it over with a mild curiosity, said, "trifling again, are you?" and passed on, out went the vision of a mill on the river which should enrich Uncle Abner as well as the boy himself. Isabel thought it "real cute and a down-right pity it couldn't be made to do something useful." Annabel watched it by the hour and took no little pride in it, but Our Hiram dismissed it with a "Humph! You can't do nothin' with it, so what's the use?" Nobody saw in it either an aptitude or a prophecy and so the aptitude yielded no prophecy.

Toward fall that year Uncle Abner sold his surplus hogs and fat wethers and put the money in the left-hand drawer under the bookcase, locked it and hung the key on a nail driven into the edge of the window casing quite out of sight by reason of the curtains. Gaspar saw him do it. Gaspar wanted a knife. Twenty times a day he felt the need for it and had he not fed those hogs ever since they were little pigs? Had he not helped to shear and to wash the wethers and had he not a right to so much of that money as would buy him a knife? He had worked hard all summer and no one had suggested that he had any needs not already supplied. The idea stuck to him. He thought it likely that such a little out of the whole would not be missed. Opportunities were not lacking. He watched his chance, extracted two shillings from the leathern purse, slipped away as he had opportunity and bought a Barlow at the village store.

For weeks he carried this knife without any one knowing of its existence, but all the time it weighed on his mind if not on his conscience. Once in a while he borrowed Uncle Abner's knife as formerly, just to keep up appearances, and so time went on until, one day, Annabel came upon him unawares and saw the knife in his hands. She wanted to see it. Gaspar closed it, thrust it in his pocket and Annabel carried the information to Isabel, Isabel conveyed it to Abner, Abner cautioned her to say nothing but watch and wait for developments. Could the boy have stolen it at the village? Taxpaying time came and Abner went to his hoard for his tax money and carefully counted it out on the dining room table. It was two shillings short. If Gaspar conceived that Abner would not miss so little as that it was because he did not know Abner Hardy. Isabel was appealed to. No, she had not touched it.

All this while Gaspar was sitting uneasily in his chair, his dark face flushed as much as it would. His discomfort was not lost on Isabel, who finally said, without looking up from her sewing, perhaps Gaspar may know something about it. Gaspar denied all knowledge of it. With a more serious and stern look in his face than Gaspar had ever seen before Abner turned to him and demanded to know where he got that knife. Gaspar denied having any. Annabel lifted up her voice and declared that he had. Abner commanded him to turn his pockets inside out. He did so, all but one. Isabel knew of that pocket, reached over and drew from it the precious, two-shilling Barlow.

Gaspar broke into tears and made a full confession, through his sobs he tried to say that he had worked hard all summer, that the knife was all he wanted for it, and that he was tired of having to borrow Abner's all the time. When Abner demanded to know why Gaspar had not come to him for the money, and why he told falsehoods about it, the boy only cried the harder and said he did not know. Abner sent him to bed in disgrace, and he spent half the night crying his heart out, wishing that he were dead and repeating over and over again that his stepfather had been right in affirming that God had not made him to come to any good thing.

As for Annabel, she could scarcely contain herself until morning, that she might tell Our Hiram that Gaspar was a thief and had stolen money from her father and, when Our Hiram knew of it, he must needs be the first one at school Monday morning in order that he might tell the news to each child who arrived. Now the fact that Isabel had never been able to keep the tarts and cookies entirely out of Annabel's surreptitious reach, and that Our Hiram had samples of all the apples that grew in the neighborhood stowed away in his loft, did not embarrass them any more than the fact that some children rifled other children's dinner baskets estopped them from greeting Gaspar as a thief when he arrived at school. He had stolen money, and money was sacred. There was nothing save the deity, and the Son of Mary, that was held in such estimation in that community as money.

It was little enough of it that people saw in those days. Its principal use was for the payment of taxes, or to lend to others at usurious rates that they might pay their taxes. Commerce was carried on mainly in kind, but as for money, nearly all could say with truth, "Silver and gold have I none," and what they had people kept a just and true account and memory of, so that, had three pence been missing, the whole house would have been swept, and every piece of furniture overturned and rug shaken, but it would have been found. The stealing of money ranked, in the East, with the stealing of horses in the West, an unforgivable offense.

But Abner was just. He never referred to the incident again, nor did Isabel farther than to tell Gaspar that she hoped that it would be a lesson to him, but the knife was sequestered, as was fully explained by Abner, that the lad might not enjoy the fruits of his transgression, yet it was no great length of time before it was returned to him again, with the declaration that if only he had asked for it Abner would have been glad to get him a knife or anything else that he could afford.

And so the winter wore away. If anything was missed at school the assumption was that Gaspar was the guilty party, and these criminalities burned into the boy's soul and filled him with hatred for his school fellows, and especially for Our Hiram, who, good natured and generous, treasuring malice for not so much as an hour, was nevertheless a persistent hector and never happier than when he was making fun at the expense of another. Along toward spring, when school for the winter was nearly closed, he made fun of Gaspar once too often.

It was ever so trivial, the way it started. Some one on the school ground called, "Gaspar! Gaspar Gautier!" Gaspar replied with a "What do you want?" Our Hiram spoke up in an accustomed spirit of raillery, "What did you answer for? That is not your name. You are the Little Black Beast."

"It is my name," was the reply, "as it was my father's."

"It is not. You are the Little Black Beast. I tell you. I know all about that ring with the name on the inside. You probably stole it somewhere and took the name as well as the ring. Let me see it. I'll bet I know who it belongs to."

"You shall not," was the reply.

"I shall," Our Hiram replied, advancing upon the smaller boy wholly in a spirit of banter.

Now the ring was too large for any of Gaspar's fingers and he wore it about his neck, next to his skin, fastened to a stout leather thong. As Hiram reached for it Gaspar began to kick out violently and the larger lad to put forth more strength. Gaspar lost his self control and began to strike and scratch in earnest. "Very well then, you young wildcat," declared Our Hiram, "if that's the way you are going to do I'll just take that precious ring from you and throw it into the middle of the river." With that Gaspar fought like a cornered panther and the larger boy quite lost his temper, too. He threw Gaspar to the ground and sought first to untie and then to tear the ring from Gaspar's neck.

How he did it no one saw, but, somehow during the tussle, Gaspar got his knife out of his pocket, opened it over Our Hiram's back and then plunged it again and again into Our Hiram's back, arm and shoulder. A great cry was raised. Our Hiram staggered to his feet, the blood issuing from his wounds just as the master reached the scene of difficulty. All were badly frightened. "You young murderer!" exclaimed the schoolmaster, turning to Gaspar, "we'll turn you over to the constable and if the boy dies you will hang for it." With this the master turned his attention to Our Hiram, who had nearly fainted at the sight of the blood, sent one boy on horseback for the doctor and helped to support Our Hiram to the nearest house.

Gaspar stood with staring eyes for an instant, dumbfounded, and then, turning upon his heel, picked up his cap and bolted for the brush. The boy ran as runs the fox with the hounds baying upon his track, as runs the rabbit with the farmer's dog at his heels, as runs the horse with the fragments of a harness striking his hocks at every leap. He was panic stricken. The streaming blood, the deathly pallor of Our Hiram, the threatening words of the schoolmaster, the sickening dread of having done murder, the horror in the face of Annabel as she came and saw what he had done, well, he obeyed the instincts of preadamite man and sought safety in flight and hiding.

He ran as long as he had breath and strength, dragged himself into the bushes and lay panting upon the ground until he could stagger on, when on he went, following the course of the river until nightfall, when he sank at the foot of a tree on the river's bank to regain strength to go on. While there he saw a man come down to the river's bank from the other side, draw a light skiff from under an overhanging willow, get into it and row across to the side where Gaspar was, fasten the boat to a projecting bough, secrete the oars and take his way along a well-beaten path leading back from the river. Gaspar waited barely long enough to make sure that the man was out of sight and hearing, when he picked up the oars, got into the boat, untied it and rowed swiftly down the stream. All night he rowed or floated down the swift current, for the river was swollen. The rain drenched him and the night was black, but he kept the channel and went on and on, possessed only of the thought of putting miles betwixt himself and the avenging hand of the law.

With the breaking of day he tied the boat to the shore and took to the woods again, avoiding highways and struggling on. When he saw a village he went around it, and so passed the day and the next, footsore, starving, chilled. While resting on the brow of a hill overlooking a farmhouse, but under cover, he saw the family drive away. Hunger impelled him to do it, and he made his way to the rear of the house, hoisted a kitchen window and entered. He went straight to the pantry, devoured what he could lay his hands on and, from a closet, extracted an old overcoat and stepped out of the kitchen door only to step into the arms of a neighboring farmer who had seen him effect an entrance through the window. It would have been petty larceny at the worst had it not been burglary. He was handed over to the officers, pleaded guilty, refused to tell who he was or whence he came, and was sent to prison for two years, the court being lenient because of his youth.

Meantime, at home, there was, first a neighborhood sensation, a condemnation of the would-be murderer, and some effort at pursuit; but as Our Hiram was really not much hurt, and readily confessed that the fault was his, though he was only in fun at the beginning, no serious effort was made to locate the culprit. After the incident had been talked over and over things went on in the little neighborhood about as they had gone before, except as to Abner.

Perhaps it was primarily because the chores fell upon him now instead of upon Gaspar; perhaps it was the morning sermon on the Sunday following in which the good minister, preaching from the parable of the prodigal son, so far digressed from the beaten path as to express a few words of sympathy for the elder son whose father, despite the son's years of loyal service, had never given him so much as a kid that he might make merry with his friends. Whatever the motive that prompted it, Abner was uneasy about Gaspar. Night and morning, at family worship, he besought His Father to deal gently with the lad, and to have mercy upon those who condemned him unheard or had led his feet astray. He talked earnestly with Deacon Mitchell and so far softened the latter's heart toward the offender as to make him agree that there should be no prosecution of the lad if found, and then Abner started forth to find him.

He might as well have looked for a needle in a haystack. The lad was in another state now, in prison under another name. If his capture and commitment got into the papers Abner did not hear of it, and, in those days, Massachusetts was so far away from Pisgah that many lived out their lives without ever having been to Boston. The search was given over, but the heart of Abner Hardy was troubled. Had he done all that he might for the soul that had been committed to his charge? Had he remembered the orphan that had been confided to his keeping? What if he should hear the voice of the Lord at even walking in the garden calling, "Abner, where art thou? What hast thou done with the lad that came to thy door forsaken and that served thee faithfully?" Often in the night he groaned in spirit so that Isabel awakened and desired to know if he was ill, to which he replied, "No, wife, only my heart is sore because of the boy."

In two years a letter came. It was only a little one and it read: "Dear Uncle Abner and Aunt Isabel: When I ran away that time I was crazy with fright. Since then I have had time in my cell to think it all over. I have heard, through another prisoner, that Our Hiram did not die. I am glad he didn't, though I hate him, for he always put upon me because he was biggest and could. I know now that he would not have thrown my ring in the river, the ring that was my father's and that my mother gave me, but I did not know it then and I fought for what was mine as hard as I could, and I would do it again. He has been the cause of all my troubles. I crawled in at the window of a house because I was hungry, being all night and all of two days out in the rain with nothing to eat, and I took an old overcoat because I was to go into the darkness and cold and wet again. I was taken as I stepped out of the door and was sent to prison for two years. I go out today and I go west. My cell-mate and I have made it up to go, but I expect only trouble. He is not a good man, but has been good to me and has taken my part. He is the only friend I have. I am sorry that I trifled with that windmill and the little water wheel, but I always wanted to make things and believe that I could if I had a chance. Goodbye. GASPARD GAUTIER."

Abner took the first stage for Boston, but, though he made every inquiry and advertised in the paper for the boy to come home, he got no trace of Gaspar Gautier, nor did he, during the remainder of his life, hear of him, though he never ceased to hope and pray for the wanderer's return. The West, the great, immeasurable maw of the West, had swallowed the boy as leviathan might have swallowed a minnow. So long as Abner Hardy lived he seldom knew a quiet hour when there did not come into his mind, to be revolved over and over again, the concluding words of Gaspar's letter: "I am sorry that I trifled with that windmill and the little water wheel, but I always wanted to make things and believe that I could if I had the chance." "Yes, yes, you might, my lad," Abner would say half aloud. "But for me and my stupidity, and but for Our Hiram and his overbearing nature, God forgive us, you might have made a man."

The year has breathed upon his magic ring
That sets the turquoise sky; the buds unfold
Their brilliant secrets to the tender wold Whose heart has taught such lavish bourgeoising.

More prodigal that ever victor king
Has dreamed his triumphs, does the marigold
Inflame the field; the April wind is bold
To ravish tulips of their treasuring.
What piracies of petals have been flung
Upon the sunlit grass, in disarray
Of daring scarlet and strange yellow freight!
With all these riches to await among
The slow song of the twilight moon, you stay
The world, and keep the charm inviolate.

SHEAR WIT

A group of Scotch lawyers were met convivially at an Ayrshire inn one cold evening last December. The conversation turned upon pronunciations. "Now, I," said one of the barristers, "always say neether, while John, here, says nyether. What do you say, Sandy?" The hot tippie had made Sandy doze, and at the sudden question he aroused and replied, "I? Oh, I say whuskey."—Lippincott's.

Richard Croker, at a luncheon at Palm Beach, was reminded by a course of grilled sardines of a story. "You know, of course," he said, "the horse guards at Whitehall in London. They are the finest English regiment. Every man is over six feet, from the colonel down, and, on guard before Whitehall with their jackboots, their snowy buckskin breeches, their enormous shakoes and their brass breastplates, are an imposing sight. Once, as I motored past Whitehall, I saw a little street urchin leaping up and down before one of the stately guards in his bright, bulging breast-plate and shouting: 'Now, then, old tin jacket; I'm after you with a sardine opener!'"—Detroit Free Press.

"Whash trouble, ol' fel?" asked a tipsy celebrant of a stranger in like distress. "She'ere," said the other convivial one, "whar I wan't'know 's thish: Ish tha' light a lamposh or ish th' moon—hi?" The convivial newcomer swayed on his heels and studied the light for a long time. Finally he said with profound gravity: "Don't know, ol' fel'. Am a shranger here n' self!"

There was a deacon in Georgia who had been slighted by the campaign committee during a vigorous campaign for prohibition. One night he was called upon to speak. He still smarted from the committee's previous neglect, and when he rose to speak he said: "Brethren, I have searched the Holy Writ carefully, and I have found but one reference to water as a beverage. On that occasion the one who referred to it was in hell, where he deserved to be. And he, Dives it was, only asked for a drop of it!"—New York Times.

An eccentric preacher had a church member named Mark who was in the habit of sleeping in church. One day the preacher, to accentuate his text, and, possibly, to awaken his parishioner, began with the thrice-repeated word: "Mark! Mark! Mark!" Up jumped the delinquent. As he stood upright in the presence of the congregation the preacher delivered the full text: "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace!"

"I understand that the Chinese are discarding their absurd pigtailed?" "Yes, and selling the hair to the American women who make rats of it and wear it on their heads."—Houston Post.

A story is told of a well-known Sheffield tenor, who, when asked to sing at a dinner, although he had no music with him, went on to the platform to try, says Tit-Bits. The man did his best, and he broke down in the middle and retired. He was cheered up by an elderly man, who tapped him on the shoulder and said: "Never mind, lad, tha's done thy best; but t' feller as asked thee to sing ow't to be shot!"

"I ask for leave to print 'Lucile' as a part of my remarks," said the new congressman. "What has that got to do with your speech on the hog industry?" inquired a floor leader. "Nothing. But the young people of my district want me to send 'em some good poetry to read evenings."—Washington Herald.

Bishop Watterson tells how he was once taken for a "drummer" by a traveling salesman who was riding on the same train. Indeed, the stranger was so confident that he was addressing another of the guild that he began the conversation by inquiring: "Do you represent a big house?" "Biggest on earth," replied the Bishop, who was "on" in a twinkling. "What's the name?" was the next question. "Lord & Church," replied the Bishop. "H'm!" mused the drummer; "never heard of it. Any branch houses?" "Branch houses all over the world," said the man of God easily. "That's queer!" went on the drummer, who began to think he had run across a boastful representative of some small concern. "Er—boots and shoes?" "No," said the Bishop. "Hats and caps?" "No." Dry goods?" asked the drummer, beginning to display irritation. "Well," said the Bishop, "some folks call 'em notions."

"This is a glorious country! It has longer rivers and more of them, and they are muddier and deeper, and run faster and rise higher, and make more noise, and fall lower, and do more damage than anybody else's rivers. It has more lakes, and they are bigger and deeper, and clearer and wetter than those of any other country. Our rail-cars are bigger and run faster, and pitch off the track oftener, and kill more people than all other rail-cars in this and every other country. Our steamboats carry bigger loads, are longer and broader, burst their boilers oftener, and send up their passengers higher, and the captains swear harder than steamboat captains in any other country. Our men are bigger and longer and thicker; can fight harder and faster, drink more mean whiskey, chew more bad tobacco, and spit more, and spit farther than in any other country. Our ladies are richer, prettier, dress finer, spend more money, break more hearts, wear bigger hoops, shorter dresses, and kick up the devil generally to a greater extent than all other ladies in all other countries. Our children squall louder, grow faster, get too expansive for their pantaloons, and become twenty years old sooner by some months than any other children of any other country on the earth."—Old Favorite.

A newly arrived English prelate, with much clerical excess in his appearance, boards a trolley car in New York. He is on the alert for information. Seeing what he supposes to be a vigorous working-class specimen, he sits down by him with the question, "I hear you have been having very interesting political events here in New York during the last week or two." The gentleman from the Bowery turned to take a leisurely but rather consuming look at his questioner, "I don't know," was the answer, "I've been drunk the last fortnight," and the conversation closed.

A great southern teacher, the late Dr. McIver, claimed that our travelling salesmen—drummers—are the reservoirs of what is most peculiar in American wit. Dr. McIver added that the drummers, immediately after the Civil War, were the first real peacemakers. They went in large numbers through the Southland seeking trade. There was the never failing resource of a batch of good stories. "During these first bitter years," said the doctor, "when the clergy, editors and politicians were fighting each other across the line, the drummer was the real brother and neighbor, and it convinces me that the Good Samaritan was himself a drummer. You remember that the church fold came upon the poor fellow and the first said, 'This is too bad, but I have an appointment in Jericho, so I will ask some one from the Christian Association to look out for him.' The next man—probably a deacon—has to meet his wife in Jericho at five o'clock, and thinks he will telephone to the Associated Charities to take up the case. Finally comes the drummer, who is touched by compassion. He takes the poor fellow in hand, according to scripture. The internal evidence that he was a drummer is complete. He knew where the best hotel was; he was coming that way again, and he had liquor by him."

SUMMONS.

In the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

ROSE M. HANSON and GEORGE F. HANSON, Plaintiffs, vs. ALL PERSONS claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, Defendants.

No. 20,137. Dep't. —
The People of the State of California:

To all persons claiming any interest in or lien upon the real property herein described, or any part thereof, defendants, Greetings:

You are hereby required to appear and answer the complaint of Rose M. Hanson and George F. Hanson, plaintiffs, filed with the clerk of the above entitled court and city and county, within three months after the first publication of this summons, and to set forth what interest or lien, if any, you have in and upon that certain real property, or any part thereof, situated in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and particularly described as follows, to-wit:

Commencing at a point on the westerly line of Fillmore street, distant thereon sixty-five (65) feet southerly from the corner formed by the intersection of the southerly line of Bell street with the westerly line of Fillmore street; running thence southerly along said westerly line of Fillmore street, thirty (30) feet; running thence at right angles westerly, one hundred (100) feet; running thence at right angles northerly, thirty (30) feet; and running thence at right angles easterly, one hundred (100) feet to the said westerly line of Fillmore street, and the place of commencement.

Being in and part of Western Addition Block Number Three Hundred and Sixty-nine (369).

And you are hereby notified that unless you so appear and answer, the plaintiffs will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint, to-wit:

That it be adjudged that the plaintiff Rose M. Hanson is the owner of said property, in fee simple absolute, as and for her own separate property, and that her title be established and quieted, and that the court give judgment herein ascertaining and determining all the estates, rights, titles, interests and claims in and to said property, and every part thereof, whether the same be legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, or whether the same consist of mortgages or liens of any description, and such further order, judgment or relief as may be proper in the premises.

WITNESS my hand and the seal of said Court this 10th day of February, A. D. 1910.

[Seal of Superior Court] H. I. MULCREVY,
Clerk.
By JAS. P. KANE,

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Party Government as It Was

In a country where government is by party whoever controls the government of the party in power controls the government of the country. This is a truth that has been slow in reaching the comprehensions of the men of California, especially within the Republican party.

In a country where government is putatively representative the government of political parties should be representative also, else the government of that country can not be truly representative no matter what pretenses may be set up.

Again, a free country is not ordinarily stripped of its freedom by overturning a republic and setting up a monarchy or an oligarchy in its place. The transition is so gradual as almost to escape observation. The outward forms of a republic are kept up, but only as a pretense and a mask to cover real dictatorial or despotic power. Our Central American states are cases in point, as also is Mexico. Their governments are republican in form but oligarchical in substance, and if our republican institutions pass away it will be so imperceptibly as almost to escape attention and it will begin with the mastery, by private or corporate interests, of the governments of the political parties that strive with each other for control of government.

In California the Democratic party has been more democratically governed than has the Republican party, but the Democratic party has been little in power and, therefore, how it was governed has not been so important. The Republican party has been in power most of the time for thirty years and, therefore, how it was governed has been of great importance to the state.

The ordinary method of party government throughout the country has been about as follows: Each precinct has sent one or more delegates to a county convention. Sometimes these delegates have been nominated and elected at precinct primary elections, sometimes by caucuses, after public notice has been given in accordance with a call issued by the county committee of that party. Generally a little coterie of friends of some aspirant for office meet in advance of the caucus and make a ticket of delegates that suits them. When the caucus meets, or the precinct primary is held, this ticket is put in the field. Perhaps the champions of some opposing candidate bring out an opposing ticket and the issue is determined when the vote in the caucus or precinct primary is taken, and so one candidate or other gains the delegation from that precinct that is to sit in the county convention.

When the county convention is held the friends of candidates for state offices become active in securing the election of delegates to the state convention favorable to their candidates and the issue between opposing candidates is fought out there. The successful ones go to the state convention, the unsuccessful remain at home.

For the government of the party in the county there is constituted, at the county convention, a county committee, usually composed of one delegate from each precinct, the delegates from each precinct generally choosing one of their own number. In some states, and in some counties in this state, it has been the custom to choose county committeemen at the polls when the primary election is held. When this county committee meets, usually after the adjournment of the county convention, it proceeds to elect a county chairman, secretary, treasurer, and perhaps one or two other officers, and an executive committee of which these officers become members ex-officio. It is designed that this executive committee shall carry out the purposes and policies of the larger county committee, but, in practice, it generally runs the whole party machinery without troubling the larger committee to do anything except to do precinct work. Sometimes the county convention itself elects the county chairman, and the executive committee is constituted on his nomination.

When the state convention meets it has been the custom in most states for the delegates from some political subdivision to select from among their own number a member of the party state committee. In California state committeemen are generally selected from assembly districts. This state committee then selects an executive committee, not always from its own membership, with chairman, secretary and other officers ex-officio members thereof. So constituted, party government is sufficiently representative and may be presumed to carry out the wishes of party voters.

For about twenty years it has been the custom for Republican state conventions to authorize the gubernatorial candidate, in gubernatorial years, and the chairman of the convention in other years, to select an executive committee of twenty-one members. This committee assembles and selects its officers, and then the executive committee, so constituted, officers and all, is injected into, and made part of, the Republican State Committee. Inasmuch as, by bargain counter methods, the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company has usually been able to designate the gubernatorial candidate and the chairman of the convention, and, inasmuch as the executive committee has been the real governing body of the party, the Republican party of California has, for twenty years at least, been governed by the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company.

And, inasmuch as the Republican party has governed California, it follows that the real government of California has been that of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific company, except that some governor, or other officer, as George C. Pardee, for instance, refused to submit to corporation dictation when once in office, although named for office (reluctantly, however) through this power. Republicans of California have been slow to understand that they have not governed their own party, but the fact has been brought home to them pretty clearly by the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League.

An Enteric Beneficence

IT TRANSPIRES THAT THE PREDICTED retirement of Aldrich and Hale from the United States Senate is not to be attributed to advancing years, fear of failure in being re-elected, conscientious scruple or unrequited affection on the part of their constituents, but altogether to an intestinal difficulty which these two statesmen share, like everything else, in common. May they not take their departures until they have communicated their malady to Penrose, Carter, Depew, Cullom and the other members of that gray-wolf group. God bless that germ! May it work the redemption of the United States senate.

McCarthy's Only Chance

CONCEDING THAT MAYOR MCCARTHY is desirous of giving San Francisco good government, upon what theory could he expect to do it when he sought his political preferment at the hands of every untoward element in the life of the city, from the tenderloin to the higher-ups, from the banjo-eyed kid to Pat Calhoun? Do men gather pigs from thistles and dairy cows from ant-hills? There does not exist in the whole McCarthy contingent the elements out of which good government can be fashioned, even though McCarthy contained the wisdom of all the ages. His men will fall down on him like so many nine-pins every time he sets them up. His only chance of escaping the fate of Schmitz is to make friends of his enemies and enemies of his friends, from Dan to Beersheba and "a" to "izzard."

Good Hunting at Home

IN THE JUNGLES OF THE DARK CONTINENT Theodore Roosevelt encountered an animal that looks like a man and yet intimidates men, kills women and tears little children in pieces. In Africa they call it a baboon. In America a similar species, which do the same things, are called cotton manufacturers or coal operators, and our jungles are full of them. In fact, no better hunting grounds for that species of game can be found anywhere than in the United States senate, where the textile industries are given every aid and comfort and the Beveridge national child-labor law is held at bay.

Judge Lawlor's Grit

ALL HONOR TO JUDGE W. P. LAWLOR for standing to his guns. Knowing as he must, after so many months, and even years, of hearing evidence and arguments in the graft cases that the accused are guilty and deserving of punishment, despite public apathy and corporate pressure, alone and unable of himself to procure the vindication of the laws, he nevertheless stands firm and refuses to be a party to any compact to quash indictments that were true bills and set free criminals who should do time in prison. If California has any man on the superior bench who deserves to be called higher it is W. P. Lawlor. He is true grit.

Who Brings the Hindus?

WHO BRINGS THE HINDUS to our shores, those alien, ailing peoples, anemic, soul-weary, that spawn like fish and swarm like flies? Why, they are the same that fetched the Chinese coolies, that scattered the Mexican peons up and down our valleys, that brought in Greeks by the ten thousand and have ransacked the habitable globe to find men of so low an estate that they may be willing to work for a pittance and live on so much less than that, that they may save to send for more of their kind to help them compete with American manhood, to debase an American standard of living. The question is answered in the asking. These people are being fetched here by those whose only concern is for dividends, whose only use for a country is that it may be exploited, only regard for a common heritage is that it may be cashed in. It were a righteous retribution if their descendants were to be sunken into this moiling mass of submerged humanity. For any man, or corporation of men, to be so heedless of their country's good is treasonable.

Wisconsin's Advisory Vote

FRIENDS OF THE SENATORIAL ADVISORY VOTE idea have been fearful lest the courts hold the device to be a restriction upon the constitutional right of a legislature to elect without hampering conditions, but the supreme court of Wisconsin has held that legislators are only agents of their principals, The People, and that if The People desire to instruct their agents how to vote they may do so. To legislative gentlemen who have been accustomed to derive their agency from a railroad political bureau and receive their instructions from a Jere Burke or a Walter Parker, the opinion of this court, that The People are the masters, must seem wondrous strange and hard to harmonize with immemorial custom. Perhaps this able decision from a free and able court in a free and able state may help to make California free and able and give it such a court!

Not Big Enough

SENATOR DOLLIVER WAS RIGHT in affirming that the Republican party of this nation is big enough to contain men of differing shades of opinion, but it is not big enough to contain many men differing radically in their allegiance. As this country could not exist half slave and half free so the Republican party can not endure half loyal to country and half in vassalage to feudal lords that worship no god but gain and covet no good not expressable with the dollar sign. Sooner or later the party will break in two on that line and the sooner the better for party and country.

A Great Idea

POLICE COMMISSIONER FLANNERY is reported to have confessed his inability to explain why he telegraphed to Buncoman Abbott, "Joe, my promise is right," but he should not suffer that inability to distress him. The public will unfailingly supply the requisite explanation. A tolerably good guess would be that he had promised to help the bunco-gentleman and friend harvest the always abundant sportive fool crop of San Francisco. Who it was that first set a thief to catch a thief has been lost in antiquity, but it was left to Mayor McCarthy to appoint a saloon-keeper and sport to regulate saloonkeeping and sporting life in the interests of public good order and good morals. It was a great idea, the greatest McCarthy ever entertained, but it hasn't worked real well.

Nicely, Thank You

LINCOLN-ROOSEVELTERS are accused of being pessimistic and hopeless. Nothing could be farther from the truth. From all directions come the best of reports. We've got the rascals on the run and all we've got to do is to keep a prodding of 'em to make 'em skedaddle like Samson's foxes and for a similar reason. The good time is coming, boys. It has been long, long on the way, but it is in sight at last. Liberty and freedom's ours. O glory!

The Greater Joy

It was President Taft who lately gave expression to a mild envy of Andrew Carnegie, not because of the joy he had experienced in making his many millions, but for the greater joy of being able to do good with his money.

It is not Carnegie's money that Carnegie is giving away. The price he received for his interest in the plants sold to the United States Steel Corporation, though expressed in bonds, was represented by common stock and that stock was wholly water. The iron-consuming industries of the country were bonded to him for fifty years, and two generations of toilers will sweat and die that Andrew Carnegie may carve his name on a thousand structures as a philanthropist and benefactor of mankind. Not all can see this, probably he does not, but it is true. The justest disposition he could make of the evidences of his enormous wealth would be to do with them what William Allen White's "Certain Rich Man" did with his—burn them.

But Andrew Carnegie will never get the pleasure out of giving that money away that he got out of making it. From all accounts those years were a delirium of intoxication, an ecstasy of bliss. He rejoiced as a strong man to run a race and the culmination of it was the extorting from Morgan and his syndicate of an undreamable price for his possessions. More joy than he got out of that he could not have contained without bursting.

In making his millions, Andrew Carnegie threw consequences to the winds and gave himself up to the joy of acquisition as a hungry lion abandons himself to devouring his kill. He cannot do that in giving away what he heaped so high. He must now look well before he steps else he will do more harm in disposing of his hoard than he did in piling it up, and no matter how wisely he works, he can not hope to so fully restore to the public as to repay it for the harm he has wrought. The Pittsburg of today, the industrial nightmare of America, is chiefly the product of his hands. Going up, his trail was marked by broken lives and bodies, rebates mulcted against the railroads, frauds committed against his government, and extortion practiced against all his patrons. Shall his going down be marked by public and private mendicancy and a supine dependence upon the rich for those benefactions that are best appreciated when earned at the price of social self-sacrifice?

In only one particular is Andrew Carnegie to be envied. Heaven endowed him with great executive ability. If he had been given grace commensurate with it to inspire him to pay to his workers as large a wage as he could, make their toil as tolerable as was in his power, their lives and limbs as safe as possible, their home surroundings as attractive, their municipal government as honest and efficient, if, in fine, he had devoted himself with self-abandon to making Pittsburg the model industrial city of the world, then, and only then, might the President of the United States envy his reputation, his life work, his opportunity for doing good, his joy in having been permitted to live. When we see our good President entertaining false ideals so prevalent we begin to know what a colossal misfortune Andrew Carnegie has been to his race.

Up to You, General Webb

To U. S. Webb, Greeting: You are Attorney General of this State. As such you have power to intervene on behalf of the people when you have reason to believe that the district attorney of any county is faithless or inefficient in the prosecution of criminals. At the bar of justice in and for the City of San Francisco there have been arraigned four illustrious malefactors, viz: Patrick Calhoun, as principal, and Tiley L. Ford, Thornwell Mullally and William Abbott, as hired accessories before the fact. Their guilt nobody questions. Failure to convict them has been charged to the incompetency of Francis J. Heney, a former deputy district attorney. It was openly charged during the political campaign that resulted in the election of Charles M. Fickert district attorney, that, if elected, he would, by reason of influence and prearrangement, so misuse the powers of his office as to permit these malefactors of great wealth and influence to escape prosecution and punishment. Although the allegation was indignantly denied, events which have transpired since his induction into office tend to substantiate the charge. At least, there is evidence enough of faithlessness or lack of zeal to warrant your looking into the facts to see whether or not the interests of the people are being properly and vigilantly cared for. You have given evidence of professional courage and independence of character. The ends of justice demand that such an one as yourself, in default of proper prosecution on the part of the district attorney, come forward, assume control of these cases and prosecute them to final determination. The general public will have faith in your sincerity, acumen and courage. It will have no faith in the conduct of these cases by the district attorney of San Francisco. It may be that the rules of the legal game are such that, under those rules, rich scoundrels and their hired retainers may snap their fingers in the faces of authority and bring the wisest and most prudent efforts to naught. San Francisco stands before the civilized world charged with not wishing to enforce righteous laws against unrighteous wealth and power. It is up to you to prove to the contrary if you can. It may not be within your power. If not, the public will not hold you responsible for results when once you have done your best; but if you withhold your hands in such an emergency as this you cannot be held blameless. Therefore go into the case and sift the evidence. You have the State of California back of you, and the State will back you. It is up to you, General Webb.

The Sports to the Rescue

San Francisco high school athletic teams fared badly in their competition with teams from interior towns. Therefore San Francisco must have playgrounds, facilities for physical training and capable athletic instructors. We sports want our side to win. Better such things from that source than from none, but how pitiful is the reason offered. Athletic contests are stimulating and, within certain bounds, proper, but the child that needs the playgrounds, the gymnasium, the cinder path, is not the one that can throw the hammer, but the child that finds it a fight to keep alive and able to do the work of the school. Physical training, competitive play and manual training constitute an almost divine trinity for developing sterling manhood and womanhood in the cities of this country, if they are to be developed at all. No matter what they cost, the richest paying investment any city can make is in playgrounds. They will pay the largest dividends, morally, intellectually, physically. The ideal city is only the ideal family grown larger. That family which makes no proper provision for its children is as far from the ideal as hades from heaven, and yet few American cities have made provision for children anywhere except housed-up at home and shut-in at school. It is small wonder that our side does not win in competition with the children of the open air and the open fields, either in athletics, educationally or industrially. If the paternal instinct be not strong enough to command justice for the city child, by all means let us rejoice in that reinforcement that is due to the instincts of the sport. We want our side to win.

The Fittest Yet

The California Weekly modestly disclaims any share of praise for the President having tendered a place on the supreme bench of the nation to Governor Charles E. Hughes of New York, although it was among the first to offer the suggestion. Indeed, the suggestion may be regarded as having been sporadic, occurring simultaneously in a million minds as the fittest thing. It is not unlikely that the supreme bench may be substantially reconstructed during President Taft's administration. His first appointment was not without fault, Judge Lurton being too old, and it may be that Charles E. Hughes will dispense more law than justice. We have to take that chance, but he is a clean man and an honest one, a courageous man and a sincere one, and Mr. Bryan's intimation that he is under bond to the "interests" is of doubtful justification. It was the fittest appointment the President has yet made.

The Menace of Socialism

Professor Walter Rauschenbusch delivered the Earle lecture course this year at Berkeley. There is perhaps no one in the United States who now commands a larger hearing on sociological topics. On Monday evening last his theme was, "The Coming Society," which he has the faith to believe will be a co-operative commonwealth. He is a socialist. To be sure, his quality of socialism has its fangs drawn and claws clipped, is to be developed by evolution and not by revolution, is to be a gradual growth fitting in where it can and not a scheme made of whole cloth and fitted on; but its essential purpose is to eliminate competition from social order, and, while retaining forms of private property and personal initiative, it will not cease its efforts until it democratizes all industry and places in the keeping of the state all means of production and all means of distribution.

Berkeley cannot turn out a higher-class audience than that which greeted this lecture, and that audience could scarcely contain itself through sympathy with, and desire for, the social order which this able thinker portrayed before it. The evidences of approval were reserved, but deep and sincere. This was only one straw to indicate the set of the social wind, and he is a dull observer who is unmindful of the menacing advance of socialism in this country, in England, on the continent of Europe, in Australia and New Zealand—wherever humanity dares hold up its head in opposition to oppression, spoliation, inequality and wrong.

It would be as profitable for humanity to have the reason dethroned as competition eliminated. Eliminate competitive play from the life of a child and the product is a milksop. Eliminate competition from the life of a nation and the result will be a nation of milksops; but the need for competitive play in the development of a child furnishes small justification for that professional footballism that goes in to win by crushing, stamping, striking, fighting, transforming what should be a game into a scrimmage. This is play commercialized. Competition in play must be softened by a sportsmanlike spirit or what would be a boon to humanity becomes an infamy. So in industry and commerce, that competition which should be the life of trade, unbridled, urged on by insatiate money-hunger and greedy lust, may ravage as war and destroy as a conflagration. If play is to be a benefit, the player must play fair. If competition is to be a boon, it must be mellowed by the spirit of live-and-let-live.

But the Rauschenbusches are not bringing us socialism. They are only signal service men set to make observations, record them and forecast probabilities. The makers of socialism are those crass materialists who go money-mad and, possessing great powers, practice highway robbery by wholesale. Do they think that they can eliminate competition among themselves and not teach the commonalty lessons in socialism? By what means shall the many withstand the depredations of the few if not by making common, co-operative cause against the common enemy? And this they must do or see society resolve itself into patricians and plebeians, lords and vassals, masters and serfs. The patricians will roll in splendor, in squalor the plebeians will wallow; the lords will revel in licentiousness, in degradation the vassals will steep and stew; the masters will strut in impotent arrogance, the serfs will cringe and crawl in malignant servility. At the finality that civilization will become the easy prey of any masterful horde prudent enough to have maintained the homely, character-building virtues of competition restrained by the spirit of fair play, and personal initiative inspired by private enterprise. If the history of humanity has any lesson to teach it is this.

What the world needs is not socialism, but a Christianized individualism, but indications now point to an age-long struggle between a socialism of the few arrayed against a socialism of the many. Humanity has no choice but to meet organization with organization, combination with combination, centralization with centralization, corporation with co-operation. The Morgans and the Rockefellers, not the Rauschenbusches and Debses are doing it.

Put It Up to Them

If the reader had been a member of Congress from California during the tariff revision session, commissioned to obtain protective duties on oranges, lemons, raisins, nuts, and such other Californian commodities as need protection, and, arriving at Washington, had been informed by Aldrich and Cannon, chief hucksters of the national bargain counters, that they must dump their interests onto the bargain counter or have them dumped upon the floor, what would the reader have done? If forced to make choice between supporting the woolen schedule, which he detested, and seeing his own commodities go on the free list, would he have "taken program" or become an insurgent?

That the situation was a difficult one, and called for great abnegation or great courage, does not admit of doubt; but that situation no longer exists. The issue raised by the Indiana tariff platform is one between tariff making by log-rolling and tariff making by advice of a commission of experts, after searching the markets of the world for the ascertainment of the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, that a tariff schedule may be made to equalize that difference, changes to be made as changes need to be made to preserve such an equalization.

Another issue is as to whether or not the House committees shall be constituted by a committee on committees or by the Speaker as autocrat of the House and dictator of legislation for the nation.

The Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League should take the congressional situation in hand. It should put these issues up to our representatives in Congress, not to find where they did stand, for that is history, but to find, unequivocally, in as plain terms as our common language will admit of, where they stand now and will stand in the future. Private assurances on issues so fundamental should not suffice.

Such assurances should be given that publicity which will constitute a hostage to good faith no matter what pressure special interests may apply. And if those assurances be not forthcoming then the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League should lose no time in finding men who will contest the seat of our every congressman who will not take the test oath of insurgency. Loyalty to the nation and to right requires that no standpatter be returned.

The Passing of Housewifery

Our "backbone" article for the current week may prove more irritating than stimulating to our women readers, and yet it is not without claim upon their thoughtful consideration. Time was when those housewifely economies, the passing of which occasions our correspondent so much regret, were indispensable for the reason that no source of supply other than that of the family kitchen existed. Now food factories are among the great institutions of our land, and their coming has lightened the labors of women immensely and, likewise lightened the purses of the family breadwinners.

There is no question that these food factories can supply the family larder with all the products our correspondent names at far less cost than can the housewife, even though she count her own labor as nothing. The saving and utilization of the offal alone would give the packing house the call of the market.

But it is equally clear that the food combinations do not furnish their wares cheaper than the prudent housewife can, and that they will not so long as The Cinch retains its efficiency in exploitation. Our present system of 15-cent buying yields the smallest possible quantity of food at the highest possible price—all that the traffic will bear—and unless the earning capacity of the head of a family be large living must be from hand to mouth and nothing but penury is to be looked forward to in age.

It is possible that the economies of a factory kitchen, as suggested by our correspondent, may so trim the profits of our industrial exploiters as to supply that margin of saving from which provision may be made for the rainy day and for the evening of life. The German housewife stocks her larder for the year and the institutions which enable her to do it are the municipal free market and the municipal slaughterhouse where the farmer and the matron are brought together. In Germany this is a benevolence of paternalism. In America it would be one step more toward socialism. Well and good. Better that than be at the mercy of food-products combinations with eyes fixed upon The Cinch, and not honorable service, as the foundation of prosperity.

Mrs. King's paper should be productive of discussion, inquiry and thought, if nothing more, and this paper will be glad to hear, by letter, what its womanfolks think of her article.

Bottle and Bar

Among other devices for lessening the evils of the American saloon there is being agitated in some eastern States measures for prohibiting saloons that sell over bars selling in bottles not to be drunk on the premises. The reason for it is that men get their appetites whetted at bars, then buy a bottle over the bar and go off and get drunk from its contents. Where this reform is under discussion it is proposed to grant liquor licenses for different purposes, but never for more than one purpose at the same location. The holders of wholesale licenses must confine their hours of business to those usual with other wholesale houses, the family liquor store to such hours as the retail trade observes, the bar and restaurant to such hours as may be prescribed. All these restrictions tend to mitigate drunkenness, and whatever lessens the evils of what must be an evil under any condition of facts has a claim upon the suffrages of men. The bottle and the bar should be put asunder.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

At every cement factory is a test room supplied with accurate machinery for testing the strength of every batch of cement made at different ages from a few days up to years, if the plant has been established so long. Samples are subjected, first to a pulling test to the breaking point and then to a crushing test clear to the crumbling point. When these tests have all been made the manufacturers know what their cement will do; they know what their product will stand under pressure.

Would that there were ways of learning as clearly what any human being will do under a given pressure! In dealing with public affairs there is no other question so difficult to answer as what any given candidate will be able to withstand under pressure. This is the question that is being asked now in California concerning every man mentioned for a public office: "What will he do under pressure?" For pressure must needs come sooner or later. When it comes, will the official lose his bearings? Will his head turn? Can he stand prosperity? Can he be trusted with power without fear that he will lose his self-control and begin to abuse the power placed in his hands?

Nor are these questions pertinent alone to the few who are selected for special services. They are questions that each individual should seek to answer for himself concerning himself. The world is full of fair weather saints who go to pieces at the first squall that sings through their rigging. Anomalous as it may seem, there are persons whom a flea bite will make miserable who will subject themselves to the knife of a surgeon, and suffer the loss of an arm or a leg, with scarcely the quivering of the under lip. Who has not seen a home-mother impatient with her children, bemoaning her sad fortune, tears on tap or tongue attuned to scold, face a case of diphtheria or scarletina with a calm courage that puts her big husband to shame?

There are heights and depths to human character that none of us can scale or sound, and millions are born into the world, and die out of it, wholly unconscious of their own possibilities, for the reason that their life line lay along the lowly levels of being. It comes to one in a hundred, or perhaps one in a hundred thousand, to bear the strain of a great pressure or be crushed by it. The equipment that most of us require is that which will serve for daily needs, encountering no great temptations, but a multitude of little ones; being subjected to no supreme tests, but under pressure from a hundred sources more annoying than severe, more exasperating than crucial, every waking hour. So life will go on with most of us to the end of it, and even then death may catch us so unawares as to afford us no opportunity to show in the dying of what stuff we are made.

What is there for us to do about it? Is there need for us to have, somewhere, a testing room for ascertaining the strength of the materials of which we are made? Of this much we may be sure: Whoever knows himself is forewarned and forearmed, but not even the best informed can foreknow the heights and depths which he is capable of attaining. The secret of that may lie with one's grandparents in their graves. We shall do well if we know our common, every-day likelihoods of character, but these we should know as we know our back yards. If one knows himself to be susceptible to draughts he is foolish to sit in them. If he knows himself to be easily influenced by his companions he is foolish to consort with the evil disposed and only wise when he makes his friends among the upright and the exemplary.

The lesson of all this is that while our supreme traits are probably constitutional, and we are either of tough fiber or we are not, nevertheless we need not be hopeless of being able to withstand the supreme test of character when it comes if we do withstand all the small tests that come to us in our daily living. A thousand small triumphs will equip us for the supreme need if anything comes.

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

Density of Population of Cities

It is difficult to make an American who has threaded his way up or down Broadway, New York, believe that the population of any city in the world is so congested as that of the American metropolis, and even if he has traveled in Europe he is likely to hold to the same impression. Nevertheless, the impression is mistaken. New York is not the most densely populated of cities; indeed, by comparison with some other cities, it is not densely populated at all. The population to the acre in New York is 50; that of Paris, first among cities in this respect, 354, or more than seven to each one in New York. Then, in regular order, follow Berlin, with 321 to the acre, or nearly six and one-half to New York's one; London, with 150, three to one; Vienna, with 103, more than two to one; and Munich, with 62, one and a quarter to one. New York is vastly outclassed in this respect, which is one of the good things that can be said about the American metropolis. As for Chicago, which does not strike the traveler as anything approaching a wilderness, its population to the acre is but 31, or less than two-thirds as dense as that of New York. But it might be mentioned in passing that Americans are likely to make up in hurry anything that they may lack in condensation.

Our Long Ago Grandparents.

Professor Klaatsch—and need it be said that he is a German?—has been studying the prehistoric skeleton dug up in the department of Dordogne, France, last fall, and comparing it with the primitive Neanderthal skeletons, and has arrived at some conclusions which are interesting. Scientists have given to the Dordogne man the name Homo Aurignacensis Hauseri, although it is not absolutely certain that his father's name was Hauseri. As the entire name is too much like Tennyson's brook, and as the middle name would be especially trying for those unfortunates who stutter, it is trusted that we will be pardoned for referring to the gentleman briefly, but tenderly, as Aurie. It appears, according to Professor Klaatsch, that Aurie and the Neanderthal people were of distinct races. Aurie's grandpapa came from Asia, was a cousin, in some degree, of the orang-outang, and the Germanic peoples are descended from him. Some people might consider this line of descent a reflection on the Teutonic tribes, but the non-Teutonic peoples should think twice before they laugh at the Kaiser, for, still according to Professor Klaatsch, the citizens of Southern Europe are descended from both Aurie and the charming Miss Blanche Neanderthal, whose ancestors came from Africa and were related by marriage to the gorilla and chimpanzee. So if it is better to look back beyond Adam and Eve to an ancestry composed of gorillas, chimpanzees and orang-outangs than it is to one composed of orang-outangs exclusively, the South European peoples have the laugh on their German friends, but the pure and unmixed strains seems to be on the German side. Professor Klaatsch opines that both the orang-outang-German family and the orang-outang-gorilla-chimpanzee-Latin family originally came from Lemuria, the vanished continent which once stuck up out of the wet between Asia, Africa and Australia, but back of that even he gropes, and so the rest of us may as well give it up. Thus does the finding of a disused skeleton in France add to man's knowledge of man, and thus does Science enlighten us, but, considering how faint are the outlines on which she builds, it is not strange that she sometimes asks for a second guess, or even several more.

Blind Because of Parents' Neglect.

Ophthalmia neonatorum, the "babies' sore eyes" of common usage, is the cause of a large proportion of blindness, and, concerning this disease, a physician who writes for McClure's Magazine makes the following astounding assertion: "It is an astonishing fact, and one not generally known outside the medical profession, that one-quarter of all the children in the schools for the blind of this country are needlessly blind. These children are doomed to lifelong darkness because at the time of birth their eyes were not properly washed and treated by the attending physician or midwife." The writer in McClure's cites the statistics of various public schools for the blind which show that this disease is the cause of from 30 to 45 per cent of the cases of total blindness in those institutions, but here is the tremendously significant part of his article: "Two cents' worth of nitrate of silver solution and two minutes' of the nurse's time is the cost of prevention in cases of ophthalmia neonatorum." Life in a blackened world, then, is the price that multitudes of unfortunates pay for two minutes of neglect. Two minutes of simple precaution at one end of the scale; total blindness at the other! Physicians, nurses and parents alike should read the article in McClure's, and then heed its warning.

London Labor Exchanges Inefficient

Very different is the record made by the official or semi-official labor exchanges of London from that made by similar institutions in Germany. Statistics compiled in the latter country show that about 40 per cent of the applicants to the exchanges are provided with work, while in London hardly 5 per cent of the applicants are equally fortunate. Of 41,024 applications in the British metropolis but 2049 were supplied with work. The total number of female applicants was 3338, of whom but 169 were given work. It will be seen that the proportion of success in connection with the plan in Germany is as eight to one against that in London, and there appears to be little disposition to deny the natural inference that the difference principally is due to the dearth of obtainable employment in London. It is conceded that the labor exchange scheme is a failure in Great Britain, yet the cost of trying it during the fiscal year 1910-11 will be about $1,250,000. Some other remedy must be found for the increasing problem of penury; such, for instance, as the removal of tax privilege from the rich which Britain seems inclined to try.

German Expedition to the Antarctic

The German Geographical Society has endorsed a projected Antarctic expedition under the command of Lieutenant Filchner. The expedition, as projected, would not be as spectacular, perhaps, as would be one which might reach the South Pole, but, to the extent that it should be successful, it would be beneficial in adding to geographical knowledge. Its object, as announced by the society, would be to ascertain the relation of the land masses about the pole to one another. That is, an endeavor would be made to decide whether the detached masses of land which have been discovered at one time or another are parts of an Antarctic continent or whether they are but fragments of islands. The theory that there is an Antarctic continent long has been held, but it is only theory, with no exact knowledge to base it upon, and it is Lieutenant Filchner's hope either to prove or to disprove it before the projected expedition returns.

Increase of Insanity Prophesied

Professor Lombroso, the noted Italian alienist who died not long ago, had prepared an article which was published recently in an Italian review. The article was prophetic in its nature, and the prophecies were disquieting. According to the eminent professor, the number of insane persons in the civilized world will increase fivefold within the next century. The people of our time, he declares, are overworked and nervous exhaustion results. In this condition they more and more resort to such stimulants as alcohol, opium, cocaine, tobacco, etc. The overwork in itself tends unto insanity, and the stimulants greatly increase the tendency. These things being so, five of our great-grandchildren will be insane for every one of us who is so. There is, however, one ray of light in this gloomy forecast: Although men will be more insane, they will be less criminal than they now are, the uglier passions being more under control, while those born of cunning will be more in evidence.

COSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

MARK TWAIN GONE.

To uncounted thousands of lips those words rose a few days ago, and to every heart there came a sense of personal loss and personal grief. There have been greater writers, more profound philosophers, but no knight of the pen ever was so widely known and so warmly loved in his own day as Mark Twain is loved.

What man in the world last week was so familiar to mankind? A slender figure, not up to medium height, a strikingly chiselled face and head, surmounted by a huge mane of curly hair, the fierce mustaches, the soft and gentle voice, the kindly expression—these are as well impressed upon the public mind as the outward semblance of any man in history.

He loved his fellow men. Not with the love of the sentimentalist, but with the love of an intelligent mind, a generous spirit, and a warm heart. He could hate, too, and the low, mellow voice could pour forth sulphurous maledictions upon those enemies of mankind which are shams and prejudice and ignorance and pretense and vain glory and oppression. He turned the volleys of his pen upon such, riddled them with irony and overwhelmed them with laughter.

But his temper was to seek the pleasant things of life. Nine-tenths of literature sings those "sweetest songs that tell of saddest thought." Mark Twain found inexhaustible resources for his art in the brighter side of things. Beyond any other one man he led men to find joy and mirth in the discomforts and experiences of everyday life. His own life was seamed with many sorrows, but only once, in a soon-to-be forgotten short story, did he ever let the public know that he was melancholy. At all other times men turned to him for refreshment and wholesomeness and laughter, and found that for which they looked.

As an artist, Mark Twain is outranked by only one name in American letters, Edgar Allan Poe. Him he outranks in everything except the sheer mastery of words. Mark Twain's was a far broader vision, a far richer personality. He has a quality shared with master geniuses like Shakespeare, the quality of universality. He touched life at so nearly every point that one who is familiar with his writings can quote from him an apt phrase or story to match almost every experience. What he missed—and it was by but little—of the supreme art of writing he compensated for by the largeness of his sympathy and understanding and by the winsomeness of their expression.

Peace to his ashes! He has served us well. He added vastly both to love and laughter, and he left a name for honor and clean living and high courage. The philosophy that he clothed in jest lives after him. Hail, and farewell!

THOMPSON-BUCHANAN.

Grace George is coming in "A Woman's Way." The man who wrote the play is Thompson Buchanan, formerly a reporter on the New York American, Mr. Hearst's paper. Buchanan is a young fellow, about thirty, tall, smooth-faced, boyish, humorous, and soft-spoken. To meet him, as the writer once did, at a familiar gathering of friends in a New York apartment, you would never dream that he had had some of the thrilling experiences which he described.

Perhaps his best story is his account of a successful ruse to defeat the police and get a newspaper "scoop." An East Side family murder and suicide was the case. The police barred the doors and kept the reporter out, waiting for the coroner. Buchanan got a woman reporter from the Mail to feign fainting on a lower floor, he carried her into the apartment of a sympathetic lodger, then coolly locked the lodger in her own kitchen, while he climbed the fire escape and entered the scene of the murder, got photographs and a diagram and, with the Mail reporter, shared the scoop of the day.

ROBINSON CRUSOE—A DREAM OF YOUTH.

By Charles Warren Stoddard.

The air is warm upon his face,
The wave before him parts with grace,
His sail of matted cocoa thread
Upon the blended cane is spread,
His slender skiff of sandal wood
Seems conscious of his peaceful mood.

Returning to his still retreat,
From breathless calm and noontide heat,
He looks upon his island home—
Its azure-deeps, and wreaths of foam.
Through clustered palms, in purple skies,
He sees the mellow moon arise.

The forest yields him sweetest gums;
At his approach, the wild bird hums
On nervous wing; the parrot calls;
The goat looks down from rocky walls;
The sea is silvered at his wish
With clouds of fairy flying-fish.

Now tidying his rustic suit,
He takes his meal of fresh-plucked fruit—
Bananas bursting at the tips,
And figs and dates with juicy lips—
And milk the cocoanut affords
He drinks from stained and carven gourds.

The green turf is his ample bed;
He lies upon a goat-skin spread;
The arbor-shadows dim his sight
And fold him in their dark delight;
The odors of wild blossoms sweep
Upon him in his dreamless sleep.

The sun awakes him with his beam;
He drinks refreshment at the stream.
All fruits are welcome to his taste.
He is not fretful in his haste;
He finds his task forever new
And joyful does what is to do.

He threads the river to its source,
He angles in the water-course,
He lures the sea-bird to his cave,
He harvests coral in the wave,
He tracks all creatures to their haunts,
And shapes the sea-shell to his wants.

For him the ripened guava drops,
The rain is faithful to his crops,
No accident his plan defers,
To him all nature ministers;
What heart could restless be imbued
With this delicious solitude?

O, happy life of simple ways!
O, long recurrence of sweet days!
O, incident of sun and shower,
And great event of opening flower!
O, watchful death that never found
My Crusoe in his hunting ground!

In after years his spirit yearns
To linger in the vale of ferns;
To visit this delightful glen
And clamber with his goats again,
To trap the turtle, drifting slow,
And sleeping while the tide is low.

The busy seasons cannot wean
His heart from longing; though between
The wide and wilful currents play—
He watches for his isle by day.
Across the water seems to gleam
A shadow of his island home.

The sun is sinking in the west—
His dumb companions seek their nest,
He sighs to see that valley dim
While golden stars are watching him;
He weeps to tread again that soil
Beyond the reach of time and toil.

WHAT WRITERS EARN

The following paragraphs, printed in the Christian Science Monitor, are of interest to booklovers: We read that last year 8446 new books were published in Great Britain. When one notes the large incomes of Conan Doyle, Rudyard Kipling, Thomas Hardy and Mrs. Humphrey Ward, from their writings, he does not wonder that hundreds are tempted to enter the literary field. But they are among the exceptions, and in some cases success has come after many repulses and long waiting. Conan Doyle peddled his story, A Study in Scarlet, from publisher to publisher, and finally sold it for $70. It contained 35,000 words, and he thus got about $2 a thousand. In his latest work he received 60 cents a word for the American serial rights alone. Some of Kipling's finest stories in former days went begging at $50 apiece, while now he commands the highest rates. For the serial rights of Kim in England and this country he received $25,000.

Literature affords some strange contrasts. Former President Roosevelt received an offer from one publishing firm of $100,000 for a book about his visit to Europe, yet Poe was glad to get a $5 bill for one of the best of his tales. Beatrice Harradan made no money from her great success, "Ships That Pass in the Night," which went far into the hundred thousands, because she sold the English rights for $100 and the book was not copyrighted in this country. From Richard Carvel, as a book, and from royalties from the play, Winston Churchill has received over $300,000, and three of his other works have not been far behind. William Dean Howells, though holding first rank as a writer, has never had a great sale for any of his books.

Old-time authors who made large sums included Scott, the elder Dumas, Balzac. Eugene Sue, Emile Zola, Du Maupassant and Alphonse Daudet had fine literary earnings. Thackeray lived in luxury and left a handsome estate, while it is estimated that Dickens earned a million and a half of dollars in his thirty or more years of literary labor.

Of the writers of today there is a considerable number who get high returns for their product, but there are still not a few novelists whose names are familiar to the public and whose books are highly praised who cannot depend upon their books for a living. Judging from results, it may be said that if a novelist does not please women he is rarely a financial success.

ROOSEVELT'S NEW WRITINGS.

The Outlook, New York, requests us to make the following interesting announcement of Theodore Roosevelt's editorials and lectures:

"In the Outlook of April 2d it was announced that Mr. Roosevelt would soon resume his editorial writing for the Outlook. The first editorial of the new series has been received. It is entitled, 'The Pigskin Library.' It deals not only with the books that Mr. Roosevelt took with him on his African trip, but also with Dr. Eliot's 'Five-foot Shelf.' It will appear in the April 30th issue of the Outlook.

"The Sorbonne lecture, which was delivered in Paris on April 23d, will be printed in full in the Outlook dated April 30.

"The Nobel address, which will be delivered at Christiania on May 5th, will appear in the Outlook dated May 7th, which will be issued at noon the day the address is delivered.

"The Berlin lecture, to be given at the University of Berlin on May 12th, will appear in the Outlook dated May 14th, and issued at noon on the day of delivery.

"The Romanes lecture, to be given at Oxford University on May 18th, will appear in the Outlook dated May 21st and issued at noon on the day of delivery."

An interesting study for the lover of books is the effect of type and make-up on the impression conveyed by words. Anyone who has read the same book in two different editions will have noticed an utter difference in the effect.

IN RAISINVILLE, NEE FRESNO

WHAT OIL AND A NEW IDEA HAVE DONE

Henry Miller of The California Weekly wants to get better acquainted with another city than his own in his state he may find some matters of interest in this account of some things about Fresno. The writer has had the pleasure, in the past, of describing Fresno in various ways to various audiences—through magazines, through "boost" literature, and through private conversations with eastern folk who had never heard of it before—and every time he has approached the subject he has found new interest in it—new signs of progress, new prophecies for the future.

Oil has made a great change in Fresno. We used to hear a great deal about the money that the Blasingames and Shippis and Glenns had made in sheep. Henry Miller and Jeff James and the great cattle plains of the West side and the battle over the water rights of the San Joaquin, all these used to loom largest in the talk on the street corners. Later, M. Theo. Kearney and the raisin business were the storm centers of conversation. The sheep and the cattle and the raisins are still there, but a new big thing has been added. Now you hear that "Jimmy" Ward has made a million in oil and exchanged $1,200 a year as fire chief for some thousands a month as a "producer"; that Hudson Eccleston, who used to run a grocery in the Barton block, is in the company that struck the latest gusher, and has refused a fabulous offer for the stock that he was selling three months ago for ten cents a share; that W. J. Dickey, who has been in every kind of business that Fresno county has ever supported and made money out of most of them, has sold an old piece of grazing land that he accepted as payment for a few hundred dollars debt for well over a third of a million dollars.

Oil has done more than supply a new topic of conversation. It has put new names on the list of our most substantial monied citizens, it has built fine new houses, bought Pierce-Arrow automobiles, taken the family abroad, and sent the daughters to "select" schools with high-priced names in Los Angeles and about the bay.

Never before has Fresno looked so prosperous. Not only oil has done this, but good prices for farm products. The only doleful sound one hears is from the wine-grape people, who coined money a few years ago and who mortgaged the vineyard last year to pay current expenses. Everywhere else you hear the siren note of easy money and quick returns. Everybody has faith in the country. The traction company has it, and is evidencing it by building extensions, by double tracking the older lines, and by bringing in a lot of the latest pay-as-you-enter cars, with air-brakes and all the newest improvements. The city administration is showing its faith by such works as paving miles of streets with asphalt. The citizens have shown it by voting $60,000 for playgrounds. The merchants are showing it by tearing out the interior of the old stores and putting in the most up-to-date fittings and show windows and increased stocks of goods. The investors are showing it by building new business houses and new hotels in blocks that hitherto have been solely residential.

Extension, expansion, that is the idea. The library trustees have arranged to establish branch libraries in all the larger centers of population in the county. The residence districts are being extended in every direction along the routes of extended transportation facilities. The city has expanded by taking into its corporate limits the immediately adjacent "additions" that properly belong in it. The farming area is being extended by the opening of large tracts that used to be managed by one estate or that were held intact partly through inertia and partly for the present rise in values.

One factor in the present rapid growth and diffused prosperity has, I think, been overlooked even in Fresno. This is the probability that the patient years of advertising the county are now bearing full fruit. Year after year the local chamber of commerce taxed its large resources of money and ingenuity in a campaign for eastern publicity that widened and took on better shape and gave a stronger appeal as time passed by. Such publicity requires time to reach large numbers of the people whom it seeks to impel, and more time to convince such people. At last that period is over, and a strong tide of inquiry and personal investigation and eastern investment has set in at Fresno. The great wave of immigration that enters the state at Los Angeles has been partly caught and its flow directed toward Fresno. The result is the influx of unprecedented numbers of new settlers and the rapid development of unused resources of the country about the city.

Meanwhile, Fresno has been educating itself about itself. It learned long ago that cattle and wheat were not the only things it could handle, but in learning that it came pretty near to believing that God had fore-ordained it to raise raisins and nothing else. Another season of personal experimentation showed the vast possibilities of alfalfa and dairy cows and berries and other things. The small farmer began to have his innings. That is to say, the poor small farmer. Then the well-to-do small farmer found that a few acres of oranges in the foothill country spelled big money. W. N. Moodey, with twenty-one acres of oranges and lemons, got a habit of clearing $7,000 a year from them, and hundreds of others took their cue from him and have made the Mt. Campbell and neighboring districts a vast perfumed forest, bearing golden fruit. (Next publicity agent please copy). Now comes oil and, besides greatly increasing the present wealth of the community, opens up large possibilities for the future.

Oil is cheap fuel, and where fuel is cheap factories are likely to follow. As Fresno widens its rapidly diversifying list of products it will probably be cheaper to make up these raw products into manufactured goods than to ship them to present manufacturing districts. When that time comes the last step will be taken toward a commercially productive life as well-rounded as that of Pennsylvania.

But, as life is not all business, it is pleasant to be able to record a great growth in the gentler side of things in Fresno. One of these is a notable increase in the comforts of everyday life. Perhaps the most striking fact to a returning wanderer from Fresno is the great number of apartment houses that are now to be found there. The first of these was built only a few years—not much more than two years—ago, but already there are dozens of them. They are not the abomination of the great city, with little light and less air and no space about them, but handsome buildings that look like dwellings of the more pretentious sort, set each in a little plot of lawn and shaded by trees, usually with only four apartments to the building, so that every one of them has light and air from three sides.

Another innovation has taken strong hold upon the life of people in Fresno. This is the open air sleeping room. Hardly a dwelling there now but has its screened porch, shaded by curtains that are raised when the lights go out, on which the family spend the hours of sleep in comfort and wholesome contact with all-fresh air. Even the apartments boast this convenience. And the most encouraging thing about the fresh-air sleeping room is not its good effects upon the people, but its significance as an indication that the people have learned to disregard the conventional ideas of a proper mode of living, borrowed from the East, and have set about to devise a new mode based upon the requirements of the local climate. The Fresno Republican, which has annually printed an editorial upon the subject for the last fifteen years, may yet have the pleasure of recording that business is suspended daily from 12 to 2 during the summer months, that all the houses are built to fit the climate of Fresno instead of the climate of New England, and that the people dress for Fresno weather instead of San Francisco weather.

In spite of what was said above about oil and oranges and divers things, Fresno still produces some thousands of carloads of raisins every season, and it is only fair to conclude this article with a boost for the annual festival that will be celebrated there tomorrow, Raisin Day. Last year, with a big holdover of the crop unsold from the preceding season, everybody turned to and helped, by advertising and example, to clear the market before the crop of 1909 should get to the packers. The railroads gave wide publicity to April 30th, the hotels and steamship companies, even Congress and the President helped. The result was a quick disposition of the holdover and, incidentally, a lot of free advertising for Fresno that the most ill-tempered person could not begrudge. The idea that April 30th be annually advertised as Raisin Day is now part of the scheme of things in Fresno. This year the holdover is relatively small, but still important enough to need to be cleared out of the way of the approaching crop, and everybody is properly urged to "Eat Raisins" tomorrow and help the good work along.

Fresno is going to do its share. The local festival will include an aviation exhibition and a racing meet and a season of developing mutual good will and the co-operative spirit. Fresno will even eat a lot of its own raisins, as an evidence of good faith (also because it really likes them, and always does eat them), and it will be happy in the knowledge that in a thousand other cities and towns people who are good-natured and who also like raisins are making it a point to do the same. So, be good natured and at the same time give yourself a treat and

EAT RAISINS.

WOMEN

Miss Mary Dreier of the Woman's Trade Union League has expressed her approval of the plan of trousseau insurance which was suggested to the members of the Chicago Woman's Trade Union League a few days ago. Miss Dreier said that such an insurance scheme had been started in New York among the Italian girls and had been successful, furnishing an incentive to save aside from the ultimate object of providing the girls with trousseaus on their marriage.

Mrs. J. Scott Anderson, principal of the Swarthmore School and Kindergarten for the Deaf, has been appointed to represent four different organizations at the International Congress of Home Education to be held at Brussels during the third week in August. Governor Stuart sends her to represent the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and she will also represent the American Academy of Social and Political Science, the Philadelphia League of Home and School Associations and the Woman's Club of Swarthmore.

Frau Margaret Dittmer, the first police woman to be appointed in Berlin, Germany, reports that during her first year of service she had to deal with 604 cases. Among her charges were 165 boys and girls who had run away from their homes in the provinces and come to Berlin. In many respects Frau Dittmer's duties correspond with those of women probation officers in American cities. Youthful delinquents, waifs and deserted children are placed in her charge and she deals with them as she sees fit.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

Au Revoir, Dear Mark

Good-by, dear Mark. There's none does not recall

Some day, else cold, your genial humor thawed

Since first we roamed with you, each one your thrall,

And all, with you, were Innocents Abroad.

In Egypt, France or storied Palestine,

For one quaint drawl, your own, we learned to hark,

And, faith, it cheered the soul like rarest wine.

Ah me! Good-by, dear Mark.

With Tom we lived our care-free youth once more,

And Colonel Sellers taught us how to dream;

As Prince and Pauper conned life's lessons o'er;

With Huck and Tom have floated down the stream;

And always, always—oh, thou kindly soul!—

You led us on by ways that ne'er were dark,

Taught us that smiles may pay gray Fortune's toll.

Good-by, good-by, dear Mark.

No craven soul was yours. Your laugh was heard

Where shallow Pretence built his citadel,

And oft, when eyes by drops of pain were blurred,

You taught the weeper, "Smile, and all is well."

And now your journey—nay, we know not where,

But well we know it is a smiling way;

Then not good-by to you, in God's kind care,

But au revoir, we say.

When Our Neighbors Go Astray

You are quite right, Bartholomew, in saying that the manner in which Lycurgus acted is shameful, and naturally you and the rest of the neighbors are very much worked up over it. You and they are so much worked up, indeed, that almost nothing else has been talked of for several days, and there was none so poor that he did not feel justified in taking a verbal fall out of Lycurgus—that is, if he was not present. This righteous indignation at sin, and particularly at the sinner, is, of course, very admirable, and it is to your credit that—

Hold on, Bartholomew! I have just thought of something. Do you remember that time when you—well, we won't mention the circumstances, but doubtless you will recall that you skated where the brimstone over the lake was very thin. Possibly you fell in, but—s-s-sh!—no, nothing shall be said about it.

But how would you like to have the neighbors turned loose on that delicate time in your career, dear boy? Don't you think it would be nuts and cake and most of the delicatessen for them? Ah, you can bet it would! To be sure, they also have stubbed their toes and barked their shins in their time, but, like you, they are fervently trusting that no one knows about it—and heaving stones at Lycurgus.

Bartholomew, my dear boy, I often think of that scriptural incident in which the Wonderful One and the Magdalen figured, and I wonder what would happen in the modern world composed of our kind of people under similar circumstances. Of course, I do not know, but sometimes I fear that the stones could not be hauled fast enough to meet the popular demand. For we, whose shins are marred by the scars of many falls, how we do wag our tongues when we see the mire upon our neighbors' garments!

Cut-ah-Cut!

Now doth my neighbor's busy hen
(Cut-ah-cut!)

My garden make a wreck again.
(Cut-ah-Cut!)

My peaceful style it's hard to break,
But to those hens I'd like to take

An ax, and, for my garden's sake,
Cut, ah, cut!

The Opinions of Rufus

You can't git genius by jest orderin' it, but I've seen fellers make a middlin' fair imitation of it by diggin' an' diggin' an' then keepin' on diggin'.

When we hear mean gossip 'bout our neighbors we say, "Alas! Probably it's so;" when we hear it 'bout ourselves we say, "How unforchinit it is that folks do not understand me!"

The preacher said, "Brethren, we must love all mankind." I s'pose he didn't mention lovin' all womankind 'cause he knew most of us would do it, anyway.

It's all right to say a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush, but I reckon it depends. If they wuz buzzards, wouldn't you prefer them in the bush?

If you calc'late you're unselfish, try to make up your mind whether you'd rather stand a boil on your own neck or a carbuncle on your neighbor's.

Needn't tell me that Love's blind. He can see virtues, in some folks, that the most of us wouldn't notice in a thousand years. I reckon.

An honest man's the noblest work of God, but sometimes it 'most seems that He's over-partic'lar 'bout not lettin' 'em git too common-place.

Even if a college graduate does carry most of the information of the fam'ly, it's kind o' consolatin' to reflect that his pa still signs the checks.

I b'lieve the tendency of wealth is to make men mean, but I'd be willin' to take a chance on provin' that I'm above that kind o' weakness.

'Mong other things that I've got to be grateful fer in this life is the fact that I didn't git some of the things I wanted.

Perhaps You Know How It Is

Here's a sob of grief and a tear of woe

And a throb of pain combined,

And mine is an anguish I think you know,

For it's common enough, I find.

Oh, I think of the bright things; yes, indeed,
I'm a corker on repartee,

But I think of them anywhere from fifteen minutes to fifteen days after it is too late to say them; after the golden opportunity to display my conversational brightness has passed, and I again have appeared in the role of a wooden-headed chump of the mullet breed,
And that's why I weep to-day.

"And So They Were Married"

If the "higher-ups," as we have termed the possessors of wealth, look upon the rest of us as canaille, a mob composed of sycophants and toadies, I, for one, do not greatly wonder. To be sure, some of us do not deserve such classification, but the considerable rest of us so abjectly strive for it that it is not strange if an onlooker is misled into believing that the most of us are in the kowtowing mob.

A daughter of the house of Gould was married, the other day, to the son of another wealthy house. She is not noted for beauty, for grace, intellect or spiritual gifts. Nevertheless, thousands of Americans (mostly petticoated) turned out to see the wedding party; they all but overwhelmed the policemen on guard; they were a gasping, staring, crowding, pommeling rabble. Why did they do this disgusting thing? Why, the young woman is the granddaughter of one of our "robber barons" (with the emphasis on the first word in this case); she represents the Golden Calf, and she was dressed for the role. Therefore did the thousands to whom self-respect is unknown turn out, and therefore did they, metaphorically speaking, salaam, prostrate themselves and kiss the gilded hoof.

So I say it is not strange if the "higher-ups" look upon the rest of us as hoi polloi. It is somewhat hard on those of us who would sooner be whipped than thus fall upon our faces, but the representative of God Cash sees the scuffling mob, and not those of us who stay at home, and so his erroneous conclusion is natural and probably inevitable.

Something Wrong With the Records

The typewriter drags unto its task, the letters drop slowly, the inkpad blurs, confusion and distress are in my soul, for—let it be written with blinding tears—the records of the College of Liberal Arts of the University of Kansas show that the men students who fail in more than one-third of their work outnumber the women students thus failing five to one.

Brother, brother, how shall we account for it? De we not know that the masculine intellect is superior to the feminine? Indeed, do we not frequently admit it? And when we admit a thing, it is so, for we are men. And yet those records! How shall we explain them away? It is not sufficient to call attention to the fact that this direful condition came to pass in Kansas, and that Kansas is singular. It is, indeed, singular—for instance, in the amount of civic righteousness to the acre—but the connection between this singularity and the decrease of masculine or increase of feminine brain-power is not evident. It might be argued that the women are exceptional, but so are the men, and so that possible argument runs into nothing.

The more I think about it the more disturbed I am. My sister brighter than I? Perish the thought! Your sister brighter than you? Take an ax to the thought! To be sure, the impression in the old town used to be that the brightness of the families was principally represented by the girls, but we were the boys, and so we knew better.

Brethren, this is a time of woe. Let's write to the University of Kansas and ask what broke. Of course, records are records, but something must be wrong. We can't admit the implication, and we never will admit it—never.

Quit Your Frowning, Brother

The world is as good as we make the world,
So quit your frowning, brother.

As the great, round planet is onward whirled
One day is as good as another,

And whether the heavens are gray or blue
It matters no whit is a statement true,

For the light that counts is the light in you,
So quit your frowning, brother.

There's music above us, and music about;
Then quit your frowning, brother,

For the melody's lost if we shut it out,
The song by a growl to smother,

And whether life's melody upward mounts,
Or walleth the minors that grief announce,

The song in the heart is the song that counts,
So quit your frowning, brother.

There is some one is needing your smile to-day—
Then quit your frowning, brother—

As a light to shine on his better way,
Though he long has walked another,

For a smile that is sweet as the smile is true
Turns the sun of life to a brighter hue,

And it shines for all as it shines for you,
So quit your frowning, brother.

A Paris-of-America Fable

Two spirits who were wandering through space met and paused for conversation.

"Mayor McCarthy is rapidly securing his Paris of America," the first spirit remarked.

"Are you sure?" the other inquired.

"Oh, absolutely certain."

"Seen anybody from there?"

"No."

"Been there yourself?"

"No—that is, not nearer than a few hundred miles."

"How do you know, then?"

"Why, I smelled it, of course."

Moral—If one's moral olfactory nerve is not dead, there is no escaping the knowledge.

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Republican Line-up Take a Look at It

California is a Republican State. The probabilities are that the Republican candidate for Governor nominated in August will be elected in November. The only thing that can prevent such a consummation is a fatuous and stupid disregard for the state of the Republican mind at this time. In this campaign the old-time appeal to stand by the grand old party will fall on deaf if not on resentful ears. That the statue of Robert E. Lee stands in the Hall of Fame at Washington will not so outrage the patriotic sense as to cause Republicans in California to fail to look well to other issues. Nor is the need for tariff protection likely to blind voters to the injustice of tariff exploitation. Furthermore, the making of California a free State seems at last to have secured that place in the thoughts of men that its importance justifies. In view of these considerations it will be in order, even so early, to take a look at the Republican gubernatorial line-up. It is not likely to be materially changed, if at all, until within a week or so before the primary election.

Alden Anderson That Alden Anderson is "Organization" Man a preferred "organization" candidate for Governor is evident if surface indications are to be accepted as true. Anyhow, Mr. Anderson thinks so and, if it is not so, then it is because Alden Anderson has been taken in just as William Crocker was taken in in San Francisco last fall. We think that the fate of Crocker will be the fate of Anderson, but he evidently is not of that opinion and, in fairness, it must be conceded that his political baptism did not take place last Sunday.

Now the Republican "organization" is the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company. The twin are one flesh. No man in his senses will deny this, and if one were to deny it his face would give his mouth the lie and make good the allegation.

Mr. Anderson is not the railroad candidate because he is a railroad man, but because he is a decent, capable fellow who has managed so adroitly through his entire political career as never to have been for or against railroad domination of his party or his State.

And because he can call to his aid the championship of that portion of the Republican party whose domination of the party has caused the party to be looked upon as materialistic to the core. This contingent cherishes no ideals that are not commercial, no enthusiasms that are not industrial, no hopes that are not contained in the single word, "prosperity." It is because Mr. Anderson, as he himself artlessly expressed it, "loves to see the wheels go round," and can appeal especially to the commercial and financial interests to help the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau to nominate him, that he was brought forward as the "organization" candidate.

Deep down in its inner consciousness this element has no love for a Republican form of government. An autocracy, an oligarchy, a government by grand dukes or by a bureaucracy, by a king or a railroad, would be all the same to that constituency, provided that the mob were held in subjection, prosperity were guaranteed and gentlemen of affairs were accorded courtesies befitting their importance when applying for special privileges or, unhappily, confronting the bar of justice. This is the element behind Mr. Anderson and his candidacy, and it is formidable. It has the money and it is organized.

Curry California's Greatest Politician Charles F. Curry is a much abler man than Alden Anderson. There is no man in the State who could make a better Governor than he could, and few who would be likely to make a worse Governor than he would. At a time when the best thought of state and nation is devoting itself to ways and means for taking politics out of politics, Mr. Curry offers himself as the best living representative of politics in politics as Republican candidate for Governor. Charles F. Curry is the apotheosis of politics. He cherishes no ideals that are not political and no enthusiasms that are not grounded in political patronage. His conscience is political, his morals have a political sanction, his virtues are political and his vices likewise. His ability, admittedly considerable, is political; his type of mind is political, and by profession he is a politician. Politics with him has ever been the means by which he doth live, the diversion for his leisure hours, the enthusiasm of his youth and the solace of his declining years. What Charles F. Curry does not know about politics is not worth knowing, and what he does know that is not political may perhaps be placed at an equal valuation. He has never been antagonistic to the "organization" or to organization methods, and it is hard to understand why the Southern Pacific's Political Bureau should oppose his candidacy unless through fear that, if nominated and elected, he might venture to dispute the supremacy of Mr. Herrin as chief pilot of the Republican party in this State. That might prove serious, but as between Curry and Johnson, there can be no question as to where the Herrin influence will be thrown. It will not be thrown to Johnson.

What Stanton Represents

The candidacy of Phil. Stanton for Governor, besides representing "organization" politics in the State, represents the idea, limitedly entertained in the South, that Southern California should name the Republican candidate for Governor this time. It Stanton's southern backers should work themselves into a fever heat over his candidacy, and he should fail, and Joseph Call should become the "organization" candidate of the Democracy, the situation might prove important in the event of Call's nomination. The Southern Pacific's Political Bureau will have more than one string to its bow if it can provide a second to be used betwixt the primary and the election. It is a fact that has to be considered in relation to the direct primary that animosities engendered during the primary election are likely to be carried on into the general election. This has been the case in Oregon, and Californians and Oregonians do not greatly differ except as to their feet.

Nathaniel Ellery Political Puzzle

State Engineer Nat. Ellery is not in the political infant class. He learned a few things under the Gage administration, a few more while Pardee was in office, and he may be accredited with graduate work under Gillett. He need not be told that he stands no more chance of being nominated for Governor of California than for Minister to Liberia. He is a capable engineer, a hard worker, but one of those workers who feels that he must see to everything himself and, there not being hours enough in the twenty-four to do this, he falls behind in his department. This implies a lack of that unhurried executive ability, exerted through others, by which big business is done and large tasks accomplished. Mr. Ellery's candidacy is strategic rather than bona fide, the value of which is not clearly apparent unless it be to hold a few hundred votes in Northern California away from Johnson that would assuredly go to Johnson if Ellery's name were not up. Unless put into the fight for some strategic reason, Mr. Ellery will probably drop out of the contest, for he is no fool and will soon perceive, if he has not done so already, that he has not a deceased African's chance for the nomination this time.

Now We Come to Hiram W. Johnson

The candidacy of Hiram W. Johnson for Governor of California challenges the championship of every man who believes that tomorrow can be made better, more just, more tolerable for all men, more delightful to live, than today is or than yesterday was. While the supporters of Anderson would be content with any kind of government that would preserve order and bring prosperity, and the supporters of other candidates named are not worrying about such things, Mr. Johnson and his supporters will rest content and tractable under no government that is not of, by and for the people. Mr. Johnson and his followers have taken counsel with their souls and have declared that justice shall be made equal and as free as equal; that there shall be equality of opportunity and before the law; that while property rights must be preserved, the rights of man transcend rights to property; that prosperity, though desirable, and to be sought for through prudent governmental methods, comes too high and costs too much if purchased at the price of turning government over to the beneficiaries of special privilege. Instead of being the pessimists they are accused of being, because they find fault with conditions as they are, the supporters of Johnson are the most radiant of optimists. With joy and enthusiasm, and little thought of self, they are bidding despondent people lift up their eyes, take courage and wade in for a free California and equal justice for all. Hiram W. Johnson was chosen for their leader for the reason that, of all men in California, he best represented the buoyant spirit of the New Americanism.

Too Good To Be True

It has been passed out and around that the "organization" thinks so highly of State Controller A. B. Nye that no opposition will be offered to his nomination and election. It would be a fine tribute to a most loyal, painstaking, efficient and able State official, as well as an honor to the "organization," if the rumor were to prove true, but it is not likely to be so. The position which Mr. Nye holds may well be worth hundreds of thousands to the "interests." It may, indeed, be true that the Democrats if they maintain their party freedom, may leave the office of State Controller unfilled on their ticket, but they cannot do this without making Mr. Nye their candidate. Otherwise a handful of votes would be sufficient to nominate an opposing candidate. Mr. Nye will find opposition in his party. All the power the "organization" can muster will be used to advance the interests of Frank Mattison as candidate for State Controller. Indications point, however, to a still hunt and not to a contest in the open. Mr. Mattison is said to be in the employ of the United Railroads in San Francisco, and it comes to our ears that the poll lists and other data collected and used in the interests of Charles M. Fickert last fall have been placed at the disposition of Mr. Mattison's friends for use in the coming primary election. Any pretense that Mr. Nye is not to be opposed is more likely to have for its purpose the catching of Mr. Nye's friends off their guard than the payment of a well-deserved compliment to Mr. Nye's efficiency and capacity.

Railway Employees' Un-Political Organ

The Railway Employees' Magazine is unpolitical. It says so itself. It "cares nothing for the success or failure of any political party in California, but is ever ready to oppose any movement that directly or indirectly jeopardizes the interests of the men in the railway service." Good idea! Sound doctrine!

The political perspicacity of the periodical is well exemplified in the following quotation: "Los Angeles, as a result of its trial of the direct primary, secured a 70-year-old mayor who wears billy-goat whiskers and whose greatest accomplishment, figuratively speaking, is his ability to fall off a load of hay with a bucket of water on each shoulder and light on the ground without ever spilling a drop."

This quotation standardizes the editorial quality of the periodical better than anything that can be said about it, but that which follows is more important if true:

"There are easily 75,000 voters in the railway service in California, and if any political party should head its ticket with a man openly opposed to the railway interests it would in all probability find those men in the railway employ organized against that ticket. In any event, such a ticket could not get 10 per cent of those 75,000 voters to vote against their own interests."

In view of the too evident animus of the periodical in question, as exemplified in the paragraph first quoted, it may be accepted as a foregone conclusion that any effort made to emancipate California from railroad domination will be construed as being "opposed to railway interests."

F. B. Mackinder. You are summoned to Come Into Court. the bar of public opinion to answer well and truly why you say what you say about politics. You are one of the homeliest, kindest and cleanest of country editors, are you not? And you publish one of the neatest country papers in California, do you not? You are a Republican first, last and all the time? You love the Republican party and are loyal to it? Very well.

Now, do you know, either of your own knowledge or by common report, that the Southern Pacific Company maintains a political bureau?

Do you know, either of your own knowledge, or by common report, that the Southern Pacific's Bureau does now dominate, and ever since the memory of the present generation runneth not to the contrary, has dominated the "organization" of the Republican party in this state?

If this be so, is it pessimistic for The California Weekly to say so?

Do you regard such domination as creditable to, and a good thing for, the Republican party in California?

Do you feel that as a true friend to the Republican party you ought in honor to stand for such domination?

Do you know, either of your own knowledge or by common report, that Alden Anderson is the "organization" candidate for the Republican nomination for governor?

Are you supporting the candidacy of said Alden Anderson?

Are you postmaster at St. Helena? Did you secure your appointment to that office through the good offices of the aforesaid Republican "organization," its stand-pat representative at Washington and an Aldrichized United States senator?

Does the possession of this job tend to energize that optimism of mind which you so heartily commend to the members of the Lincoln - Roosevelt Republican League? Are you quite sure that its possession has nothing to do with that contentment with which you follow Mr. Herrin's lead and take the program of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company?

Your Honor, the witness refuses to answer on statutory grounds. He says that if he denies Southern Pacific domination of the Republican "organization" he renders himself liable to prosecution for perjury, and that if he admits it he convicts himself of being disloyal to his party and his state. Call the next witness.

Uncle Bill Bowers Hon. W. W. Bowers, Alive and Kicking. anyhow three terms in Congress, now in retirement because of advancing years and the active political opposition of the "organization," re-enforced by the Spreckels San Diego contingent, is still able to lift up a resonant voice on behalf of political freedom. We could almost wish that the corridors of congress were echoing and re-echoing the sound. Of a truth Cannon would know that another insurgent had come to town. He is not worrying over what Roosevelt will say when he gets ready to speak in relation to American affairs, but he has this to say if perchance

Col. Roosevelt should say the wrong thing instead of the right one: "The insurgent division of the Republican party is made up of intelligent, independent American citizens, not the blind followers of any man. They do their own thinking and no man on earth, however great, can lead them any other way than the way they want to go, and their way does not lead into the camp of the Philistines." So say we all.

Register, Right Now! The good citizens are showing a characteristic indifference to registration at this time. This is an old story, but it is especially grave this year. This time the people have the opportunity to name their own candidates at the primary election—for the first time. But this is more than an opportunity, it is also a chance to make a grave mistake. If the voters want a decent governor and decent legislature, they must get them at the primary, because a machine victory at the prithe result was as follows: Total vote, 88; non-committal, 14; for Bell, 12; for Anderson, 5; for Curry, 23; for Johnson, 34. This straw vote reflects pretty accurately the sentiment of the state as it has been found by the organizers and leaders of the Lincoln-Roosevelt League.

A Johnson Avalanche The Johnson wave is sweeping the state. Besides the support that was naturally expected for Mr. Johnson because of his platform and his backing, support is coming to him from other sources for divers reasons. Men like Judge Curtis Lindley, the scholarly president of the California State Bar Association, have been attracted to him by the fact that they have never before had the opportunity to cast a ballot for a man of Mr. Johnson's high character and first-class ability for governor. Mr. George Lane, another Democrat of the first rank, and brother of Franklin K. Lane, has turned down the opportunity to run on the Democratic ticket for attorney-general, and is to register as a Republican, so he may vote for Hiram Johnson. On the other hand, that large class of political timber that wants to be for the winner is flocking to him. Tim Sullivan, for example, who managed Crocker's campaign in San Francisco last fall, is scrambling for the band wagon. In fact, many of the machine leaders—Lynch, for example—have let it be known that they do not hope to beat Johnson.

Look Out For The Legislature But the machine is desperately in earnest about the legislature. Believing that they are beaten for a governor, they are fighting hard to get a loyal legion of machine senators and assemblymen sent to Sacramento, enough to tie the governor's hands and to prevent any constructive reform work. This is a menace that must be diligently investigated by the leaders of the various districts. Now is the time to make every candidate for the legislature step out and stand up on the vital issue of machine domination. Otherwise, there will be a hostile legislature confronting a reform governor, and the state administration of the next two years will simply mark time. Look up that legislative candidate in your district. Will he stand up under the fire of the machine guns next year?

Johnson's Next Tour The present tour of Hiram Johnson is taking him through Woodland, Colusa, and the neighboring towns and counties. Reports from these places indicate that meetings are growing in size and enthusiasm. At several points, wagon loads and stage loads of people came from places twenty to thirty miles from the meeting place, to hear the orator. After concluding this tour, Mr. Johnson will go up the San Joaquin Valley, through Stockton, Turlock, Modesto, Merced, Madera, Fresno, Coalinga, Porterville, Tulare, Visalia, Hanford, Bakersfield, and all the other important points of the valley. These meetings have all been arranged by organizer Max J. Kuhl. After the Bakersfield meeting Mr. Johnson will go over the Tehachapi and make his second tour of Southern California. This trip will probably take until the first of June. Then Mr. Johnson will return to San Francisco for his second swing through Northern California and for his meetings in San Francisco. Before he has finished, every voter in California, even in remote hamlets, will have had an opportunity to see the man who stands for Right Things in the Republican party and in the government of the state. Mr. Johnson is most sanguine of the result.

mary leaves for the November election only a Hobson's choice between machine candidates labeled Republican and machine candidates labeled Democrat. And the truth had just as well be told, as a warning to good citizens: Every Royal Arch adherent has registered, every tenderloin voter has registered, every "push" politician's cheap follower has lined up at the county clerk's desk and made himself eligible for the ballot on August 16th. The people who expect to see Hiram Johnson or Theodore Bell the next governor of California are smiling hopefully and putting off going to the registrar's. Wake up! Register! Do it now! And remember, if you want to vote for Hiram Johnson, do not register as a Lincoln-Roosevelter, but as a Republican. There is no Lincoln-Roosevelt party. Register!

Straw Vote A straw vote, taken last Wednesday on Train No. 19, between Sacramento and San Francisco, disclosed a pretty stiff breeze blowing toward Hiram Johnson for governor. Excluding tourists and other non-voters, the entire train was polled, and

The California Weekly.

Dear Sirs: Inclosed please find the subscription price of your indispensable little weekly. For years I have bemoaned the lack of such clean, condensed, unbiased local news.

By the way, I hope that in the next incarnation these pages and pages of political bickering may be dispensed with. I hate it, but I feel it my duty to keep posted, even though I am not a citizen. I am merely a woman—a high school teacher—and unlike the ignorant, foreign, unskilled laborer, my judgment about the laws and the men who govern me doesn't count.

And that reminds me of what seems to be the one weakness of your rare little paper—its occasional fling at women. Instance "A Straight Tip" in which is set forth as reasonable an excuse as is usually given for the disfranchisement of one-half the population. Now, honestly, wouldn't it be more reasonable to withhold votes from men, because they jeopardize their own and their children's well being by smoking and indulgence in worse vices—than to condemn women because they wear the kind of hat the market supplies? If you investigate you will probably find some man or combination of men at the financial origin of the styles. You won't find the sensible women wearing these ugly monstrosities any more than you will find a strong man following the lead of bad companions—what about the dress affectations of the college men who would be supposed to have a bit more brains than the average man?

You don't have to go "up in the gallery" to get a "straight tip" as to how one would expect women to be treated under man-made laws. Any crowded street car will serve the purpose—in the morning when the "tired" excuse doesn't hold. It is man's mismanagement of politics that tolerates an unaccommodating street car service, and I notice that the women, who can't run ahead and jump on, are expected to put up with the discomforts. Observe a schoolboy's consideration for women strap-hangers to get a "straight tip" as to how much regard will be shown women in the next decade if laws continue to be man-made. Alas, I know it is the mother's indulgence that is the chief cause of selfishness in men. I have seen a well-dressed mother and an athletic looking eighteen-year-old son enjoying their seats in view of a dozen women strap-hangers.

Your Deeper Significance of Living, which is ninety-nine per cent a power for good, explains why a single woman is never happy. Indeed! Is it that the wish is father to the thought with you? People who insist upon being unhappy will not need to remain single. I have seen more married than single wretchedness, and the children of such marriages had better never be born. We need quality in children in order to multiply happiness in the world—since we no longer need "food for cannon" (knock on wood), more children is the wrong cry, more quality has the true ring—and are men considerate of this cry to their fatherhood?

Dear Mr. Editor, can't you see that when women lose their old-fashioned, man-created horror for spinsterhood, they will refuse to marry any but pure, good men—men who have the character to detest smoking, drinking and those worse vices that are visited on the children unto several generations? Every boy should be taken to the children's hospital, and be told plainly who is to blame and why—for the heartbreaking sufferings of these poor, little, moaning, blameless babies.

It wasn't the size of women's hats that did it. If you hark back a couple of centuries you will find even the rulers of this "man-made world" wearing ridiculous costumes. Instance the present English king's weaknesses in that regard!

I hope to live long enough to learn if the "big hats" will make a worse mess of politics than the San Francisco men. The silly arguments against women's suffrage would be irritating did they not so ludicrously, yea, pitifully, expose the selfishness of men. The frailties of this world are neither masculine nor feminine—they are human, and every human deserves a square deal.

I am very sincerely yours, that strange anomaly,

A happy spinster,
EDA MENZEL.

April, 1910, 1323 11th Ave., Sunset.

[The editor his his troubles also. If he is always serious he is pronounced stupid and if he pokes fun he is raked fore and aft. Yes, it were better that a woman go down to her grave single, lonesome and alone than that she live the wife of a beast and the mother of criminals, and yet the risks that the real woman takes in marrying is relatively small and, with all its heart-burnings, in ninety-nine cases out of the hundred, yields more of happiness than could have been found outside of wedlock. And be it remembered that bad husbands were not bad in the beginning. They spoiled on their wives' hands. Is no share of that responsibility hers? This paper believes in the enfranchisement of women, but it doubts the expediency of merely doubling an indifferent constituency. Other reforms are more needed now, such as compulsory voting, and through them the enfranchisement of women is more likely to be reached than by another route. When suffrage is founded on right lines it will not separate race from race, nativity from nativity, sex from sex or color from color.—The Editor]

THE HOUSE WIFE AND THREE DRAGONS

ONE REASON FOR THE INCREASED COST OF LIVING

By RAY McINTYRE KING

Whatever the politicians, commissions, boycotters and public generally may do, or not do, to discover and remove the iniquitous cause of the present high prices of foodstuffs, the American housewife is not absolved from performing her part in the solution of this national problem. The average woman underestimates the money-making possibilities of her own kitchen. In the home a woman may realize her highest economic and industrial function. It is because as a class the American housewife has not realized this that so many families now lie crushed between two millstones—one of internal household inefficiency; the other of external harsh and unrighteous conditions.

All men, women and children must and will eat, and the economical preparation of the family's food constitutes one of the chief sources of family income and wealth. 'Tis a wise old saw: "A woman can throw out with a teaspoon more than a man can throw in with a scoop shovel!" But the utilization of scraps and the elimination of waste and extravagance is but an incident in the economical administration of the home. The first important step toward family independence and provident living is to eliminate the retail butcher, baker and grocer—to buy in quantity and to buy the raw food materials, as near first hand as possible! This is the one vital step which the average family never takes. It buys along the lines of least resistance—and must pay for it!

Prepared Foods Corporations Costly.

A truly efficient housewife is ashamed to be caught with a tin of commercially prepared fruit, vegetables or meat in her possession. It brands her as shiftless, lazy, a poor "provider!" The empty tomato can might well stand as the emblem of inefficient housewifery and a hand-to-mouth existence. Empty tin cans in the garbage—the little insidious leaks whence dribble away many a good man's independence, numberless family conveniences, the children's chance, the shelter for old age!

The ready-to-eat foods have increased enormously in the last decade. The factory fires burn day and night; the home kitchen stove is lighted only long enough to warm up the tinned and cartoned stuffs. The factory chef is earning enormous dividends for the prepared foods corporations; the home cook is down and out. The clerk, the banker, the brakeman, the merchant, the professional man, the hodcarrier, the farmer—anybody, everybody is eating tinned and cartoned and packing-house goods for breakfast, dinner and supper. From the grocer's shelves you may select your frugal (?) morning toast and your ready-cooked evening banquet, from oysters and soup through the most elaborate menu. But, kind sir, you must pay—pay—pay! Lord! how you pay for the factory chefs that cook for you!

You Pay, and It Is Right You Should.

'Tis right and just that you should pay! It is the law of the industrial life—Thou shalt earn thy bread by the sweat of thy brow, not of some other fellow's brow! Be sure any man who gets more of this world's goods than he literally sweats to earn is, either consciously or unconsciously, cheating labor, somewhere, somehow. When you buy factory, or packinghouse foodstuffs, you must pay this tariff to skilled labor—and God knows it is little enough! But you must also pay the enormous wastes and cost of the unskilled laborer. He everywhere works side by side with the skilled workman. No employer has ever yet succeeded in eliminating him from the aggregate cost of labor.

Then you must pay all these additional, indefinite tariffs on the factory and packing-house foods: freight charges crossing and recrossing and criss-crossing states and the continent; the expenses and profits of several middlemen; the legitimate tariffs of invested capital and invested brains; all the unconscionable tariffs of greed and graft, both low and in the seats of the mighty—and, in the end, you pay a pretty price for your bacon!

It is the common and bitter complaint today—this frightfully increased cost of living. While about it, why not complain about the increased cost of the cooks—the factory cooks that have elbowed the American housewife out of her realm? When the harried husband scratches his head over the butcher, baker, and grocer bills, does he give thought to the demands of the many cooks who serve him? Does he know how many tin cans and paper cartons he has bought to throw into the rubbish heap? Does he count up what he has to pay for forty-seven paper bags, and clerks to weigh out little purchases? Does he know he has to pay more clerk hire for weighing out and tying up five cents worth of sugar than he would for a hundred-pound sack? If he does think, he must know that to live he must buy his staple groceries in large quantities and at wholesale, if possible.

In the Toils of Three Dragons

The average home is in the toils of the Three Dragons—the retail butcher, the baker, the retail grocer. These dragons have no particular clutch on a pioneer, country-dwelling people. Food and clothing are of necessity made at home, of home, or locally grown, raw materials. But let those wholesome, prosperous pioneer conditions change into the complex, intensified, specialized urban civilization (or is it degeneration?) and then the Three Dragons begin to grow and swell and lengthen enormously, and lash their huge, sinuous, scaly tails about the poor man's home. Their breath is as a fire, and the average man shakes in his boots and feeds his little, hard-earned income into their widely yawning mouths.

What does the average housewife do to earn her salt, compared with what her pioneer grandmother did in the home preparation of foodstuffs? Grandmother made her own syrups, vinegar, cider and mincemeat. She made the butter and cheese. She cured the bacon, hams, sausages, and corned the beef. She put down for winter, according to the limited methods of her day, pickles, kraut, lard, vegetables and fruits. Her spring-house, cellar, larder and smokehouse were filled with stores of food sufficient for that family to withstand most comfortably a long siege of hard times. It was a matter of supreme indifference to her whether the butcher and baker were one mile, or fifty, away. She had need to buy only a few staple groceries of the foreign, imported kinds. Her breadstuffs came not from the grocer at all, but from her own grist at the nearest mill. Unexpected company and generous hospitality were her delight. The Three Dragons did not terrorize her. And yet she found time and strength to raise a family of eight!

The Cook That Cooks for the Cook.

To-day, her granddaughter with two children is rushed to death and "nervous." You don't dare go a-visiting her without an invitation, so she can be sure to send to the shop and store for something to eat. The greatest insult her husband can offer her is unexpectedly to bring home someone to dinner. Oh, her kitchen is so neat, because she never works in it! And her pantry so clean, because she never clutters it up with victuals! She wouldn't know the uses of a larder, or cellar, or smoke house, if she had them. She might—possibly—have a company, or emergency shelf, if she pretends to keep abreast of current domestic science, but you can bet it is filled with commercial canned goods! Her family would actually go hungry if the butcher and bakery wagons failed her. She makes her daily dribbling purchases of groceries. And meanwhile, her husband toils and moils to pay for the cooks that cook for the cook that ought to cook for him!

That is where over 50 per cent. of his income goes—to make richer the pickle and catsup magnates, the fruit and vegetable cannery owners, the pork and beef packers.

The pity of it is that the wife does not realize her inefficiency. By comparison with her associates, she very likely passes as a good cook. She would scorn the imputation that she is too lazy, or too proud, to prepare the food for her own table. She simply does not appreciate the value of those housewifery arts which her grandmother practiced. She may possess a remnant of that old-school kitchen efficiency. She may possibly can her winter's fruit, and possibly make her cakes, but other kinds of provender she must buy from the commercial supplies.

Housewifery a Lost Art

American housewifery at present is no housewifery at all. Grandmother's specialties are wellnigh lost arts. If you doubt it ask the first dozen so-called good housewives you meet: "How do you make hominy? And cheese? And vinegar? And corned beef? And yeast? And catsup?"

See them stare.

"Make? Why, bless you, we don't make—we buy."

The most pernicious effect of modern specialization and present day advertising has been to remove the preparation of raw foods from the home kitchen to the factory. As a heedless people we are now paying the enormously increased prices of this commercial, specialized culinary labor and of its products. Specialization is everywhere carried to ridiculous lengths. Here, for instance, is a three-dollar-a-day town carpenter. He scorns to prepare his own salt pork and bacon, though the preparation thereof each year would consume only one of his specialized three-dollar days.

No, thank you! His wife shall hie her to the store fifty-two times a year and buys in fifty-two parcels, say, about two hundred pounds of bacon, at 22½ cents per pound. Just outside the town limits, the farmers are selling hogs at 7 cents per pound. Those hogs are shipped to Chicago, killed, dressed and cured, and shipped back to the town store to be sold as 22½ cent bacon to that same brilliant carpenter. If he would but think to lay off one of those specialized three-dollar days and prepare his two hundred pounds of bacon in his own backyard and kitchen the cost of his homemade bacon would be less than ten cents per pound. That one day's labor at home would net him over twenty dollars.

Why the Butcher

Why should there be a butcher shop in every town and village? There might be some sense in having municipal meat markets in congested city districts, but why should townspeople and villagers buy meat at retail? At the beginning of the recent meat boycott, the dwellers in an Oakland suburb right loyally joined the crusade and boycotted their local butcher. Before the end of one week, they petitioned him to re-open his shop. They could not live without his costly and beneficent services—and Oakland is literally encompassed with hordes of live poultry, fish, cattle and hogs, to trouble! What ridiculous household inefficiency! What pitiable stupidity!

So it is in every community that the local butcher waxeth fat on his neighbors' thriftlessness. Why a butcher shop? Because the housekeeper is averse to any exertions outside the deep grooves of habitual living. Because the average housewife is rubber-set in her hand-to-mouth mode of housekeeping. She has accustomed herself to think that to have meat, and especially fresh meat, she must buy only sufficient for the day. Sufficient ready money to buy in quantity and for cash may prevent a housekeeper for a time from buying in the most economical way, but such objections are somehow always overcome by the woman who is really determined to reform her system of buying.

Factory Kitchen a Money-Maker.

The average housewife does not appreciate all that science and invention—men's inventions—have done for her and her kitchen workshop. Therefore she furnishes her house backward, beginning with the parlor and the things of show, while that most essential part of her little industrial system, the kitchen, its machinery and equipments, come last, or not at all. Her kitchen should in truth be a workshop, a food factory, not merely a place of drudgery in which to spend as little time and thought as possible. Only as a woman puts thought into her kitchen will that kitchen become delightful and profitable to her. And certainly for the family's sake, the kitchen deserves as much application and intelligence as a man would expend upon his shop, or factory, to make it a financial success.

The housewife needs to study thoroughly the appliances and methods of food preparation and preservation. When she understands the principles of scientific sterilization of raw foods and learns that fish, meat, fruit and vegetables may be bought in quantity and sterilized at home successfully, and thus be kept fresh indefinitely on her pantry shelves, then she begins to see a great light dawning over her establishment. She sees a way, through the sterilized canning of fresh meat in glass jars, to rout the retail butcher forever.

How to Beat the Beef Trust

She is a benighted housewife, indeed, who can not get in communication with some reliable farmer anxious to furnish her with a dressed veal, or hog, or beef, at reasonable rates. The carcass can be handled nicely in the kitchen, some parts being salted or dried or smoked, while the choice roasts, steaks and sausages may be properly cooked as for the table and then put into glass jars and sterilized. That means heavy work for a short time in that kitchen, but it also means for that housekeeper lighter labor and more money for months thereafter.

Why should the beef trust fasten its claws on your table? Like a lot of other dragons that gnaw men's souls, it is largely the creation of the very victims it feeds upon. If every housewife will but resolutely look it in the eye there will soon be only a most lean and attenuated dragon left—and the family will not be lean and attenuated, either!

Let a woman inscribe over her kitchen door: "No prepared foods shall enter here, whereof I may buy the raw materials and prepare it myself," and immediately that family begins to prosper. That means an enormous cut in the number and kinds of articles bought from the grocer.

Take coffee. Who buys green coffee any more? Yet green coffee beans improve in quality with every month and year of keeping, while parched coffee begins to deteriorate rapidly from the moment of browning, not to mention grinding! A wealthy Guatemalan coffee planter living in California for a time always insisted upon his wife parching the morning supply of coffee beans. With her own hands she browned and ground the beans and made her lord his delectable morning coffee. And it was coffee—not the indifferent beverage that passes in most households!

Foodstuff a Fascinating Study

When a woman applies herself assiduously to the fascinating study of foodstuffs, she discovers numberless little ways to cut down the family cost of living, while at the same time she increases the quality and quantity of food. It may mean the complete revolutionizing of that family's mode of living, but it is that family's only salvation. Like the retail butcher, the retail grocer exists because he is a convenience—not a necessity. Here is the puzzle: When is a convenience not a convenience? or, When does a convenience become a prohibitive luxury? The time has come when every man must sit down by his income and work out the puzzle, if it takes a week!

The baker is the easiest dragon of all to rout. Any woman who will experiment with a sack of flour can easily determine how much she pays for the convenience of buying her bread and pastries over a counter. The reason most women give for buying bakers' stuffs is the cost of fuel—as though the baker uses no fuel! 'Tis true, it costs less in fuel to buy baker's bread, but if that be good economic logic, it would be cheaper yet to quit cooking and eating altogether!

What One Housewife Has Done

One California housewife who has slain the dragon in her path offers this list of foods which she prepares successfully and most economically at home from the raw materials:

Butter and cheese. The cheeses are small and rich, made from the night's and morning's milk from one Jersey cow.

Sterilized canned pork and beef.

Bacon, hams, salt pork, corned beef.

All kinds of canned vegetables and fruits.

Dried beef, smoked fish, sauerkraut.

Old-fashioned hominy and mince meat.

All kinds of pickles, catsups and relishes.

Yeast, vinegar, wine, unfermented grape and fruit juices.

Jams, marmalades and jellies.

A large assortment of candies and confections.

Olive oil and olives; Italian pastes.

All kinds of dried fruits, including raisins and figs.

All kinds of bakery goods.

Thus fortified and stocked with foodstuffs, her establishment is always prepared for any sort of siege. This list, with a few changes to meet local conditions, may be duplicated by almost any housewife the continent across.

Canst thou, my lady, cut a big, slashing gash in the fierce dragons in thy way? Well—I think—so! Gird on thy sword of good, hard sense, and whenever a dragon pokes a greedy snout or talon over thy threshold, give him a valiant jab!

Mrs. Alice Roosevelt Longworth will receive a yearly income of $10,000 from the estate of her grandfather, George C. Lee, a Boston banker.

The Easter collection at Grace Episcopal church, New York, was $160,000. This is believed to be the largest collection ever made in a church.

THE little boy was a particularly little boy. I mean, of course, that his body was very small even for his few years. and as we see little or nothing of one another except our carefully clothed bodies, it is not strange that we mutually judge of our size by them; that is, we do this unless we are very well acquainted, indeed. Doubtless, too, this is best, for how it would embarrass some of us if we were to be judged in another way. Take, for instance, your papa's friend, Mr. Brown, the portly gentleman who visits at your house sometimes, and who wears such a handsome watchchain, and who talks about stocks; or take Miss Wheezle, the tall and stately lady who converses with your mamma about the latest fashions and says the minister's sermon last Sunday was "really sweet"—how do you suppose they would feel if, by some marvelous change, size in this world were to be judged by mind or soul? But, bless your hearts! they never think of such a thing, more than the rest of us do; and so we all are quite contented and cheerful.

It may as well be admitted, too, that, as his uncles and aunts said, the little boy was "such a strange child!" His Aunt Dora, who had five children of her own, all so precisely like the other human peas in the pod that if one had rolled out it would have been difficult to designate exactly which one it was—his Aunt Dora, I say, even went so far as to remark that he was "the strangest ever"; but this assertion perhaps should be considered a trifle emphatic, for Aunt Dora underscores the words of her speech very much as she does those of her letters.

But the little boy was strange; this must be conceded. For example, if you made to him an assertion based on an assertion your father had made to you, which was based on an assertion his father had made to him, which was based on an assertion his—but it is needless to carry the train of argument farther, for about this time the little boy would quite upset you by remarking, "Yes, but why—" or, "But doesn't it seem—" and then he would ask all sorts of embarrassing questions; that is questions of which unfortunately you had forgotten the answer. Of course, it should be remembered that he was too young to understand how much deeper than reason is faith and how absolute should be the confidence we place in the wisdom of our grandfathers. However, this has little to do with the story, except as it tends to indicate what manner of child was our small hero.

The little boy was a great reader, and all books, good, bad, or indifferent, that came to his small and sometimes grimy hands were absorbed by him with complete impartiality. So, much of his time he lived in the bright Country of Imagination, where are many wonderful things. Often his mother would say to him: "Now, little boy, you really must put your books away, go out, and play in the sunshine." Then he would put the books to one side, take his bow and arrows, and go to his cave, being, in fact, but a hollow in a great oak just within the edge of a wood; but he imagined that its dimensions were tremendous and its secrecy complete, and so, as his imagination was as large as his body was small, the "cave" did quite well for his purposes. He had drawn a dingy cloth across the hole so as to conceal it from observation, and he used to say to himself as he approached the "cave" and gave three distinct whistles to announce his coming to his faithful servitors, that no body would suspect that the Mysterious Lord of the Forest lived there; and, indeed, nobody would. You would be surprised could you know how often this retreat was attacked by wicked bandits and how frequently it was assailed by painted savages, but it was defended with great vigor and always came off with credit, and even glory, to itself and its redoubtable master.

The little boy went to school, and for some time he did not think much of his teachers. They were a trying lot, he felt; always asking questions concerning matters that were of no consequence and insisting on answers that were equally irrelevant to the real interests of a boy's life. His teachers said that he read with expression, but that they could not get him to take an interest in his other studies. His mother received this report with anxiety, and his Aunt Dora remarked that she always had said so, although no one could remember that she had.

THE LOVE OF A LAD

BY

The change in this condition of affairs took place after Miss Hattie joined the procession of the little boy's teachers, and by this time he had grown so large that he was almost ten years old. Other people might say that there were Miss Hatties and Miss Hatties, but after a few days the little boy knew very well that there was only one real Miss Hattie; the rest were mere imitations, who had, doubtless surreptitiously, secured a name of which they were all unworthy. The discovery of this transcendent fact first began to dawn upon him under inglorious circumstances. He had, with much care and a purloined piece of chalk, inscribed on the back of the boy who sat in front of him the highly ambiguous word "DUNSE." The only Miss Hattie discovered who was the perpetrator of the deed, and kept him after school. After they were quite alone she said to him:

"How do you think you would like to have some other boy write that word on your back?"

The little boy thought about it, and then he said that he didn't believe he would care, for the other fellows would know it was only a joke, anyway.

Then Miss Hattie talked to him, and she talked so kindly, and so appealed to the best that was in his childish heart, that the little boy said to himself that it was mighty curious about teachers. Then he looked at her somewhat timidly, or at least dubiously, and saw how kind was the glance from the great blue eyes that met his own. And from that starting point it was only natural that he should notice how lustrous was the curly brown hair and how pink were her cheeks, for even little boys must notice things, you know.

Now you who have forgotten the emotions that sway the heart of childhood may deem the idea absurd, but I am ready to avow my conviction, nay, my complete assurance, that then and there, and while that conversation still was in progress, the tender passion first began to stir and make itself felt in the brown corduroy breast of the little boy. Never had he been talked to so kindly save by his mother, and, of course, all things good are to be expected of mothers. A simple, boyish gratitude which stood ready to lose itself in admiring adoration awoke in his heart, and did not go to sleep again.

From that time he was Miss Hattie's faithful knight errant, to run her errands and heed her every suggestion; and it seemed to him, as he constantly improved in his studies, that her cheeks grew more pink, her wavy hair more lustrous, and her beautiful eyes more tenderly blue; that is, it would have seemed so had he not known that in the nature of the case such a thing must be impossible. He was very glad that she boarded just across the road from his father's house, for this gave him a perfectly natural opportunity to carry her books home nearly every night, thus imperfectly demonstrating his loving adoration.

About this time the little boy began to hate John with an intense, burning hatred. Who was John, anyway, the great, clumsy fellow? What right had he to be hanging about Neighbor Griscom's house, at which his teacher boarded, particularly in the evening? Miss Hattie was so kind that she tolerated his presence, of course, but his loutish attendance must be very annoying to her. After the little boy grew up he would whip John; he would teach him a much-needed respect for the sanctities of place and association. Oh, that he were grown up now! The little boy used to feel of the muscles of his arm and wish that they would develop faster. Strange that this odious John never noticed his look of undying hatred and scorn, but always greeted him with a cheery, "Hello, Twofer! How are we to-day?" Some time he should know how we were to-day! Should he—oh, thought to give pause to the beating of his heart!—should he tell Miss Hattie of the emotions with which he viewed her matchless charms, and ask her to wait for him to grow up? No; she might—it was hardly conceivable, but she might heedlessly laugh at him; and what were life then? Better to wait, and let her of her own accord observe his unwavering devotion. But that John! How tired of him she must get!

One night, after the little boy had been in bed and asleep a long time, an owl came and sat on the limb of the oak tree near his window and said, "Hoo-oo-o." Ordinarily this would not have waked him, but, for some reason, it did that night; and when the owl again said, "Hoo-oo-o," he thought he would get up and see where the bird was and what it was doing. So he crept out of bed and pattered to the window, reaching it just in time to see the owl fly away.

Now you must understand that by this time the little boy had grown so big that he was more than ten and one-half years old, and, of course, when a boy has attained that ripe age he knows a thing or two when he sees it. So it will not be considered surprising that when, as he stood at the window, he saw two men lurking in the shadow of Neighbor Griscom's house he knew that something was wrong. When he saw the first man he thought for a moment it might be John, who, he had noticed, had a most reprehensible habit of lingering about that house until late hours; but when he saw the second man he realized that the situation was even worse than he had suspected.

"They're burglars!" he whispered to himself. "I'll bet they're burglars, and I've got to do somethin' 'bout it. They'll scare Miss Hattie terrible."

Just what he would do, or could do, the little boy did not know, but he felt very certain that he must do something, and that immediately. So, merely stopping to shout, "Burglars! At Griscom's!" to his father, he ran across the road as fast as his little bare feet would carry him. The window at which he had seen the two men was open now, and one of the men had disappeared, while the other was two-thirds through the opening. The little boy did not hesitate an instant. With the yell, "Burglars! Burglars!" he threw himself upon the leg that still was without the window, caught it, and clung to it for dear life.

What followed never has been at all clear to the boy. He remembers that there were muttered curses from the man he held, a dark form that jumped from the window and ran past him, a rush of feet while he still valiantly held to the leg; then there seemed to come a crash of all things, and he was lost in a great darkness and knew no more.

When the world came back to him Miss Hattie was holding him in her arms, Mrs. Griscom was standing by his side with a basin of water in her hand, and his father and Neighbor Griscom were holding the ruffian who, as he afterward learned, had beaten him down with a most cruel blow. Even then he noticed that Miss Hattie's night-dress was very white and very pretty, and it seemed to him that, so robed, her cheeks were even pinker, her hair more wavy, and her eyes more tenderly blue than they were when she appeared in more conventional costume. But he dismissed this thought as soon as possible, feeling that to dwell upon a scene which must be embarrassing to her in the recollection was a species of treason and a departure from that high honor in which a chivalrous knight should hold his lady fair.

There was a time during which the little boy was very sick. The blow had been most brutal, and for days his life hung by an uncertain thread. Then the vitality of youth asserted itself, and he gradually found more and more secure footing on the goodly highway that leads to health. How his little romance, a very real romance if it was extremely infantile, grew in those days! For Miss Hattie came to see him every day; and such jellies as she brought to him! And such flowers! And she was so kind and loving! And sometimes she even kissed him—ah, how his small heart beat then! And she called him a hero! He almost made up his absurd little mind that the eventful hour had come. He would propose to her; he would let her know exactly how a fellow felt; he would assure her that her evident and faithful love would not be in vain if she would wait a decade or two for him. But—again the hateful thought—she might laugh at him. Ah, that "but"! His heart turned faint, and he did not propose.

Quite fanciful and impossible, is it? I tell you that there is many a baldheaded and supremely dignified father of a family who need turn but a few leaves in memory's book until he reaches a page whereon is written the story—oh, of course, my dear sir, a very absurd story—of a time when he, too, an awkward, shambling schoolboy, was tremendously in love with some sweet-faced, gentle-souled woman, anywhere from ten to twenty years his senior, whom, having smallest conception of the real meaning of marriage, he hoped to marry some day, if she would be good enough to wait for him; to whom he would have proposed such a blissful waiting but for an inexplicable fear of her laughter. Jones, Brown, Robinson, how is it? Honestly, now. Why should we hesitate before the confessions? What unfledged love in life is more beautiful?—no touch of grosser passion about it; wholly ideal, unselfish, and sincere.

With the little boy entirely recovered, it seems almost a pity not to terminate the story, but there is one incident so directly connected with it that it probably should not be omitted. It was in the long summer vacation, and the little boy now had grown so extremely big that he was nearly eleven years old. For several days he had seen little of Miss Hattie, who appeared to be very busy and preoccupied and kissed him only in an absent-minded way. He had noticed, however, that John was not hanging about Neighbor Griscom's house as much as usual, and was glad to feel that at last he was learning his place; it certainly was time!

On a certain day he had visited the Griggs boy, who lived quite at the other end of town, and when he returned his father and mother, dressed in their very best Sunday clothing, were crossing the road from Neighbor Griscom's. The little boy wondered why they were arrayed in their best, and so he asked them: "What you been doing?"

His mother smiled as she answered:

"We have been attending a wedding."

"Whose wedding?"

"Can't you guess?"

"No."

But a great fear had seized upon the heart of the little boy even before his mother replied: "Well, we attended the wedding of Miss Hattie and Mr. John."

The mother again smiled. How was she to know, how was she even to suspect that the iron had entered his soul? Without saying a word, he left the room, sought his little chamber, and there threw himself upon his bed. So this was woman's love! This was woman's constancy! This was all that her kisses meant! For his part, he never would love again. And that John, too! Well, the woman who could be content with such love never could have been worthy of his own. It had been a fortunate escape for him, he said. Ah, we are human and grapes are sour, even when we are but three feet high.

In an hour or two he was playing one-old-cat with two other boys. He would hide his crushed and broken heart; and, besides, he said to himself, what he had read in a particularly fascinating book, that it would be dishonorable to continue to love the wife of another. Fortunately the tragedies of youth do not strike deep, but they leave a mark on the lives we lead none the less on that account. His mother watched him for a time as he played, then turned to his father and said:

"What do you suppose made him act so queerly when I told him about the wedding?"

His father, who had forgotten a thing or two, responded:

"I can't guess."

And as the little boy never told to a soul the story of his first love, even Miss Hattie herself never having the slightest idea of the real state of the case, the reader must decide for himself, if he can, how I came to know so much about it.

AN UPRIGHT JUDGE.

How difficult it is not to write a satire! And how much more striking is such a satire when its author, quite different from Tacitus, is obviously utterly unconscious of having written one, his single-mindedness being everywhere apparent and yet forcing his reader to make comparisons which certainly are odious.

In Germany's leading weekly, whose editor is probably the greatest German journalist since Henri Heine put the stamp of his genius upon the meaning of the politics of Europe, a last farewell is said to a departed judge of the Hanseatic Court. Mind, not a court of one of the effete monarchies, but a court sitting in Hamburg, the proud, though little republic, one of the world's most important seaports, whose great merchants are merchants in the best sense of the word, men who have learned most willingly and have adopted our best American methods more readily than any other foreign city.

A judge has died and voice is given to the feelings of the members of the bar by one of them, thus:

"Only personal character, no more and no less, has power over men; and he was a man of so striking a personality, than no one was able to escape its influence. When the tall, spare figure of the judge appeared in court, there reigned in it the silence of a church, and when the finely moulded face turned towards the bar, his gray eyes, apparently cold, viewing the speaker, no other impression was left but that nothing would be more out of place than to assert before that man anything that was incorrect, or questionable or untenable; that under no circumstances one should risk a reprimand or even a slightly ironical inquiry.

"There was ample ground for such a fear; a barrister pleading in his court might have been ever so conversant with his case, Sieveking knew that case still better; the lawyer might believe to have considered every point of the law, yet the presiding jurist had found new and important ones. He had the case in hand and was a true ruler of men, a fact, which can not be explained solely by the tradition of his old Hanseatic family. To think of his mind as sovereign was quite natural; for there was none to whom he might be considered inferior and he himself knew no human power above him who bowed willingly and reverently to the divine one in his heart. With the whole domain of the law he was familiar; no part of general culture in the widest sense was foreign to him. His use of the English and French languages was faultless and, already past fifty, he began to learn Italian and constantly practised it to become proficient in the use of that language. Every presentation by experts of matters with which he was not familiar was followed by him with the intense interest of a man for whom to live is to learn. And when he asked them questions, his inquiries were marked by that foremost characteristic of the truly great, by modesty. With touching patience, never wearied, he might be observed examining children who were witnesses, explaining to them in their language the matter which they should think of and then asking them the pertinent question. It was touching to see how without any fear the children would look up at the man who spoke so kindly to them, how willingly they testified to what they had seen or heard. Never did witness nor expert know what that judge wanted him to state and any attempt on his part to feel his way in that direction was hopeless in the face of that inscrutable countenance. He was not the man to suffer from nervousness, that fundamental failing of so many judges of our time. It was simply inconceivable to think of Sieveking becoming nervous under even the most trying circumstances. For him nothing was unimportant or too minute; if in but one sense he considered a matter relevant, he insisted upon an exhaustive treatment. It is true, he would become indignant, but only when papers were presented to him which had been prepared carelessly; then there rose in him the dignity of the court offended. But otherwise, as ever and everywhere, he was the kind and considerate gentleman, who wished to help where he could and make matters better where he might. No hour of the day was too early for him, were he to procure a fellow-citizen's right; in court, or at his home, at a gathering of the family, or at a public banquet, never did he refuse to listen to an urgent request and give directions with wonted precision. When under so trying circumstances his pardon was asked for the trouble given him he would dismiss you with the most winning smile and leave you under the impression that he had merely performed his duty. The fact remains that he was a gentleman in the world's truest sense, a gentleman in his culture, his erudition and his action. He mastered things and, indeed, ruled men, but no one resented his superiority. So it was in his little state and so likewise abroad. At the international maritime conventions the delegates easily recognized the force of the man whose great powers were so charmingly coupled with genuine modesty. Firmly relying upon himself, not deviating a hair's breadth from the line steadily pointing to the ideal, of charming manners, and yet of a mental stature, which does, if necessary, reveal an inflexible virility. Sieveking thus embodied the ideal of a judge and a Hanseatic citizen. Our state has no garters and no titles to bestow; we can repay only by gratitude and reverence."

A few additional words may not be amiss. As a citizen of California and a lover of San Francisco, I cannot help being struck by the satire involved in the comparison of the reverent attitude of that German member of the bar toward the judge of his court with the attitude which the members of our bar, rightly or wrongly, assume toward many of our judges. Yet the fact remains that no real and lasting improvement of our body politic can be thought of, unless we begin to mend matters at the vital spot, the judges, and through them try to better the administration of the law. The present sad condition of the bar would doubtless be capable of speedier improvement when we shall have learned and independent judges. For there is no denying of the fact that at present the judges are practically dependent upon the lawyers for their nominations and that the course of law is influenced, more or less, by lawyers who practice before judges whom they do not consider their superiors and whom they treat in most cases with the outer form of respect and a tacit disrespect varying almost exactly as the ratio of their own annual income to the judge's limited and precarious salary.

The great profession of the law is not yet utterly degraded; we have sufficient material in our State to elevate men to its most important positions; we have men who may become the peers of the greatest and the best, if we but open a way and make it possible for them. The existing conditions make it impossible. Yet the people do want judges who can and will maintain the dignity of the commonwealth and in whose hands the safety of our institutions and of our liberties does not become a matter of doubt. The conditions under which an independent and efficient and therefore respected judiciary is possible, are well understood and must be considered axiomatic; ignoring them leads to results as dangerous as the neglect of the safety factor in the construction of a bridge.

Are there no men left among the real lawyers to lead the people of California to better things?

A MARK TWAIN STORY.

Arthur McEwen wrote the following account of Mark Twain's first newspaper experiences. The occasion of McEwen's article was the suspension of the Virginia City Enterprise, on which he and Mark Twain and C. C. Goodman and "Dan de Quille" all made their reputations in the early days:

An unknown nobody of a miner over at Aurora sent in items occasionally. He had humor in him, and Goodman offered him a salary to come over and assist Dan de Quille as a reporter. He came. It was Clemens—Mark Twain.

Than Goodman and Clemens no man could be more unlike outwardly. The first was handsome, gallant, self-reliant, but not self-conscious, vehement of speech and swift in action. (He called out the silver tongued Tom Fitch, then an editor, and shattered his knee with a pistol ball, for instance, in return for an unpleasant article that appeared in the course of a controversy.) Clemens was sloth like in movement, had an intolerable drawl, and punished those who offended him by long, drawn, sneering speech. But the two were alike at bottom in one thing—both were genuine and had the quality of brain that enables one man to understand another of opposite temperament and manner. They soon became friends.

Not many people liked Mark Twain, if one may judge by the tone of depreciation in which he is spoken of on the Comstock to this day. But go to any small place from which a celebrated man has sprung and the same phenomenon appears. It is the villager's way of impressing upon the stranger the villager's superior, intimate knowledge of the great man. They say that Mark was mean—that he would join in revels and not pay his share, and so on. Those who knew him well, who had the requisite intelligence to be more than surface companions, tell a different story. His salary was not large, and he sent a good part of it back to Missouri, where it was needed, instead of "spending it like a man" on his own pleasures. In brief, Mr. Clemens, while he enjoyed the rough and tumble, devil-may-care Comstock life, wasn't carried away by it. He knew there was a world outside. The first work that showed the stuff of which he was made was done on the Enterprise.

Mark, being a man of sense, never neglected his interests. The fact that to know a particular man might at some time be advantageous did not deter Mr. Clemens from making his acquaintance. He and the Episcopal clergyman became friends, and while the clergyman probably did not consider Sam Clemens a devout christian, at least he regarded him as a promising young man whose leanings were in the right direction. Now, the printers knew that to steal the shade of Mr. Clemens' lamp caused him to burn with a slow fury. So they stole it as often as they could for the pleasure of hearing him swear—an art in which he excelled. One evening at dusk he climbed to the deserted local room and found the shade gone. Thereupon he began to drag himself around in a leisurely but intense circle, as was his wont upon such occasions, uttering oaths and calling down heaven's vengeance on the purloiners. While thus breathing maledictions, he passed the door and beheld the Episcopal minister standing therein transfixed with horror.

Mark paused not in his slow walk, but had the grace to drawl out in low ferocity this (expurgated) excuse:

"I know you're shocked to hear me, Mr. Brown. It stands to reason you are. I know this ain't language fit for a Christian man to utter nor for a Christian man to hear, but if I could only lay my hands on the ——— who stole my shade, I'd show you what I'd do to him, for the benefit of printers to all time. You don't know printers, Mr. Brown; you don't know them. A Christian man like you naturally can't come in contact with them, but I give you my word they're the ——— that a body ever had anything to do with."

MARK TWAIN'S DEPARTURE.

(The Springfield Republican.)

A man of exceptional and profound humanity, lover of his kind, earnest in its best interests, serious in the guise of humor, that humor the most rich, the most varied, the most compelling, the most unexpected, as brilliant on its surface as it was deep in his heart,—such was Samuel Langhorne Clemens, whose death in his 75th year has taken place at his home in Redding, Ct. Although the great humorist, the great fun-maker, the great sympathizer, he had a life of vicissitudes and of great afflictions. Like many other humorists it had been his fate to gain from his losses, his deepest tragic experiences, that underlying philosophy which made him master of circumstances and one of the truest heroes we have known. The time has long gone by when Mark Twain could be passed by as merely a fun-maker. He made fun indeed; he made it to his last day; it was in his nature; he could no more avoid seeing the ludicrous aspect of situations, the comic element in his fellow-beings, the absurd contradictions of our nature, than he could escape seeing the deep moral issues which surrounded him, and in regard to which in his long life he was never on the wrong side.

Clemens was a man whose heart was a conscience, and his mind a fountain of inspiration. Take even his slightest things, his sketches for the Nevada paper, the things which first brought the attention to him, and while some are nothing but fun, amidst them gleams every now and then a perception that he is not trifling. Still it is as humorist that Mr. Clemens made his first impression, nor was he invariably a judge of the excellence of his work. That tendency to extravagance which showed in his reporter's description of a gigantic petrified man on a Nevada mountain betrayed him at times into singular and troublesome breaks which he did not often recognize. Some of these have caused trouble to his readers, a certain irreverence in "The Innocents Abroad" has worried many good souls, and such breaks happened in a good many of his public addresses, where he seemed least happy. He often wished when he sat down from an after-dinner speech that somebody had put a muzzle into his mouth. But these were but insignificant exceptions to the great body of his humorous writings considered in all lights. One of his latest books, "Capt. Stormfield's Visit to Heaven," illustrated how individually he had thought on such a large problem as the possible continuance of life. Considered aright there is nothing irreverent in that. His picture of heaven as apportioned among people of many affiliations and the vastness necessary to keep each in his proper sphere and in sympathy has been called irreverent, but regarded with care it will be seen to present a truer picture of the problems of the life beyond than is presented by many an orthodox imagination. He did not forget that human nature could not be changed by transposition.

Among his most interesting books are those of his youth on the Mississippi and in Missouri. "Tow Sawyer" and "Huckleberry Finn" are among the most vital figures in American literature. Many have called "Tom Sawyer" his greatest work. It is too large a designation, but the story shows his quick perception and his divination of a time and of figures which are now largely unknown, except through what he had written. "Tom Sawyer" may be considered an introduction to some of the most serious things he ever produced. Out of the same surroundings and experiences of the unformed West came his extraordinary novel of "Pudd'nhead Wilson." At the time that this story as appearing in Harper's Monthly, a novel on the subject of southern slavery was appearing in another magazine. It dealt with it in a fashion which gave by contrast an extraordinary force to Mark Twain's treatment of the subject. The tragic curse of slavery, the tragic impression it left on American life, was wonderfully portrayed in "Pudd'nhead Wilson," while the beautiful character whose name was given to the book is one of the most delightful of creations.

This novel was dramatized and its performance on our stage was made memorable by the admirable impersonation of Frank Mayo, who consulted Mr. Clemens in its preparation. Another of his books that was represented on the stage was "The Gilded Age," which he wrote together with the late Charles Dudley Warner. It is a severe satire upon American society, politics and business. Kate Field played the principal woman's character, but the book and play were less characteristic of Mark Twain than of Mr. Warner. It was written when they were neighbors in Hartford, and published by a subscription firm.

"The Prince and the Pauper" was also made into a play, and met with some success. This story is an admirable imagination of what might have happened to little King Edward VI of England if he had been lost and had exchanged places with a London boy whose extraordinary personal resemblance made the masquerade conceivable. In this story particularly the deep humanity of Clemens was the informing force. The boys, in their exchanged personalities, little Tom in the place of the prince, and Edward as Tom Canty, make the offset of classes a vivid thing, and the adventures of both show the England of the 16th century and the wrongs of the people, and by analogy it became a satire on our own times.

So also was "A Yankee at King Arthur's Court," which represents by a fantastic leap the introduction of modern ideas amidst the fabled knighthood and chivalry of the Round Table age. With much grotesquery, the teaching was unmistakable, moral and civilizing. Probably Mark Twain's most extraordinary writing in the way of imagination was his "Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc." Curiously enough, its publication was begun in a magazine as by an unknown author. The speculation as to who this unknown author was could scarcely have lasted for more than two numbers at the most. Mark Twain was a genius who could not conceal himself. When Sieur Louis, a squire in Joan's army, was manifestly talking broad American humor, and more than that, plain Mark Twain, the riddle was solved. But his "Joan of Arc" is the noblest treatment of that heroic figure ever made in literature outside of De Quincey. The heroism of the inspired girl was wonderfully set in the midst of the tumultuous soldiery, and the murderous animosity of the church and the English. The picture of the partisan La Hire is powerful for any writer. These three books are regarded by Mr. Howells as Mr. Clemens' masterpieces.

Among his later writings none stood out more strongly for its humor than the short story of "The Man Who Corrupted Hadleyburg." In that the humorist showed his powers at their ripe stage, and his genial wit in its richest vein. "The Million Pound Bank Note" was surely one of Clemens' most ingenious and successful skits. That a man with a million pounds in his pocket in the shape of a bank of England note should become the leading citizen of a town and have everything at his command, just because he could not possibly negotiate it, was one of those daring absurdities that only Mark Twain would have endeavored.

OUR SCHOOL FOR CITIZENSHIP

Party Government as It Is to Be

Party government as it is to be begins with party government as it is by recognizing the validity of county and state committee as constituted before the new direct primary law went into effect. Therefore the starting point for the new party government will be that of the county committee of each party in each county in the state meeting to determine of how many delegates the next county convention of each such party shall consist. Having settled this, the committee will determine the ratio between votes cast and delegates to compose the convention and apply this ratio to each precinct in such county. The custom is to allow anyhow one delegate from each precinct, no matter how few party votes may have been cast in such precinct, and then one delegate for each 40 or 50 votes cast.

When the committee has done this work, which must be done at least fifty days before the August primary is to be held, it must notify the county clerk of its action and the county clerk, when he makes up his ballot, must leave at the bottom of the last column on the ballot to be voted at the August primary as many blank spaces, to be defined by light lines or rules three-eighths of an inch apart, as there are delegates to be elected from that precinct, with instructions to "vote for one," or "vote for two," as the case may require. When the voter gets to the end of his ballot he will write in the names of the persons he wishes sent as delegates to the county convention of his party, or he may affix a "sticker" bearing the names, if anyone has been thoughtful enough to prepare one. So prone are voters to take the direction of least resistance that the mere fact of having prepared a sticker bearing names to be voted for as delegates may predetermine the complexion of the next county convention. This is an item that those who stand for good government ought not, and those who stand for spoils government will not, overlook.

The petition, or notification, filed with the county clerk, as above provided, must contain: the date and place of holding the convention, the number of delegates apportioned to each precinct, a brief statement of the purposes for which the convention is called, including the election of delegates to the state convention apportioned to that county by the state committee of that party, and the election of a county committee. The chairman and secretary of each county committee must mail a copy of this petition, or the substance of it, to each committeeman of that party in such county.

This notification to the county committeemen appears to be all the public notice required to be given of the holding of the county convention, but, inasmuch as it has been the immemorial custom for the chairman and secretary to publish the call for county conventions, it is probable that the custom will not be discontinued. Certainly it ought not to be, for the widest publicity should be given to the fact.

And, inasmuch as the law makes no provision for putting the names of candidates for delegates on the ballot by the filing of nomination papers, by petition or at all, it becomes all the more important to have the holding of the county convention thoroughly talked up beforehand, for, as explained last week, whoever controls the party machinery of the party in power controls the government, and the initial point of governmental control lies, therefore, in the naming of the delegates to county conventions.

Now there is nothing in being a delegate to a county convention except the loss of time, and the expense, unless somebody has either an ax to grind or a high purpose to subserve. The practical control of the machinery of party government of the Republican party in California has, for many years, vested in the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, and that bureau will wish to perpetuate that control under the new law. Many delegates to all state conventions held in the past were Southern Pacific employees, and the employees of that company are scattered all over the state. What more natural than that these employees should either suggest, and prepare stickers for, or find some friend of the company to suggest and prepare stickers for delegates to be sent to the county conventions? If this be done the rest will be easy. Control of the party machinery may still be in the hands of the "interests" under the direct primary as well as under the old convention system.

Of course party control will not mean quite as much under the new system as under the old. The naming of candidates for state and county offices will not be as easy, but in relation to appointments of Federal officers, judges, United States attorneys, etc., control of the state committee of the party in power will be tremendously important. That committee, or its officers, will speak in the name of the whole party of the state and the influence of such officers will be very strong, and strongly exerted, in bringing pressure on the President, United States Senators and Representatives in Congress, on behalf of aspirants for office under the Federal government.

Then, too, the relations which exist between the state committee and the several county committees and committeemen, even down to delegates to county conventions, are important. There are fifty-eight counties in the state. It is probable that the county conventions of the Republican party will average 100 delegates to the county. That means 5,800 influential citizens from about 2400 precincts, through whom the head of the state committee may exert a direct influence upon the whole party. It is easy to see how, with such leverage, it may become relatively easy for the influence in control of the party machinery to control the politics of the state.

And the issue all swings on the selection of delegates from each precinct to go to the county convention. Select the right kind of men, and the party government can hardly go wrong. Select the wrong kind of men, and party government can hardly go right.

Our lesson next week will be on the State Convention and State Committee.

As Needham Sees It

REPRESENTATIVE J. C. NEEDHAM is reported as saying: "Insurgency in its national aspect is rapidly becoming anti-Taft and anti-protection." That it is not anti-protection is proven by the tariff plank in the Indiana platform, the soundest expression of the American doctrine of protection that has been voiced in recent years. Whether or not this insurgency movement is anti-Taft depends upon Mr. Taft. He pitches his tent in whichever camp he chooses. Likewise may Mr. Needham.

After This One

THAT SPARRING MATCHES ARE NOT WORTH while, and that slugging matches are intolerable, is being conceded by all gradations of society above the riff-raff, but "please be reasonable and postpone shutting down the lid on it until after the Jeffries-Johnson Fourth of July celebration," is the plea, because "we deucedly want to see, don't you know, how that joust comes out."

All Their Fault

THE CONSERVATIVES IN THE UNITED STATES senate which, being interpreted, means the representatives of The Interests for The Interests, have served notice upon the insurgent members that if they do not cease trying to put Right Things, such as the government valuation of railroads, into the Wickersham railroad bill, and stop trying to knock out of the bill such Wrong Things as an authorized centralized ownership of competing roads, and a combination for rate-making, in advance of approval by the Interstate Commerce Commission, they, the conservatives, will kill the whole bill, and it will all be the fault of the insurgents. Perhaps the American Public will look at the issue in that light and perhaps; again, it will have better sense.

Since When?

I APPOINTED YOU," wrote Mayor McCarthy to H. P. Flannery, "because of your high standing in this community, your unquestioned integrity and your pronounced ability in the mercantile world." Since when, your Honor, has the keeping of a "gargle-shop" come to be rated as a "mercantile pursuit," and success in it to be looked upon as entitling one to "stand high" in any community? The moral standards of San Francisco's mayor would be a reproach to a frontier cattle market.

The Right Way

SAN FRANCISCO HAS GONE ABOUT THE PANAMA-Pacific exposition proposition in the right way. Our representatives go to Washington with something tangible in their hands and with public sentiment behind them. They have the right to meet the government face to face and congress man to man. There will be no occasion to intensify atmospheric conditions at Washington with much talk. This is the place to hold the exposition. San Francisco will make a success of it and, unless there is a frame-up against San Francisco, which is unlikely, our representatives will come back bringing the prize with them.

Why Conservative?

WHAT DO THE REPUBLICAN "REGULARS," the "standpatters," in congress, mean to imply when they take to themselves the term "conservatives?" Do they mean to suggest that there is in congress a faction of radical Republicans who would, if they could, lead the party and the nation into untrod wilds of legislation, into socialistic experiments, monetary hazards, ill-considered reform measures? No! conservatism implies nothing of the sort, for nothing of the sort is talked of or contemplated. As hospital folk are wont to indicate, the most unspeakable personal filthiness as being "untidy," so the Republican "regulars" use the term "conservative" as implying slavish obedience to the huckstering methods of Aldrich in the senate and Cannon in the house. The aroma the word yields when used by that ilk is distinctly "untidy."

Blind Pigs

THE CRUSADE WHICH THE ROYAL ARCH, in California, is inaugurating against the "blind pig," lacks much of taking on the character of a great moral enthusiasm. It is not so much that little joints exist here and there where liquors are sold without first taking out a license of which the public complains, as that bad men are licensed to sell in a needless multitude of places, at all hours of day and night, on all days from the birth of the new year to the death of the old. San Francisco is not so much suffering from the running of a few unlicensed deadfalls here and there, although all such should be closed, as from an excess of at least 2,000 deadfalls that are licensed. A thousand picked places for selling liquor, confided to the care of a thousand carefully selected men, would adequately meet the bibulous requirements of this city. Will the Royal Arch address itself to this problem? It would be something like.

The Master Builder of California

MANY REFORMERS ARE DESTRUCTIVE rather than constructive. They would tear down, leaving the wreckage for others to clear away and the constructive work for others to build. Not so the insurgency of eastern Republicanism and of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League. In the place of bosses they would set up leaders; in the place of programs they would outline policies; in the place of railroads dominating our political life they would rejuvenate political parties, representatively constructed, and directly commissioned by the voters belonging to those parties; in place of political machines they would organize and energize a prepotent public sentiment and make it effective. In this work of constructive reform Hiram W. Johnson is our Master Builder of California.

Who Furnished the Cash?

FORMER SENATOR BILLY MASON of Illinois is reported to have said that half the seats in the United States senate have been obtained by purchase. There is little reason to doubt it. Senator Billy ought to know. Senator Lorimer evidently does. But who finances the buying? Have the common people of any commonwealth clubbed together and bought a seat in the senate that their interests might be looked after? Have the farmers of any state or any union labor organization, financed such an enterprise in their selfish interests? On the contrary, what transcontinental railroad does not own one or more seats in the senate that an official valuation of railroads may not be had? What trust or monopoly, combine or syndicate of feudal barons has not "chipped in" to a "jackpot" for the joint ownership of one or more "conservative," senatorial gray wolves? All our public villiany hath a common and a never failing origin!

It is The Cinch

That the cost of living, especially in this country, is increasing out of all proportion to increase in wages, salaries, interest and the business opportunities of the many, is a stern, pitiless, obtrusive fact. We have a right to know why it is so, and if we do not make the most of that right we are less than just to ourselves.

Professor J. Laurence Laughlin, than whom there is perhaps no one in this country better qualified to speak, writing for the May Scribner, affirms this to be true in relation to gold: The value of gold is dependent, first, upon the ratio that exists between the world's annual production and its accumulated stock, and not alone upon increase or decrease of production in any one year, and, second, upon the ratio of the world's demand for gold to its total supply. These propositions appear to be reasonable and probably are sound.

From 1851 to 1875 the world's stock of gold doubled and prices rose somewhat, but inasmuch as the demand for gold also increased greatly, the rise in prices was not excessive.

From 1876 to 1895 the world's stock of gold increased 43 per cent, yet prices fell continuously, for the reason that the demand for gold, resulting from its becoming the world's single standard of values, enormously increased.

From 1895 to 1905 the world's stock of gold increased 35 per cent and prices, in this country, have risen, that is, retail prices have risen, and it is the retail price that concerns the ultimate consumer.

We have been assured that the increase in the cost of living is a world-wide malady. This does not appear to be so. Tables of the London Economist, and Sauerbeck's tables, show that from 1890 to 1908 there has been practically no increase in wholesale prices in London and, in this country, both Bradstreet's agency and the United States Bureau of Labor show that on a list of 203 articles the increase in the wholesale price from 1890 to 1908 averaged only 9 per cent, although there has been great diversity among the different articles making up the list. Thirty-six of these articles fell in price during this period and two remained stationary. The remainder increased in price much in the proportion that dealers in them have been able to combine behind a high tariff wall to put up prices.

Farm products have generally risen, partly because they were unprofitably low in the 90's, partly because of an increased world demand for those products and partly because of The Cinch which combinations of dealers and manufacturers have been able to apply to consumers. On most of these commodities the price at which the retail dealer must sell is fixed for him by the manufacturer or wholesaler, the miller or the packing house, and, inasmuch as his margin is made liberal, he is not averse to the arrangement. The results have been a tremendous increase in the number of groceries, fifteen-cent buying on the part of consumers of factory made foods has become the rule, the art of house-wifery of other days has been lost and hand-to-mouth living, that bodes no good for the future of the American middle and working classes, appears to have come to stay.

Finally, the prices of dutiable products, whether produced at home or abroad, are increased an average of 40 per cent by our excessively protective tariff. Before combination for the elimination of competition between producers, sheltered behind the tariff wall, became a science increase in cost to the consumer was not measured by the tariff duty. Now it is so measured in all commodities in whose production there is a combination. If we had free competition within the tariff wall it would matter little how high that wall be raised, but, as we have not competition, the height of that wall becomes vitally important.

When it comes to pass, as it now has, that an American, having an income aside from his earnings, can go to Paris or London and live on food produced in America for substantially one-half of what it would cost him to live in New York or Boston, though eating the same foods, it is time for the consuming American mass to rise in wrath and smite The Cinch hip and thigh.

On Sober Second Thought

The killing of young McCarthy by a blow from the fist of young Moran was an accident. Moran did not intend to kill his opponent. He only intended to knock him down so that he would stay down. Mr. James Jeffries has no present intention of killing Mr. Jack Johnson, and Mr. Jack Johnson has no present intention of terminating the earthly existence of Mr. James Jeffries. Each gentleman merely intends, if opportunity offers, and he finds himself possessed of the requisite prowess, to knock the other down so that he will stay down, have to be helped to his feet and carried to his room. If a job is made for the undertaker that will merely be another accident for which all hands will be properly sorry. Such accidents are liable to happen in amusements of that form. But, on sober second thought, that is not the issue at bar. Any man who finds no higher purpose in living than that of being a prizefighter were as well dead as living. Society loses nothing in his taking-off. Any father who has no ambition for his son other than that he may become a successful "pug" is deservedly punished when he follows the remains of that son to the cemetery. The real question before the public is, what is the effect of such encounters, so advertised, financed, hippodromed, "played-up," and "pulled-off," upon the morals of city, state, nation and world? What kind of ideals of manhood does it cause the rising generation to form? Next to having unconvicted felons feted and fellowshipped, running at large, is it not about the most demoralizing thing that can happen? If so, then stop it and stop it before it starts. That fight between Jeffries and Johnson is either going to be a slugging match or a fake. Common expectation is proof in plenty. The only other way to tell is to wait until the fight is over and then it will be everlastingly too late to stop it. Such killings as take place, now and again, in the prize ring are negligible. Society is little over because of them and nothing in, whoever whips.

A Statement of Fact

Satan and his accessories are iterating and reiterating that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican Leaguers are combining with the Democrats for the defeat of all Republican candidates for office whom the Leaguers do not succeed in nominating. It is not so. And yet there will be more free voting across party boundaries this year of grace than ever before.

Good citizens are going to vote for the best men they can find up for office in whatever party they find them, and bad citizens are going to vote for the worst men they can find up for office wherever they can find them. There are broader and more fundamental differences within each of the parties than between the two parties, and there should be a new alignment of parties to correspond. Perhaps there may be, but until there is whatever combinations are effected will be effected spontaneously, when the time comes, by each voter voting as he thinks he ought to without trading or trafficking or pre-arranging. Meantime, the only salvation for either party lies in nominating its best men for office. It ought always so to be.

Whom Do You Want For President?

Do you realize, Mr. Voter, that the August primary, 1910, is to afford you your last chance to say whom you prefer to head the national ticket of your party in 1912? Such is the fact. On the 16th of August you will elect delegates to a county convention that will be held within two weeks thereafter, and you will not again elect delegates to a county convention until August, 1912, before which time the national convention of your party will have been held and your party candidates will have been nominated. The delegates whom you elect this August, to constitute your county convention, will be the delegates who will constitute the county convention to be held in April or May, 1912, for the purpose of electing delegates to the state convention of your party, which convention will elect delegates to your national convention. Under the direct primary law the county convention chosen this year will be reconvened for that purpose in April or May, 1912. Perhaps the law should have made different provision for that convention. Two years from now men may have very different views in regard to presidential candidates from those they now entertain, if they now entertain any views at all, but they will not then be able to make their views effective at the polls. Their only recourse, then, will be to reason with delegates elected this year. For this reason the greatest care should be taken this year in selecting delegates to county conventions. Such delegates are, so to speak, to double business bound.

Natural Law in the Railroad World

Our "backbone" article for the week has to do with the natural law of rate-making, a subject not without interest to California, a state that consumes so small a part of some of its commodities, and so much more than the whole of others, as to make its every industry dependent upon transportation rates.

But there are two natural laws of rate-making, only one of which our correspondent has considered. One has been followed hitherto, the other eventually will have to be followed; one consists in clapping on the stiffest rate that any article of commerce will stand without being driven from the market, the other in the application of the principle of a reasonable recompense for service rendered, distance, grade, cost of construction and operation in each case being considered. The one is the natural law of an unforeseeing greed, the other that natural law of trade which will ultimately vindicate its right to rule and will ordain that mountain ranges shall not be treated as though they did not exist, that distance shall not be annihilated and that no port shall have the advantages of being a port unless it is a port with a developed water carrying commerce.

The cupidities of men, corporations and cities may, and do, make shift to hinder, if not neutralize, the higher law of rate-making, but cannot for always. The time will come when a city sitting on the verge of deep water will enjoy the full advantage of its situation because it will be forced to utilize that advantage, and if it does not it will derive little benefit from its situation, as it should not. The day will come when merchandize will not be fetched through Fresno or Reno to San Francisco, either constructively or destructively, to be constructively and destructively carried back again at local rates. The natural law of rate-making will attend to that, very likely, with the opening of the Panama canal.

When this natural law of rate-making shall vindicate its power to rule, non-perishing commodities, destined for distant markets, will take the shortest, quickest, easiest direction to the sea, to be there massed in shiploads and carried in bulk to the port easiest reached from the interior point to which such goods have been shipped. Unless time be the essence of the contract little will be transported on wheels that can be transported by water, and for the reason that there is greater friction and more dead weight by wheels, in proportion to bulk, than by water. It would be so now but for The Cinch, but The Cinch will not always be tolerated.

This paper looks for a revolution in commerce and industry to follow the opening of the Panama canal. The only influence that can defer it after that is government by railroads for railroads. That government now closes the port of San Francisco to commerce to and from the interior of our own country, and then strives partially to make up for it by cinching the interior on every pound of merchandise that comes and goes. The whole system is artificial, unjust and intolerable, and it will disappear when government of the people has been resumed by the people. Excess in carrying charges, like excess in tariff protection, mulcts commerce and industry, raises the cost of production and of living and lowers the standard of living and the purchasing power of a people. It is oppressive and tyrannous and not to be endured by any free people.

If the merchants of San Francisco had lifted their voices and put forth their strength for the establishment of a government line of steamers between Seattle and Panama they could have obtained it. But that would be socialistic! Socialism consists in abolishing competition, and it is a bad thing, but shall the transcontinental railroads practice socialism to the hurt of San Francisco, and other cities, and these cities not avail themselves of the same weapon to be used in their own defense?

It will be a great day for San Francisco and the bay cities when the long and short haul clause of the interstate commerce law is enforced to the letter—provided that meantime the Panama canal is thrown open so that there may be one revolution in transportation and not two. What ships shall we not see then in our great harbor! What trains rolling out loaded with merchandize for interior points! The natural law of rate-making will then have such a vindication that no one will dare to question its authority.

What Shall We Do To Detweiler?

To Attorney-General U. S. Webb, greeting:

Your attention is respectfully called to the fact that one A. K. Detweiler, indicted for bribery in the interests of the Home Telephone Company, and a fugitive from justice for more than three years, has returned to San Francisco, full of smiles and good cheer, claiming that he has been in retirement solely on account of ill health, an excuse that may do for higher-ups but not for grown-ups. He surrendered to the sheriff and, without smelling jail, gave bonds for his appearance and has joined the colony of unconvicted felons who daily parade our streets unblushing, haunt our social gatherings unabashed, to flaunt decency everywhere as vice flaunts virtue throughout Mayor McCarthy's enlarged tenderloin.

It must be as obvious to you, General Webb, as to the general public, that Detweiler's return was predicated upon the seemingly safe conclusion that the government of San Francisco is now in the hands of its crime-compounding element, and that any prosecution instituted against Detweiler, or any other of the higher-ups, will be a perfunctory proceeding performed with the likelihood of terminating in applying whitewash to very black objects or, if the court will permit, in the dismissal of proceedings for an alleged insufficiency of evidence to produce conviction.

Why not fool the gentleman, General Webb? Why not step in, as we understand that the law gives you power to do when you have reason to doubt the sincerity or efficiency of the prosecution in any case of felony, assume control of the prosecutions of these criminals, sift the evidence and then take such action as, in your judgment, the facts warrant you in taking?

If you can do no more, at least you can force these defendants severally to take the witness stand, in one case or another, and there either speak the truth and shame the devil or avail themselves of their constitutional privilege of swearing that, if they were to tell the truth, the truth would incriminate them. That would be tantamount to a plain, public confession of their guilt, and it would be at least a partial vindication of public decency to have these chesty, high-headed malefactors well branded before they go hence without day, even if the law must stop short of making them wear stripes. That would aid in restoring to the minds of many San Franciscans that power of discriminating betwixt evil and good of which they have been so long and so unfortunately deprived.

In conducting these cases you will be no such storm center as was Francis J. Heney. The bitterness of conflict will not so divide citizen from citizen or so blind the public vision as to militate against your securing a jury of fair minded men. The public mind has calmed and the fires of hate have cooled. San Francisco has had a chance to come to its better self, and this paper believes that your efforts to establish justice would be steadily and helpfully sustained.

If nothing can, indeed, be done to vindicate the law, in cases such as these where guilt is scarcely so much as denied; if successful rascality has only to make a plentiful use of ill-gotten wealth in order to go unwhipped of justice; if, after full investigation, you find such to be the fact, the public will accept you at your word, dismiss you from all responsibility for failure, give you your full meed of praise for having done your best, and turn itself sadly but with determination to find some other means for vindicating decency, preventing the debauching of the minds of the youth and corrupting the hearts of a populace. But for the restraining words of Hiram Johnson and others on the night following the day that the bullet of Haas laid Heney low, an indignant city would have applied such a remedy as would have kept this sneaking Detweiler in hiding to the end of his days.

If civilized society is to endure it must find a way to protect itself from the depredations and debaucheries of a proud and opulent rascality. We wish to see the machinery of the law exhaust its every resource that the minds of men may not, without full justification, turn to more summary and more certainly efficacious methods of coming up with such an evil. If needful witnesses may be bought off and sent abroad to live luxuriously while justice waits unattended, if the saloon and the tenderloin may be hired to elect incompetents as prosecutors, if the arm of the law may be paralyzed with cash, let us know it, but let us exhaust every recourse before we admit the inevitability of the defeat of orderly justice at the hands of corrupt wealth, for, out of failure, grows that which is dangerous.

The Deeper Significance : : : : of Living : : : :

Do you earn your own living or only make it? There is a difference. The issue is one that deserves to be looked into.

There is but one kind of employment in this world that is justifiable, and that is service. It is no small task to take care of a world full of people, feed them, clothe them, house them, fetch and carry them whither they want to go, preserve their health, minister to their spiritual needs, educate them, settle the difficulties which must needs arise among them, organize them industrially, capitalize their activities, amuse them, relieve their poverty, augment their wealth. The real needs of such a world are so many and so exacting that it keeps the whole world busy, something doing every minute.

The doing of all these needful things, and a thousand others, comes under the classification of service, and there is only one kind of justifiable service and that is useful service, a service that yields a benefit and not an injury, a service that enhances the wealth or well-being, the pleasure or comfort, of some of God's creatures.

The problem of the unemployed world has always with it. The problem of the overworked is making constant demands on legislation. Sweatshops wring the heart of the world, but when economists shall take up the subject of mal-employment, that employment that leaves the world no richer, that employment that does for one what he ought to do for himself, the wasteful showing will stagger the minds of men.

Again we ask, are you earning your own living or only making it? Men invest their money in lands or town lots and then wait for the growth of population to make their investments valuable. A great deal of money is made that way, although a great deal more is lost, but it is rarely that a dollar is earned by any such method. No service is performed. On the contrary, by emphasizing the speculative instinct, the future is discounted for half a lifetime and men are made to carry a burden of over-investment for twenty or thirty years before any real need justifies it.

Or men gather inside information in relation to the acreage planted to cotton or to corn. They work hard early and late, sharpen their wits to a razor edge and then gamble on whether the price will go up or go down. They may make a great deal of money or lose all they have, but when they are dead they will not have to their credit a yard of muslin for clothing human kind or a bushel of corn for feeding man or beast. Though he be a Patton, such a man is a parasite and goes out of the world indebted to it for the bread he has eaten, the clothing he has worn, the lodging he has enjoyed, and faith in the justice of Jehovah persuades us that somewhere, sometime, that account will have to be squared, that the human parasite will have to work overtime in making good that which he had during life and did not pay for in useful service to his kind.

What the final social order in this world is to be the wisest cannot now say with any certainty. It may be Christian Socialism, or a Christian Individualism. The writer of this inclines to the latter opinion, but whatever it is to be it must have the Christ spirit at the foundation of it or it will be intolerable to many and unjust to all.

Now the very essence of the spirit of the Christ is service, useful service. The idle poor and the idle rich are heavy burdens for the industrious to carry, the latter as heavy as the former, in fact, a great deal heavier, for the idle rich require a great deal of personal ministrations that the idle poor dispense with. It is not that interest is wrong and income unjust, but only that, no matter how great one's income from his investments may be, he is not thereby relieved from the obligation of rendering so much of service as will compensate society for the service rendered him.

Do you earn your own living or only make it?

WHAT THE WORLD IS DOING

The Development of an Aviator

The leaps and bounds by which man recently has progressed in the art of flying probably nowhere else is so strikingly illustrated as in the case of Louis Paulhan, the Frenchman who not long ago was in Los Angeles and San Francisco. Last week Paulhan won a prize of $50,000 by flying from London to Manchester, a distance of 186 miles, with only one stop, and to-day doubtless he heads the list of the practical aviators of the world. Yet it was less than ten months ago, at Douai, France, that he made his first flight, covering one and one-fourth miles. That his is a veritable genius of aviation was demonstrated but five days later, when he remained in the air an hour, 17 minutes and 5 seconds. From this time his triumphs crowded closely one upon another. On August 25, 1909, a month and a half after his first flight, he flew 83¼ miles at Rheims in 2 hours, 43 minutes, 24 4-5 seconds, but later, in England, broke this record by flying 96 miles in 2 hours, 49 minutes and 20 seconds. In January, 1910, he came to this country, and on the twelfth of that month, as Californians need not be told, made the highest record ever made in an aeroplane, attaining a height of 4,165 feet. On April 18, in France, he made a world's record cross-country flight by flying from Orleans to Arois-sur-Aube, a distance of 118 miles, in 3 hours and 30 minutes. And now the London to Manchester ride. And all in less than ten months! Verily, there is a genius for aviation, as for other things, and Paulhan is its possessor.

Boy Scouts Invading America

The organization of Boy Scouts, the existence of which in England owes its conception to General Baden-Powell, is invading America; only, in this country the organization will be composed of American, rather than British, boy scouts. Already Springfield, Mass., has such a body; Syracuse, N. Y., soon will have one, and other American cities will not be far behind. That such organizations will prove beneficial in developing manhood in our boys perhaps will be demonstrated by the following brief sketch of their characteristics. The boys are taken about the age of ten years, and are organized into patrols. For the first month after joining they are "tenderfeet," and must devote themselves to securing the knowledge requisite to being admitted to the second-class scouts. To do this they must possess an elementary knowledge of first aid to the wounded, must know the Morse alphabet so they can signal by it, and must be able, after looking a minute in each of four store windows, to give a fairly accurate inventory of the contents of each. To be promoted to the first-class scouts a boy must be able to carry verbal messages accurately, to compute heights and distance by sight with not more than 25 per cent of error, and to run a mile in 12 minutes. Then there are special first-class badges which are given for special knowledge in the lines they cover. These, however, are but some of the physical and mental requirements, and best and most hopeful of all is the fact that the boy is put upon honor, and pledged that "I will do my best to do my duty," and the boys themselves are the enforcers of this high code. It is a movement that, for the welfare of the boys, should grow, and doubtless it will.

The Biggest Farm in the World

The largest farm in the world is situated in the state of Chihuahua, Mexico, and is the property of Don Luis Terrazas. From east to west it measures 200 miles and from north to south 150 miles, and it covers 8,000,000 acres, or 12,000 square miles of land. A neat little farm, it will be observed, but we will appreciate its size better by comparison. It would make a state of Maryland, nearly ten Rhode Islands, six Delawares, or well toward a Massachusetts and Connecticut combined. There are several other states which this Mexican farm outclasses in size, but the foregoing will suffice. On this farm the Don employs 10,000 men—to say nothing of the women and children—any one of whom, it is said, would fight for him to the bitter end, which is more than could truthfully be said of some employers on this side of the line. The "farmhouse" cost $1,600,000, and is furnished accordingly, with rooms for 500 guests. In the farm slaughter-house and packing-plant, last year, 200,000 head of cattle and 150,000 of sheep were dressed and packed, while 600,000 tons of hay were stacked and 200,000 bushels of grain were harvested. From this principality 10,000 men and their families make a living of some sort, while one man grows mighty in inestimable wealth—a fact of which Single Taxers might make a note. It is reported that Diaz himself begins to look with suspicion on the power of Don Luis.

Increase of Women Workers in Germany

In the past, in Germany, the work of women was generally confined to two lines, house-keeping and farm labor. Now, however, in common with the women of other countries, they have gone into a wider field of labor, and there is scarcely a vocation which does not number them among its followers. The statistics relating to this change are significant. From 1895 to 1907 the number of women employed in various vocations theretofore largely given up to men increased 57 per cent, but in the same time the number of men thus employed decreased 20 per cent. As there has been no decrease in either the population or industries of Germany, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that the decrease in the number of men employees was due to the fact that their places have been taken by women, which is all right if the women are carefully providing for the men who have been thrown out of employment. Doubtless this increase in the employment of women is general throughout the civilized world to-day, but in one respect that in Germany differs notably from the increase in the United States. Here women rarely turn to farm labor; there, in 1907, 4,500,000 women worked on farms, as against 2,750,000 in 1895, an increase of 64 per cent. In other industries the increase has been but 38 per cent, so it is evident that the German women must have a leaning toward the simple life as exemplified on the farm.

Don't Work When You Are Tired

Now comes a distinguished London physician and urges that brain-toilers should perform no physical labor after their day's work is done. Listen to what he has to say about it: "The root reason is that though head work is not exercise in the sense that it develops the body, it most decidedly is exercise in that it quickly induces fatigue and physical lassitude. So it is almost pathetic for a man to expect any good to come from taking more exercise when the exercise involved in the day's work has already tired him out." Therefore, says this good physician, ride home instead of walking, and when you get home don't let your wife cajole you, by any specious plea, into physical labor—it is likely to injure you seriously if you do. The profundity of this advice, its sagacity, its hard common-sense, will commend it to many men who heretofore have not known how to escape hoeing in the garden and doing other disagreeable labor. Such men, and their name is legion, should cut out the doctor's words and paste them in their hats, where they may do them splendid service in some hour of their bitter need.

Our Foreign Trade in Automobiles

For every dollar's worth of automobile that comes into the United States two dollars' worth goes out. That is, our exports in this line just about double the imports in value. At the present time we are annually selling, in round numbers, motor cars valued at $8,000,000 in foreign countries, and we buy from them to the value of $4,000,000. Our exports are to practically every country in the world, although the greater number go to Canada, Great Britain, Mexico and Australia.

COSSIP OF CURRENT LITERATURE AND REPRINTS OF OLD FAVORITES

MARK TWAIN'S CRITICS

With hardly an exception, every critic of books has used Mark Twain's departure as the occasion for an estimate of his works. Again with few exceptions, every one has announced, with some degree of positive assurance, which is his greatest book and which of his books will stand the attrition of time and remain in the permanent body of literature.

The result is a curious and unconscious reversal of positions. Read a few dozens of these opinions, as we have done, and you will observe that they are not so much noteworthy critical judgments of Mark Twain as they are self-revelations of the critics. It is not Mark Twain, but the critics, who are unconsciously at the bar. His works undeniably are very uneven, they clearly reveal the progress of his own development and decline. They are thus a scale of literary values. What each critic has done is simply to mark his own degree of development by announcing which of Mark Twain's books he values highest.

Inevitably, in discussing these criticisms in this way we also put ourselves on record. But we note with uneasiness that the so-called best critics of the day set the greatest store by the "Joan of Arc" and "Pud'nhead Wilson" and "Connecticut Yankee." This seems to us a sad and retrogressive judgment. Mark Twain's genius, in our eyes, lay peculiarly in the superb unconventionality of his vision. This unconventionality is at its highest—so we think—in "Tom Sawyer" and "Huck Finn." Here, if ever, the American spirit spoke, in Homeric freedom and power. To our view, "The Connecticut Yankee" and "Pud'nhead Wilson" and "Joan of Arc" are Mark Twain after his prime, after his original clear thought had been muddled by contact with the conventionalities of literary form and his freshness of impression dimmed by the smoke of the student's lamp. These books may be more after the accepted models of the past: to our mind that is their greatest drawback. In "Huck Finn," Mark Twain blazed a new trail, opened a fallow field, saw and wrote the truth naked and unabashed. That was original and truly great achievement. "Joan of Arc" is successful imitation of older style.

As we have said, the critics who favor these more conventional works are the New England and New York conservatives of letters. As one reads papers westward bound, the earlier works grow in favor with the critics, with the choice vacillating between "Tom Sawyer," "Huck Finn" and "Innocents Abroad." A few favor "Eve's Diary," fewer still his first success, "The Jumping Frog."

This variety of tastes amongst critics illustrates, also, the futility of literary criticism as a censor of books. It suggests, with renewed force, the propriety of a change of attitude upon the part of critics toward the works they review. Nearly every critic pretends to put a critical valuation upon every new book and every new author. Nothing could be more impertinent or absurd. The whole body of critics now living could not conceivably pass a judgment upon a book or writer that would be worth the paper it is written on. Where critics have hit off the judgment of time it has been by sheer chance.

What critics could do, to the exclusion of other things, is to say whether or not a certain book is interesting, and tell what the book is about. The first is useful as a hint to the prospective reader, and is worth whatever the critics' reputation for openness of mind and good taste is worth. The second is useful as a guide to the prospective reader, insofar as he knows what subjects are likely, or not, to interest him. But the idea that the critic's judgment has the slightest effect upon the permanent rank of a book in literature is too absurd, yet many critics persist in maintaining it.

Perhaps, though, the critics are not to blame. We observe that many readers want to be told that a certain writer is great, greater, or greatest. They lack a certain resolution of intelligence and lean gladly on other and more vertebrate minds.

BERNHARDT

Shortly before the first of the year the proposal that Mme. Sarah Bernhardt be enrolled in the Legion of Honor was again in revival in Paris. Her name, however, did not appear in the January lists of honors. The petition to the president asking that the ribbon be given her received the signatures of many of the most noted persons in France, among others Edmond Rostand, who speaks of her as "a woman of genius, the greatest artist of the century, the most brilliant torch of poesy, the most dazzling figure of energy and beauty."

MASTER MEADOWLARK

By Charles Phillips

[SACRAMENTO, March 4. B. A. date of 17:12 the Senate to-night refused passage to the bill designed to enable ranchers to exterminate the meadowlark. News Note.]

Ah! I have heard you again, Master Meadowlark,

Making your old wild, sweet music for me,
Filling the fields, all adream under Heaven's ark.

Full of your prodigal pure melody!
Spilled from your golden throat,
O, how that olden note
Breaks like a sunbeam made audible, tuneful!
Crystal and winey-clear,
Merry and full of cheer,
Pulsant with summer—ecstatically June-fun!

Ah, yes! I hear you again, Master Meadowlark,
Singing and bringing old home-joys to me;
But there's a cold word, a doom and a shadow dark,
Chilling the bright skies that ring with your glee!

Men in their Senate say
You, sweet bird, cannot stay;
Death is decreed, merry minstrel marauder!
Aye! there's a tear for you,
Little of cheer for you,
Singer of glee-songs, you sorrow-defrauder!

Ah, yes! I hear you again, Master Meadowlark—
You're the gay heart that made grief fly away;
Joy did you give me from dawn until bed-o'-dark,
When these fair alien skies cold seemed and gray.

Yours the first old-fashioned,
Home voice, all love-passioned,
Yours the first welcome to lands stranger and new;
Well do I love you,
As yon skies above you,
Singing of old scenes and hearts that are true.

Ah, yes! I hear you again, modest Meadowlark,
Sweet in the morning and all the day long!
Pleb'ian they call you—yet dreams, in the dead-o'-dark,

Wake me in Heav'n to the trill of your song.
You are no kin, they claim,
To that sweet bird whose fame
Poets of old wrote on Heaven's high gate;
But better still, my dear,
You bring to earth the cheer
Heaven would give to our lowly estate.

Ah, yes! I hear you again, Master Meadowlark,
Singing and winging from morning till noon!
What is that new note I hear—all the heavens hark—
Joyously thrilling with promise of June?

Men still have hearts, my bird!
Sing them the songs they heard,
Wild bird of Memory, when they were boys!
Sing of the furrowed field!
Plowman and Senate yield
Gladly, O prophet of Heavenly joys!

SHAKESPEARE IN GERMANY

The London Chronicle declares that the English are behind the Germans in their admiration of Shakespeare, and cites the following facts to prove the statement:

The Germans, as a nation, worship Shakespeare. They regard him as the greatest dramatic genius that ever lived, and his plays—principally "Hamlet," "Romeo and Juliet," "The Taming of the Shrew," "Macbeth," "Julius Caesar," and "The Merchant of Venice"—draw large audiences whenever presented.

At the Berlin Deutsches Theatre, the stage manager of which, Prof. Max Reinhardt, is the well-known German authority on Shakespeare, hardly a week passes without at least one of the tragedies being staged, and sometimes the week's programme contains as many as two or three of Shakespeare's plays. The company includes Else Heims, Gertrude Eysoldt, Tilla Durieux among the women, and Bassermann, Moissi, von Schildkraut, and Hartan among the men, all of whom are famous in Berlin as interpreters of Shakespeare. The staging, also, is much more effective than in many London theatres.

At the Neues Schauspielhaus the performances of "Julius Caesar" are among each season's chief attractions, while in theatres of lesser magnitude "Hamlet" and "Macbeth" are frequently given with excellent results, both from the financial and artistic point of view.

It is in the north of Germany—in Prussia and Hamburg—that the cult of Shakespeare is most highly developed. In Munich, however, the popular mind, both at the Hof and the Residenz Theatres, is frequently entertained with performances of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Macbeth," alternately with the national dramas of Schiller and Goethe. In Stuttgart, at the Schauspielhaus; in Leipzig, at the Stadttheatre; in Dresden, where everything English is admired; in Frankfurt and Cologne, his works are also produced with great success.

There are people in Germany who really believe in the theory—absurd, it is true—that Shakespeare was originally a German called Schüttelspeer, and the average German looks on him as though he belonged to some Teutonic clan, which is a proof of the admiration in which he is held in the Fatherland.

In the coming tour of the company now acting at the Deutsches Theatre in Berlin, "Hamlet" and "Romeo and Juliet" figure in the list of "star" performances, together with "Faust" and "Wallenstein." This tour will include not only Munich, but also Brussels. English people, therefore, who intend to visit the International Exhibition in Brussels next summer, or the art centre of Bavaria, in the proximity of which the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play will attract thousands of sight-seers, will have an opportunity of witnessing German interpretations of Shakespeare.

Shakespeare has been "Germanized" for the Germans. This is one of the greatest compliments to his genius. German children in the schools read his dramas—the translation by Von Schlegel is excellent in every way and shows how intimate the translator was with the original. Shakespearean sayings, proverbs, and sentences have, moreover, entered into the ordinary conversation as though they had been really written by a German.

The average German knows more about Shakespeare's plays than the average Englishman. He has read them more frequently, seen them played more often, and is more fully acquainted with the beauties of their author's thoughts. Many Germans have learned English with the sole object of being able to read Shakespeare in the original, and England's greatest national genius has, comparatively speaking, more admirers in the Fatherland than in the British Empire. The reason is that the German taste has been more carefully educated in Shakespearean lore than our own, and this accounts also for his general popularity beyond the Rhine. In Germany his name does not spell ruin. It attracts crowds.

FRESH AIR SCHOOLROOMS

AND SOME OTHER SENSIBLE ADVANCE STEPS IN EDUCATION

The open-air schoolroom is the latest step back toward natural conditions of living. The discovery has at last been made that not only will fresh air cure tuberculosis and colds and catarrh, but that fresh air for well children will prevent tuberculosis and colds and catarrh, and, furthermore, that fresh air will do away with a large share of the stupidity that curses the life of children mewed up in our present air-proof "modern" buildings.

The first step in this process of discovery was made by teachers with enough imagination to recall their own experiences as school children. They remembered the school-room odor, that heavy, noisome stench—no other word will describe it—that made the entrance to a school-room from the fresh air a penalty and an offense. They remembered the torture of stupid hours, when heads nodded over meaningless lessons. They remembered the frantic joy of recess, and the groans with which the bell was greeted for "taking up school" again.

Their imagination went further still and reached the dizzying, the revolutionary idea that these things were wrong! That a child ought to enjoy the school-room, ought to relish lessons, ought to feel comfortable and happy during school hours. Yes, and not only that these things ought to be, but that they could be.

Such notions rocked the very foundation of pedagogy. But they have actually been tried out, and they work. And they have not been tried out by hare-brained enthusiasts, either, but by the leaders of pedagogical advance in the conservative eastern cities—Washington, Boston, New York.

The open-air treatment of tuberculosis suggested the idea of the open-air school-room for tuberculous children. The roof of a New York city school was utilized for an experiment with a class of fifty-two tuberculous children, segregated from various schools of the city. This class sat out on that roof all day long, every school day. Then the discoveries began. First, they did not freeze to death. Second, three-fifths of the class were cured of tuberculosis the first year. Third, the children enjoyed it. Fourth, discipline was improved. Fifth, lessons were better learned.

Then another bright idea was evolved. If tuberculous children got so much good of the open air, why not merely anemic children? That was tried out. Same results. Another idea: if ailing children, why not well children? It sounded like carrying coals to Newcastle, but, somebody said, let us keep them well. Another experiment showed that this was what it did do. It raised the percentage of average school attendance like a rocket. The well children did not get sick any more. It did another thing: the well children showed up better in their studies. The teachers found that the children could sustain an interest in their lessons longer. It dawned upon them that the children had not been indifferent to their lessons; like all children, they had had all along that innate and insatiable thirst for more knowledge that is characteristic of childhood. The trouble had been that their bodies had been so busy fighting for life against smotheration and bad air and little light that there was no vitality left to supply the brain with intelligent interest.

With these discoveries in mind, the experts went back over the old ideas of school teaching and school housing, and checked up the hoary old theories against the new light of facts. They investigated the old fresh-air "system" of ventilation. The theory was perfect, but the facts proved to be that "system" air is not fresh, live, out-door air; that "dry" air is too dry for delicate nostrils and lungs; that "ventilation" does not ventilate.

The old theories of teaching, also, got several body blows. "Calisthenics" and "drill" and "exercise" were also theory perfect, but they fit machinery and not human beings. A little recognition of childhood's imagination made a lot of difference, they found. When they told children to "breathe deep" they were talking adult technicalities that childhood could not understand. Worse still, childhood was not interested. But tell the children to "smell the pine woods" and the in-suction of air threatened the stability of partition walls. The old "bend the body from the hips, knees rigid" command was superseded by the language of childhood and became "pick up the leaves from the ground." Don't you see the point? This is play. This makes a picture in the child's mind, of something worth doing, of an intelligible motion, with a purpose. It is part of childhood's eternal "make-believe." Thus, the upward sweep of the arms was translated into child language, "Throw the leaves away." The forward-and-back sweep of the arms became "Shake the leaves off the tree."

Another idea struck somebody. Why should a school yard be a barren, unsightly, trampled corral? A teacher planted flowers in her school yard. The boys rooted them up for the fun of it. The teacher was wise. She whipped nobody. She knew that the boys wanted something to do, and that they destroyed the flowers because that was the only thing they knew how to do with them. So she played Tom Sawyer on the boys. She taught them how to take care of the flowers instead of destroying them. That was all the boys wanted. That was doing things, and, besides, there was the new joy of making things grow. Soon there was rivalry for the honor of being allowed to care for and guard the flowers.

The principle of this experience was adopted in the schools of Washington, D. C. There, around the sides of the school yards, a three-foot strip of earth against the fences is set apart for flowers, which the children plant and tend. Little lawns are allotted to the boys, and they water and mow them with the pride and care of first-year farmers. And they have all learned to value growing things, and their parents and neighbors note the change. Destruction is no longer part of the sport of Washington school-boys.

Still another idea erupted, this time in Boston. Recess was always a riot. Why? Because, said a thoughtful teacher, childish nature was nerve-racked, over-strained and near hysterical with being shut up in stuffy rooms and at too long lessons. Why not shorter study periods, and more frequent recesses? An improvement to this was added. Instead of allowing the promiscuous mixture of young and old children, in which the elder children monopolized the school yard, the yard was plotted off into sections, and each class was kept to itself. Then came the crowning achievement. The teacher played with the children. She, being only a child grown older, understood the joy of childish games, and became young again. They, being children with no conception of the adult mind, never knew their teacher until she became a child again, one of themselves. Here is the kernel of the new teaching: no longer try to lift the child to the adult level—that will come, but only by growth—but let the teacher resume the point of view of childhood and teach from that vantage ground of mutual sympathy and common understanding.

Now comes the point of this article. Mrs. Charles C. Boynton, of Alameda, herself the mother of several sturdy children and keenly alive to their point of view, has studied these discoveries of the new housing and the new teaching. She studied them in books and magazines; then she studied them at first-hand in the Eastern cities named above. Then she projected her own imagination upon the problem. She enlisted the interest of several of the foremost architects on this coast, and from their work she has evolved a plan of a school building and school yard that contains the facilities for introducing all the advantages of these new methods at once.

To one who remembers with a shudder the grammar grades of a well-equipped school of fifteen years ago, this plan is a vision of delight. A school-house built about an open court, every room practically a separate building, with light from three sides (dark only on the side the children face), windows that lift from the floor to the ceiling and more windows than walls, each class provided with an entirely separate playground, flower-beds and lawns at hand, basket-ball and hand-ball courts—send me back to school and let me live it over again.

Too expensive, you say. Wrong again. This is a working plan, costs figured out, for the projected Haight School, Alameda. The funds are already in the treasury to build this school as soon as plans are accepted. The money allowed is $90,000, and an old-style school building will cost that if it provides the needed accommodations. Mrs. Boynton's plan will provide the same accommodations, and cost $75,000.

Imagine yourself attending such a school. In fair weather, three sides of the room are open to the airs of heaven. No drowsy hours, no stale odors. Light is diffused from three sides, without vexatious cross-shadows. Suppose the class grows restless. The teacher leads the class at once, without waiting for a set time, out into its private playground where, disturbing no one and disturbed by no one, all play together—teacher and pupils—until the exercise and the amusement have refreshed everybody, and all return to the lessons with new interest and unstrained attention.

Let it be repeated that this is not a dream nor an impractical vision nor a useless piece of frivolity. It is the co-ordination of the most successful experiments of the best teachers in America, aided by doctors and scientists.

And why, in the name of common sense, should California schools, of all schools in the world, be hot-houses? Why should frozen New York have to teach balmy California that the open air is good for people, even children? Why should Washington, D. C., the home of the Atlantic blizzard, be allowed to teach California, the home of flowers the year round, that flowers and grass and trees can be made interesting to children and agents for the teaching of beauty? These things should have been taught to the East by California.

But they have not, and California had best quickly and humbly learn the lesson before she is shamed by the East and, more important, before she kills more children with tuberculosis and mars more children's lives by needless ails and unnecessary stupidity. Mrs. Boynton has brought a great idea eloquently home to her city, and that idea should be studied and put into practice throughout the state.

UP AND DOWN THE STATE

In a recent election on the saloon question San Bernardino went "wet" by a vote of 1,464 to 999.

George W. Keyes, a prosperous farmer who resides near Pleasant Grove, Sutter county, never has been in a larger town than Yuba City and he first rode on an electric car the other day.

The Portersville Enterprise has entered on the twenty-third year of its publication, and proudly announces that it is "a better and larger newspaper than it has ever been in the past, and with a larger and stronger circulation list."

In a vinegar factory at Watsonville Roy Phillips and August Groenfeldt were asphyxiated by the fumes of a tank in which the former was working. Groenfeldt lost his life in attempting to save Phillips.

The Peoples' Cause, of Marysville, of which Peter Delay was editor, suspended publication on April 30th.

The merger of the California State Board of Trade, the Manufacturers' and Producers' Association and the California Promotion Committee into the California Development Board was completed recently by the election of James N. Gillett, president; William J. Dutton, first vice-president, and Robert N. Lynch, second vice-president. The following executive committee was elected: J. N. Gillett, R. N. Lynch, N. P. Chipman, B. F. Walton, A. R. Briggs, A. F. Miot, Frank Wiggins, W. J. Dutton, F. L. Brown, A. B. C. Dohrmann, A. I. Esberg, R. B. Hale, F. J. Koster, F. Tillmann Jr. and J. P. Irish.

AS THE WORLD WAGS

By A. J. WATERHOUSE

"The Place Where You Love Me Is Best"

"I'm tired," she said, my baby,
 "An' fink 'at to s'leep I'll go,
 But firs' p'ease to tell me 'tories
 'Bout lots of queer fings you know,
 'Bout Jack an' the fee-fum giant,
 An' Robin an' 'little Boo Peep.
 An' right while you're tellin' me 'tories
 I dess 'at I'll go to s'leep."

So I murmured the folk-lore fancies
 First told when the world was new,
 And ever the eyelids fluttered
 And drooped o'er the eyes of blue,
 Till the Angel of Sleep came gently
 Down ladders of pale starbeams,
 And led her where wondrous stories
 Are lived in the Land of Dreams.

Back, back from the Dreamland Country
 My little one came unto me
 When Artists of Morning had tinted
 With silver both meadow and lea;
 And, "I fink," she sagely suggested,
 "Zere's places for Wake an' for Rest,
 An' the Rest place has bootiful 'tories,
 But the place where you love me is best."

Heart of my heart, let us learn it,
 The lesson the little one taught.
 What though we weary of struggle,
 Of striving, and striving for naught?
 Still, through the ceaseless endeavor,
 The yearning for dreamlands of rest,
 Spirit shall whisper to spirit:
 "The place where you love me is best."

Science Versus Cupid

All honor to Science and its tremendous achievements! The wonder of it cannot be overestimated or exaggerated in the age of the aeroplane, the automobile, the telephone, the telegraph, the phonograph, and the thousand and one other inventions that set our time apart as the marvel of the aeons. Nevertheless, there should be a line beyond which Science must not go, and when it attempts to put a pedometer on Cupid, or to stand him up against a wall and take his measurements with a tape-line, I contend that that limit has been passed, and this is what Science now is trying to do.

The instrument by which we would attain this end is called a plethysmograph, a name which in itself should be sufficient to demonstrate that Science does not know how to handle Cupid delicately. It consists of a rubber bag filled with water, in which is placed the arm of the person who is suspected. An indicator then is supposed to do the rest.

"John Smith," says the investigator to the young woman whom we may suppose to be suspected.

The indicator doesn't budge.

"Henry Jones."

Nothing doing.

"Thomas Brown."

Nothing doing some more.

"Chawles Augustus Lollipop."

Immediately the indicator wobbles, starts with a hop, skip and jump, and doesn't stop until the gage shows 144 degrees above zero. The fair young creature is exposed, and Chawles Augustus Lollipop ought to be happy.

Such is the plethysmograph (don't try to pronounce it if you have a cold), and such is the manner in which it is supposed to work, but we who have observed the course of genuine, heart-throbbing, soul-pulsating, spirit-galvanizing love will take no stock in it. How can we? Do we not know that the machine, if perfectly constructed, would, the first time it came in contact with a real case of spoonful young love, blow up in attempting to do its duty? And serve it right, too! Love, which, as everybody knows, is divine in its origin, cannot, must not, be measured by mere human implements. Science should go 'way back and sit down. In tackling Cupid with a machine it has gone too far. Its two-foot rule never will be applied to the little winged god, and we are glad that it cannot be, for we prefer our Cupid unharnessed.

The Opinions of Rufus

Sometimes seems ter me that some men grab opportunity only fer the sake of puttin' a mortgage on it.

I b'lieve they's lots of men that would meet with success if they'd git out of the way.

If a man could mix what he thinks he deserves with what the neighbors think he deserves I reckon the result generly would be 'bout what life gives him.

They's one satisfaction in seekin' an' follerin' a friend's advice: If things don't go right we have somebody to cuss.

What's the diff'rence now 'tween E. H. Hariman an' the child that built on the beach the sand playhouse that the waves washed away?

Charity's beautiful, but it seems kind o' useless when the best it can say fer a feller is to apologize fer him.

If women would wear washtubs on their feet I can't help feelin' that the harmony with the size of their hats would be more reely artistic.

Josh Bings says that the only dern fool that's reel hopeless, es fer es he's seen, is the one that don't know it.

I asked Ab Seffins what's the diff'rence 'tween a criminal an' a convict. "Well, they differ consider'ble," says he, "but I should say 'twas seldom less than two or three thousand dollars."

I s'pose Judas wan't modern 'nough to git the idee that if he'd give part of them pieces of money to the poor it would fix matters all right fer him.

They ain't any question that the sayin', "A penny saved is a penny earned," must have riginated when food an' clothin' cost less than they now do.

The Man on Halley's Comet

The Man on Halley's comet
 (Perhaps there is a man
 Who is built, I should imagine,
 On a quite peculiar plan)
 When he comes unto this planet
 From his somewhat distant range
 Must observe, if he is looking,
 Quite a noticeable change.

"Great meteors!" he mutters,
 "There is something doing here.
 This man, the little insect,
 Now is running on high gear,
 The telephone, the telegraph,
 The auto and the bike—
 I wonder how his grandpapa
 Would such a system like.

"Alas!" he says, "when last I came
 'Most everything was slow,
 And grandpapa and grandmama
 With oxen had to go;
 But now they ride in whizzing things,
 By aeroplanes I'm hit.
 If they are going to keep this gait,
 I guess I'll have to quit."

The Man on Halley's comet
 Then dropped a scalding tear,
 Which made the Martians all remark,
 "The water's hot this year,"
 But he muttered to his stoker
 In tones devoid of mirth,
 "Pile on a few more gases—
 I'm bound to beat the earth!"

Mrs. Milne at Rest

In San Luis Obispo, the other day, a "sweet singer" passed to her rest. She was, indeed, one of the sweetest singers of our West, and yet it is probable that comparatively few of my readers had followed her work at all closely. No song she wrote which was not helpful, but as caustic criticism of our neighbors was in none of her lines, some of us overlooked her. There was much sorrow and suffering in her life, but none of it found its way into her poems; they breathed only humanity, a love of her fellows and a desire to make them if but a little happier and better. She lived a good and helpful life, and she is at rest. God heed her, sleeping—and He will.

The Question of Woman's Vote

In the days when I was so young that I had not made up my mind about women I used to be a good deal affected by a certain argument against woman suffrage.

"Say," some misguided masculine friend would query, "what's the use of lettin' women vote? 'Twouldn't do anything but double the vote. They would vote just as their husbands said, and that would be all there would be to it."

This argument used to impress me deeply, but that was before I was mar—that is, it was before I had thought much about women. Now I think—say, William, if you think women will vote just as their husbands direct, ask some married man in whom you have confidence. Don't be too personal, don't inquire how it would be with his wife, but ask for his opinion in a broad, general way. As you are engaged, I shouldn't wonder if his answer would be quite interesting to you.

No, I am not worrying about women voting as their husbands direct; what is disturbing me is the probability of men voting as their wives manage. Lay particular emphasis on that word "manage," William, for that is the way the women—bless 'em!—handle us. They don't drive us. No, they could not, but heavens and earth, children, how they do lead us! They study our peculiarities, know them and us, and after that we are lassoed, and the other end of the lasso is about the pommel of their saddle.

No, if women are permitted to vote—as they should be, for taxation without representation is no less a wrong because it wears petticoats—I am not worrying about their voting as their husbands say, but, oh, it does trouble me to foresee how we men are going to succeed in voting otherwise than as the women manage. It is a problem to which I can see no satisfactory answer. Can anybody?

Still, Brethren, Let Us Be Grateful—

That, while our often transgressions may deserve penalty, Lieutenant-Governor Porter has not even been mentioned for re-nomination;

That Governor James N. Gillett apparently has heard a still, small voice calling him in out of the wet;

That even a near-direct primary, such as we have, cannot result in a Santa Cruz convention and a universal necessity for deodorizers;

That a well-trained ear can detect some difference this year between a party call and a locomotive whistle;

That the line between right and wrong, self-ownership and corporation-ownership, this year is so clearly defined that a man, though a fool, cannot err in deciding on which side he will take his stand.

Our Honored Heroes

A grateful people have honored certain of the nation's heroes by naming after them some of the gigantic trees of the Santa Cruz grove. Thus we have the Fremont, the Grant, the Roosevelt, and the other day an arboreal monarch was named the Jeffries in honor of our own James J.

We know our heroes. Let it not be thought By pigmy souls that we our great forget,
 The glory that their deeds of valor brought.

The vast sequoias whisper of it yet.
 The ones immortal whom we name in praise
 And love which grows not old, but e'er is new;

Fremont and Grant and Roosevelt, these whose bays Arc—oh, I 'most forgot—and Jeffries, too.

The great Pathfinder; he, the silent man
 Who Viet'ry carved from that black rock, Defeat.

And Bwana Tumbo, he who led the van
 Of those who vow the law shall justice mete,
 These be our heroes, and, their praise to swell.

The very trees unto their fame we yoke—
 And then there's Jeff, his glory weaves its spell—

Unless—suppose he doesn't lick the smoke!

POLITICAL TABLE TALK

By THE WATCHMAN

Will Roosevelt Sustain Taft? Rumors are permitted to leak out from "reliable sources" at Washington, and denied afterwards, to the effect that Theodore Roosevelt will stand by the President and lend a hand in helping him to secure the fulfillment of his policies. As this paper has already pointed out this is not an inherently improbable event. There is nothing the matter with the general purposes which the Taft administration has in view. The criticism of the President has been because he went to the wrong people for his support, not that he has supported the wrong things. Theodore Roosevelt will stand by the President so far as the President has stood for Right Things, but he will not stand by the men whom the President has stood by and depended upon to get done the things that he wanted to have done. He will reinforce the President by helping to focus public opinion upon the Right Things the President wants to do, and therein his aid will be important in forcing the reluctant hands of the persons to whom the President has been vainly looking for the power to crystalize his policies into statutes. This paper heartily hopes that Theodore Roosevelt will render the President every aid in his power, but he will make the mistake of his life if, in doing this, he also strives to give character to the Aldrich oligarchy and the Cannon autocracy, upon which the President has so unwisely depended for the consummation of his policies. There is small danger of his doing that.

Controller Nye Will Be Opposed Last week The Watchman expressed his disbelief in the, then, current report that the Republican "organization" would permit the nomination of State Controller A. B. Nye to become effective by default of having an opposing candidate. The Watchman knows too well the character of Mr. Nye and the type of character acceptable to the "organization" mind to lead him to suppose for a minute that the "organization" can have any use for Mr. Nye. With a state administration filled with officials of the Nye type the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company would be out of business. Frank Mattison's nomination papers are abroad in the land. Frank Mattison is a "good fellow," a good mixer, a glad hander out of office and in office, "reasonable" and "tractable." He would remember his friends, he would know the source from whence cometh his help. The horn of his salvation he would toot that it might become a horn of plenty also. The mind of Mattison is the political mind. The mind of Nye is the mind of the conscientious, self-forgetting public servant who strives without ceasing to advance the highest interests of the commonwealth. Mattison, in the event of his nomination and election, will, first of all, remember those by whom he received his nomination and election, the interests of the state coming afterward. That is the political mind, the mind of a Herrin, a Curry or a Gillett. Mr. Nye, on the contrary, has not a friend on earth whose personal interests he would permit to cast so much as a shadow betwixt him and the highest interests of his state. These two men are fine examples of the two types of mind contending for the mastery in this state, "organization" and anti-"organization," or the emancipated. Which shall it be?

Democratic Attitude Toward A. B. Nye The attitude of the reputable Democracy of California toward State Controller A. B. Nye is one of sincere appreciation and commendation. It is not disposed to make a fight against him. In fact, it is quite willing to permit Democrats to make him their nominee also if they wish to by writing his name in on their primary ticket, putting up no candidate against him. Of course if any Democrat wishes to make the race nothing can prevent, but there is no public or general party purpose to put up a candidate. Nor is this because of any scarcity of Democratic material. There are many good Democrats in the state who, if nominated and elected, might acceptably fill that office. The Democratic state of mind in relation to this office is more precisely this: Mr. Nye is all right. He is a Republican, but he is not an offensive partisan and does not carry partisanship into discharging the duties of his office. He is likely to receive the Republican nomination, but he might be jobbed out of it. If he should be, and Democratic voters had, meantime, by mutual consent and a common impulse, written his name into the blank space on their ticket and made him the nominee of their party, the Democrats and free Republicans, in the election of November, would make his election sure. This without any compact or agreement, but by a spontaneous and unselfish Democratic concern for a public officer who has shown himself to be exceptionally worthy of public confidence. If Democrats carry this idea out, as many are now talking of doing, it would raise the purity of their motives to a high estimation in the minds of all men.

A Just Estimate Of Johnson's Campaign The penchant the partisan press has for boosting that which it opposes, and belittling that which it favors, makes the public properly suspicious of overwrought accounts of public meetings and popular enthusiasm for partisan candidates. People remember that it was not always that the posters on the bulletin boards were fully justified when at last the circus came to town. However, there is abundant warrant for the oft-repeated statement that the progress of Hiram Johnson and his party through the state has been splendidly successful, as well as for the belief that the influence left behind will prove permanent and healthful. A very careful observer who heard Johnson on Saturday last at Dixon, writes this paper: "Johnson's speech was brief and to the point, and remarkably well delivered. It excited a great deal of enthusiasm. In this community Johnson will surely receive a large vote, both at the primary and at the general election." The reason why is not far to seek. It is simply not possible to sit and listen to Hiram W. Johnson and not believe that he believes what he is saying to be true. His is the eloquence of sincerity, not struggling for expression through wild gesticulations and a broken, cracked and half munched vocabulary. His style is that of the trained speaker whose thoughts flow melliflously from a well modulated voice, each word as perfectly formed as rain drops and making music as sweet. He speaks to the people out of a full heart and they are turning out to hear him as they have heard no other Californian since Starr King. The campaign of 1910 will mark the beginning of a new era in the political life of California, and Hiram W. Johnson, more than any other one man, will be its inspiration.

Loveland Debateable The district idea of electing such boards as those of equalization and railroad commission is fundamentally bad. It tends to make the commissioners loyal first to their districts and afterward to the state, whereas their loyalty should be unreservedly to the state as a whole. The second railroad commission district comprises the counties of San Francisco, Marin and San Mateo. All the rest of the state to the north comprises the first district, all the rest of the state to the south comprises the third district. The interest of the second district is therefore wholly commercial. The commissioner from that district will assuredly represent San Francisco's view of the shipping issue. The State Executive Committee of the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League cannot claim authority to make the nomination for the second district. That function lies with the district itself if it chooses to exercise it. If not, then the League should take the matter in hand in dead earnest. The office is important. Legitimate, lawful control of transportation is one of the issues in this campaign. This paper was of opinion that the public career of Commissioner H. D. Loveland was worthy of investigation to see if perchance it warranted his endorsement. Many points can be urged in his favor, and yet they leave the issue debateable. He is still the appointee of Gillett, who would not knowingly and intentionally appoint a man to such an office unless acceptable to Mr. W. F. Herrin. The League will therefore do well either to find a candidate for the place whose independence is not debateable or leave that place on its ticket blank. It should be possible in a population of half a million to find such a man in the Republican party, a man at once capable and above suspicion of being, or at any time having been, under obligation to railroad influence for political preferment. If not, then let the Democrats try their hand at it. Some man should be found for railroad commissioner whose independence is not debateable. Mr. Loveland's career, while having much to commend it, has not that pre-eminence.

Democratic Committee In Solemn Conference As the forms are being made up for this issue of The California Weekly to go to press the Democratic State Committee, and a number of candidates for nomination, are sitting in solemn conclave making up a state ticket by a sort of tacit understanding, common Democratic consent, consensus of opinion or whatever else it may be called. A state committee is not a proper body to do this. It is the only body of Democrats not proper to do it, and yet somebody must do it or it will not be done. If it can be done through conciliation, arbitration, and elimination, and nobody objects, well and good, but if any man objects, and can find another to agree with him in the objection, these two have a perfect right to make up an opposition ticket and offer it to voting Democrats at the August primary.

Another and more certainly legitimate function of the conference will be to assist the Democratic state committee in taking in hand the nomination papers of all Democratic candidates for state officers. If candidates will pay $300 to the committee, and sign the platform of principles as adopted at Los Angeles, the committee will undertake to have their nomination papers all signed up without any further expense to the candidates. It is expected that the signing and acknowledging will be done before justices of the peace and notaries throughout the state, who are ex-officio verification deputies, without hiring special deputies to go about hunting signers. The papers will be made up in pads and the signer will sign the whole list at one time and be done with it. This, if carried out as planned, will be a good object lesson in Democratic simplicity and economy, and one that the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League might have adopted with benefit. It makes easy and comparatively inexpensive what otherwise must prove costly and difficult for the candidate.

Nat Ellery Will Talk Nathaniel Ellery's candidacy for governor has puzzled many. Looking for strategy and generalship of the highest order to characterize the conduct of the Political Bureau of the Southern Pacific Company, and knowing that Governor Gillett belonged to that bureau, and that Ellery has been closely connected with Gillett, The Watchman jumped at the conclusion that the candidacy of Ellery is to be accounted for as a diversion planned by the master mind at the head of the Southern Pacific Political Bureau in the expectation that he may take a few votes away from Johnson. The event may prove this to have been an error. It is possible that Mr. Ellery is his own and only excuse for his candidacy, and that it has for its purpose that self-uncoiling that is so full of comfort to one when he has been a long time overcharged. In fact, sizzling at every pore. Ellery is honest. He says so himself, and those who know him well say so, too. He will not stand for grafting on the state through his department and he has a backbone that he carries around with him wherever he goes. Now Ellery made a fight against the cement trust in which he expected the Governor to back him. The Governor did support him up to the point where that backing proved indispensable, and then he failed. Since then it has been all off between the Governor and State Engineer Ellery and, in his automobile trip through the state, Ellery, it is reported, is to lay the whole matter threadbare before the public that the people may understand how public construction work is carried on, as well as how it would be carried on if Nat Ellery had his way. Wade in, Nathaniel. Let the chips fly where they will. Publicity is a virtue.

Democrats Running For Congressman

The Democrats are going after the Republican Congressman in every district in California this year. They express their faith in their ability to beat Englebright, McKinlay and Needham. If they can help it there will be no contest in the primary between Democratic aspirants in any district. The meeting of Democratic candidates and executive committee-men, which will convene before this reaches our readers, will probably eliminate all but one candidate for each Congressional seat. In the first district, John E. Raker, of Alturas, and District Attorney E. H. Holland, of El Dorado county, are rivals for the honor of seeking W. E. Englebright's scalp. The Democrats are very confident in this district. Duncan E. McKinlay is the victim sought in the second district, and Assemblyman John W. Preston, of Mendocino county, and former District Attorney Isaac Zumwalt, of Colusa county, are the men who would like to beat him. Mr. Preston will probably be the one who makes the try. Joseph R. Knowland's district is too hard a Republican stronghold for the Democrats to attempt to take it. The fourth, now represented by Julius Kahn, they hope to win with Walter Macarthur. The talk of running Judge Maguire against E. A. Hayes, in the fifth, is simmering down toward a decision to run Judge Maguire for superior judge in San Francisco, instead. In the sixth, the Democrats say they are surely going to defeat James C. Needham with James B. Holohan, of Watsonville. James McLachlan, whose district is the county of Los Angeles, will probably be unopposed by the Democrats, except as a matter of form, the district being hopelessly Republican. And S. C. Smith's district, the eighth, comprising the upper San Joaquin Valley and the rest of Southern California, is ironclad Republican. Nevertheless, three Democrats are willing to go up against Mr. Smith. They are I. I. Irwin, of San Diego, Judge B. F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, and R. N. Irving, of Riverside. Mr. Irving is probably the Democratic choice.

Johnson's Dates in San Joaquin Valley

Hiram Johnson is now swinging through the San Joaquin Valley, making probably the most thorough campaign ever made by a candidate for governor of California. He has already been received with eagerness by large crowds at Tracy, Stockton, Lathrop, Manteca, Ripon, Modesto, Ceres, Turlock and Madera. To-day he is to be in Merced and Le Grande. Tomorrow, Saturday, he will begin his canvass of Fresno county, speaking at Clovis from 11:30 to 1; in Sanger, 1:45 to 2; in Parlier, 3 to 3:30; in Reedley, 4 to 4:30, and in Fresno at the Barton Opera House at 8 p. m. He will spend Sunday in Fresno resting. Monday, he will resume his tour, speaking at Fowler, 10:30 to 11; at Selma, 11:30 to 12:30; Kingsburg, 1 to 1:30; Laton, 3 to 3:30, and at Hanford at 8 p. m. His schedule for the succeeding days, as far as arranged, is: Tuesday, May 10th, Lemoore at 12:45 and Tulare at 8 p. m.; Wednesday the 11th, Lindsay, at 12:45, and Porterville at 8 p. m.; Thursday the 12th, Exeter, at 12:45; Dinuba at 3:30, and Visalia at 8 p. m.; Friday the 13th, Delano, at 12:45, and Bakersfield at 8 p. m.; and Saturday the 14th, at Coalinga at 8 p. m. He will then go over the Tehachapi and make a second tour of Southern California.

Judge Curtis H. Lindley Out For Hiram Johnson

Judge Curtis H. Lindley, of San Francisco, has registered as a Republican for the first time in his life, so that he might sign Hiram W. Johnson's nominating petition and vote for him. Judge Lindley's reason for this, in his own words, is that "Hiram Johnson is the only senators. The new old guard of the senate will be made up of Burrows, if he is re-elected; Elkins of West Virginia, Gallinger of New Hampshire, Lodge of Massachusetts, Warren of Wyoming, Smith of Michigan, Penrose of Pennsylvania, Crane of Massachusetts, Kean of New Jersey, Brandegee of Connecticut, Carter of Montana, Root of New York, Burton of Ohio and senators of that class now forming the right wing of the old guard, flanked with more or less effect by such insurgents as Borah of Idaho, Bourne of Oregon, Bristow of Kansas, Brown and Burton of Nebraska, Clapp of Minnesota, Dolliver and Cummins of Iowa, La Follette of Wisconsin, Nelson of Minnesota.

Assembly Candidates In Alameda Districts

The city of Alameda is developing some promising material for candidates for the legislature on the Lincoln-Roosevelt end. Arthur G. Nason, for example, may be brought out for the race in the Forty-seventh assembly district, which comprises the city of Alameda. And Ralph Wilson, the attorney, is prominently mentioned for nomination. Wilson made a reputation for reform work in San Francisco, where he formerly made his home. Now that he has moved to Alameda he has an opportunity to go up against another stronghold of machine control.

Leeds Not to Run Against Lee Gates

Walter Leeds, who for two terms has misrepresented the Seventieth Assembly district in the State Legislature, will not be a candidate for nomination to the senate in the district which has sent William H. Savage to Sacramento for two terms. For some time Leeds has been assuring his friends in the assembly of 1909 that they would find him next winter occupying a seat in the chamber on the other side of the capitol building. He let the word go around that there was nothing to it but Leeds, so far as the Thirty-fourth senate district was concerned. But a few days ago Lee C. Gates walked into the arena bearing a testimonial from the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League to the effect that he was the better man of the two. Mr. Gates did not exactly need the document, but it was handy to have with him in case of an emergency. At any rate, it was sufficient, and Leeds has now confided to the public that he really doesn't care anything about the senate, anyway. He is content to return as agent of the people in the Seventieth assembly district. But even these are not anxious to put him on the job a third time.

They have investigated his work in the assembly and are satisfied that they could easily get a safer and a better man than Leeds to perform this public service. Braver machine men than Leeds are taking to the tall timber in Los Angeles this year. Three or four other machine time-servers, who a short time since were preparing to climb into their chariots and take a fling for the prizes offered, have dilly-dallied with fate until they are not quite so certain they want to do any racing this year. The political skies are too cloudy to suit that kind of entries.

Van Smith's Flip Talk

Geo. A. Van Smith, of the San Francisco Call, should be as careful to groom the statements he prints as he is to groom his immaculate and dandified person. His insinuation that Mr. Willis Booth, of Los Angeles, was unacceptable to the Lincoln-Roosevelt Republican League, because he "is for Taft," is worse than flippant. Mr. Booth's friends and business associates are mainly machine Republicans, and that fact was what caused his name to be passed by the League.

"LOOKS GOOD TO ME"

man now before the people of California who is big enough to meet the great political crisis now confronting this state." Bravely and clearly said, Judge Lindley. Your work for reform of the laws and the lawyers, as well as your distinguished position in the California bar and as head of the State Bar Association, give your phrase an added significance that you doubtless weighed when you worded it. It is your type of Democrats and Republicans alike that are going to put into the governor's chair this fall the first man ever put there on a clean-cut moral issue.

The New Old Guard

With the retirement of Aldrich and Hale from the United States Senate will come a realignment of leaders. Length of service determines almost altogether the influence of a senator. This realignment will bring new names into prominence, and the public should know from whom to expect the shaping of legislation in Washington henceforth, or until some line of advancement other than seniority is opened to

PERSONALIA

David Belasco has secured the rights of the popular German comedy, "Das Kozert," and Leo Detrichstein is going to adapt it for the American stage for him.

Rumor has it that William A. Brady may go over to the Shuberts before long. Daniel V. Arthur has left the trust for the other fold, taking over Marie Cahill and De Wolf Hopper.

Charles Frohman has bought a new comedy by Anthony Hope and Cosmo Gordon Lennox, which is called "Helen's Path." It will be tried in England soon, and may later come over here.

Amelia Bingham is back in this country again, and it is rumored that she has a Pinero play in her trunk, which she is to produce. One wonders where it came from. A new one is not due for more than a year.

Edward Sheldon has been commissioned to write a play for William Faversham, and says that it will take him at least six months to study up the history of the thing. Evidently Faversham is going to stick to the Dark Ages for a time.

William A. Brady is soon to make an all-star revival of "Jim the Penman." In the cast will be Wilton Lackaye, Florence Roberts, Marguerite Clarke, Arthur Byron and John Mason. Such a company should be worth going a good way to see.

Mrs. Cordelia MacDonald, the original Little Eva in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is living in Cambridge and busy writing her memoirs. She is 62 and began her stage career at four. Her father was the stage manager of the first "Tom show" and her mother was the original Topsy.

Lawrence D'Orsay is going back under the management of Charles Frohman next season. It was Frohman who first brought him to this country to appear with Annie Russell in "The Royal Family," and who later made him famous by starring him in "The Earl of Pawtucket."

Mr. Roosevelt's phrase "race suicide" was taken from Edward A. Ross, professor of sociology in the university of Wisconsin, who used it, however, to indicate the possible disastrous effects of an immigration of inferior races. He is now in China studying oriental life. His new book, "Latter Day Sinners and Saints," has just been published by B. W. Huebsch of New York.

Prof. Miriam Cary Thomas, president of Bryn Mawr College and of the Collegiate Equal Suffrage League, has taken charge of the traveling libraries which the National Woman Suffrage Association is sending around the country. These libraries each comprise twenty-five books packed in little trunks. They are to be sent around to the different women's colleges, at each of which they will be allowed to remain ten days. All expenses are paid by the national association.

Miss Katherine Nolan is in charge of a remarkable class in one of the public schools on the lower East Side of New York. The class is composed of pupils of all ages. The one thing they have in common is that they are all ailing, not ill, but just not exactly well. All one side of the room set aside for this class is composed of windows, which are kept open all the time. Outside these windows is a broad balcony, where the desks are moved for the afternoon session. It is said that a week or two in this room helps all the children.

Miss Marjory Snyder, a student at Wellesley College, has determined to earn her living from the soil. Immediately after her graduation she will buy a farm on Long Island, where she proposes to grow vegetables and breed valuable stock. Miss Snyder believes that there is a good living to be made from the soil and as proof points to the three girl farmers of Westboro, Mass., all college graduates, who after a few years have amassed snug fortunes.

THE OTHER DRAGON

Editor The California Weekly:

Apropos of the Housewife's Three Dragons—what about the fourth? Why not use "hard" sense to kill the dry goods merchant? Our grandmother spun and wove for the "eight" (plus two), and she made all their clothes. Of course, these days "poor dad" could not be expected to appear in homespun, but such clothes are fit apparel in which to butcher dragons,—good enough for the children of this servant wife. To weave, make, wash, iron and mend for ten would be mere recreation for this "slayer of dragons." House-cleaning, window-washing and carpet beating would serve to keep the muscles in training.

Now the "eight" need a mother's thought—she hears their confidences, knows their playmates, watches their intellectual and spiritual growth, is read up to the times, is interested in son's athletics, visits the teachers who are influencing the lives of her precious eight—one might even imagine some of these duties as important as "sterilizing sausages." Our loving wife must not fail to be fresh and smiling when "poor dad" comes home irritable from his hard work—he may like to talk politics while he takes his evening smoke. She should not be too ignorant on that score. Would the "slayer of dragons" please state how she raises and cures tobacco for "her lord," for, like his coffee, he probably prefers that of the best, and such a model housewife surely would not neglect so great an economy.

Of course all this time the eight have had no sickness—they are good children, for she has found leisure to train them, and the baby never frets while mother dissects hogs for bacon, hams and sausages.

It is not necessary to go back to our grandmothers to put even the "slayer of dragons" to shame! Her sisters in Germany also sweep the city streets; in Holland, aside from light chores of our "dragon slayer," she is hitched to carts with dogs or oxen; and in Japan she loads coal on ships. All this she does for "her lord and master!" Fie on the lazy "slayer of dragons!"

What do the women think about it, did you say? They certainly ought to find time with such light daily chores not only to think about it, but to write whole essays on "slaying dragons." As for me, I'd rather hear from the voters. Is this what we have brought our country to? Are these the pastimes sons and husbands would prescribe for their wives and mothers? Is this to be the manner of unloading the responsibilities of the present state of the country onto those who have had no part in its mismanagement? I rejoice that no man wrote "The Housewife and Three Dragons." At least we haven't that on the books against us. That isn't what I married my wife for—to make a "dragon slayer" of her! God bless any who may suggest a way to lighten her tasks, so that she may find time from the "eight" for repose, enlightenment, and those precious moments of companionship with one who loves her too well to pile on more burdens. Puzzle—"When is such economy not a convenience?" Answer—"When a man loves his wife." To — with the cost of living! I'd rather starve.

CHEAPER NEW FICTION

The London publishing world has lately experienced the introduction of a series of original novels by noted writers by Thomas Nelson's Sons at the retail price of fifty cents, says the N. Y. Sun. The binding, paper and press work are not distinguishable from those of $1.50 novels. This latest publishing experiment by the firm that introduced 15 cent reprints in good binding, printed on good paper, and with good type, has had extraordinary success.

Among novelists who are contributing original works to the 50 cent series are William Dean Howells and Anthony Hope. The publishers report that the advance orders were enormous, while the public, seeing the attractive grass green covered novels everywhere, bought with avidity. What effect the experiment will have upon the $1.50 trade remains to be seen. Publishers generally do not like the idea of producing the novels of popular writers at such a cheap price.

THE TERMINAL RATE QUESTION

A SOLUTION BY FIXING FREIGHT RATES ON A STRICTLY MILEAGE BASIS

By SIDNEY W. PERSONS

Among the many questions which have recently been and are now foremost in the minds of the commercial men of the Pacific Coast is the one commonly known as the "Terminal Rate" question. It arises from the fact that various shipping points either on the coast or on the inland water routes, and thereby enjoying a freight service by water as well as rail, are designated by the overland railroads as terminal points, and as such are used by them as a basis upon which to make freight rates to all other points. Having established these terminal points, the rate to any other point from the east is always ascertained by taking the rate to the nearest terminal and adding to it the local rate to that same terminal.

Citing, for example, a case in our own state, let us take the rate from Chicago, Illinois, to Fresno, via the Santa Fe. The nearest terminal point to Fresno is Stockton, which is 123 miles farther from Chicago than Fresno is, via this road. Let us suppose the rate from Chicago to Stockton on a certain commodity to be $1.00 and the local rate from Fresno to Stockton to be 10c. Natural reasoning would make the rate from Chicago to Fresno 90c, but instead it is $1.10. Do not assume that the Santa Fe hauls the freight to Stockton and then back to Fresno. Certainly not. The freight is put off at Fresno, but nevertheless the Fresno merchant pays for 246 miles of service that is never performed. The reason advanced of course is that the terminal point rate is competitive because of water service and that the other rate is therefore necessary.

It was a situation similar to this in Washington, where Seattle is a terminal and Spokane an interior point, that led to the now famous Spokane rate decision by the Interstate Commerce Commission in favor of Spokane. This decision would put certain commodities on a strictly mileage basis, thereby enabling Spokane to get them from the east for less than Seattle. The railroads, backed of course by Seattle, appealed and the case is yet to be decided by the highest authority.

The Opposing Factions

It will readily be seen that this is not a question of the railroads versus all the shippers. It is, instead, the coast versus the interior shippers, with the feeling at times so intense that the railroads are well nigh relegated to obscurity. They will always be found, however, with the coasters for reasons to appear in succeeding paragraphs.

Their Contentions

Let us glance briefly at the contentions set forth by these two factions. The coast merchants claim that having the advantage of water competition they are entitled to lower rates because of their natural geographic advantage, and that the railroads are thereby compelled to grant them. The interior shippers, on the contrary, deny this contention and would establish freight rates not purely on a mileage basis but largely so, and in so doing would themselves invoke the aid of a natural geographic law of greater and lesser distances.

Selfishness in Each Contention

To the casual observer there is much of merit in both contentions. But there is also much of error and in looking for its cause we find it to be just where we expect, in unregulated selfishness. The coast merchants look upon the more prominent interior cities as their legitimate prey for exploitation in the jobbing business and will fight to a finish any efforts to deprive them of their advantage in rates and of the consequent source of revenue. The larger interior cities naturally resent this attitude. They would eliminate the coast jobber's profits, but in turn would prefer a rate advantage over the smaller towns in their own vicinity.

Such, then, is another instance of the economic failure of unregulated selfishness, and the consequent problem it gives to us to solve. The writer contends that the only solution is at once to get beneath the surface, to brush entirely aside the minor considerations, and to find out what laws of nature are being violated. Trace them if you will, and you will find that every one of our present day troubles, commercial, social or political, have their origin in some violation of either God's law or of natural law. Nature's laws are inexorable: if they are violated a penalty must follow. This case is no exception. Natural law has been violated and the only solution is to cease its violation and to enforce its provisions alike on both sides, letting the results be what they may, even if they turn our entire freight transportation system upside down. Application of natural law has solved every problem to which it has yet been applied and it will solve this one, if given an opportunity, to the satisfaction of every reasonable man on the Pacific Coast. Nothing else ever can or will solve it with as much general satisfaction or with equal justice to all.

Application of Natural Law

Let us then consider the facts in this controversy, one by one, and wherever we find them at variance with natural law, assume them to be in compliance with its provisions and see what results we obtain. To begin with, the so-called water competition which we are told the railroads must meet in making terminal point rates does not now exist, or at least not to the extent of its full possible benefit, by reason of an illegal and unholy alliance between the overland roads and the Pacific Mail Steamship Company which exists for the purpose of keeping water rates so unduly high that the business will remain with the railroads. So-called terminal rates then are not, as we are told, competitive water rates, but are in reality actual land rates pure and simple, and the increase that interior points are asked to pay even over these rates is therefore unjustly high. The keeping of water rates unduly high for such or any other purpose is, of course, in violation of natural law.

To assume its enforcement, let us consider the establishment of a water rate on each and every commodity to coast points based on the actual cost of transportation plus a fair profit, improvements, maintenance and depreciation considered, such rates to be established by a capable and disinterested commission and to be enforced by law. What follows? Either the coast to coast land rates remain unchanged and inter-coast freight thereafter comes by water and the land business ceases to exist, or else the inter-coast land rates are lowered to meet the cut and the freight continues to come by land.

In the latter event, what is our result, assuming the previous land rates not to have been exorbitant? Either the railroads begin at once to lose money and must eventually go out of business or else they must meet the loss by overcharging in rates to interior points. Obviously they will do the latter and again we have violation of natural law.

Again we will enforce it and we will establish for each and every commodity a schedule of land rates based on the actual cost of transportation, mile for mile, between any and all points from ocean to ocean, improvements, maintenance and depreciation considered, plus a fair profit on such cost, such schedule to be determined as were the water rates by a capable and disinterested commission and to be enforced by law. When this is done we claim that natural law will be fully enforced and, having made such claim, let us view the results. And as it is just the consequent results which are at present urged as the principal objections to a mileage basis rate system, let us here consider them one by one and see whether or not they are worth sustaining in the face of the benefits to be derived.

Results of Application

The first discovery we make is that our whole transportation system is thereby turned upside down and must be completely reorganized. This has happened to other things besides transportation systems in our history and generally with the result of a betterment of man's conditions. No one will deny the injustice of the present system, no one will deny the inefficiency of any other proposed remedy, and no one, we believe, will deny that, if justice can be obtained, it is worth the price of any reorganization.

We are told that, if the overland roads are denied the privilege of meeting water competition—which they would be on a mileage basis—they would have to go out of business as far as inter-coast hauls are concerned. We deny it, and point to the enormous business, amounting to millions of dollars, that is annually done by the express companies at a rate from 300 to 400 per cent greater than water rates and to business amounting to millions more that is done in getting fast freight to the Pacific Coast when it could come cheaper by water. In these instances time is a factor. Quicker time warrants a greater expense and will always furnish a great volume of inter-coast land business, no matter how much lower water rates may be.

But as to the rest of the business, in which time is not a factor, we admit that competition will lose it to the railroads. We go farther and contend that they will also lose, not only through hauls, but all others where a combined land and water rate is less than a straight land rate. For instance, if the water rate from New York to San Francisco, plus the land rate from San Francisco to Reno, is less than the land rate from New York to Reno, then the freight will move that way. We contend, moreover, that this is logically the right situation and the only one in full compliance with natural law. The coast shipper will say that such a contention is absurd. Is it? Let us see.

He has been getting his freight by land but paying less than a land rate because he lived near an ocean he might have used. He is a man who would hire a taxicab but would offer its driver only a nickel in payment because there happened also to be street car service to his destination. The next passenger, not having the street car alternative, could be charged double fare to even up. To the coast shipper our contention is absurd because he views it through the eye of custom, which blinds many of us to the truths of natural law and which blinds him to the fact that this law forbids the consumption of twice the coal and twice the labor to land freight where it can as well be landed for half the coal and half the labor. Where time is a factor the railroads will retain the business and collect the land rate. Where it is not they will lose it by a competitive water rate and the shipper will have the advantage to which nature entitles him. There is no injustice in subjecting the railroads to this competition, there is no injustice in having the coast shipper pay his pro rata of whichever service he uses. No other solution offers entire justice to all, and entire justice to all is paramount to the interest of any railroad or of any one shipper. Therefore we do not sustain the objection to this result.

The Second Result

In the preceding paragraphs we have considered the first result and most radical change that natural law would make in our transportation system, viz., the different routing at a less cost of a great part of our freight. A second result would be to render impossible any further uniform schedule of rates between different roads connecting the same points. We will assume that a Gould road connects cities A and B via stations along a mountainous route, and that a Harriman line connects the same cities along a level route, and that it costs the Gould line 75 cents to haul a ton of freight from A to B that the Harriman line
